"Stop, Alfred," said Fanny, imperiously. "I won't have it. I don't like it. And, in a modified tone, remembering that she was only engaged, not married, "I mean that you, tumble me dreadfully. Now, dear, I'll make a little rule. You know you don't want your Fanny to look untidy, and all that. And she had touched his cheek with the tip of one finger. Dinks thinks that negatively." "Well, then, you shall only kiss me when I am in my morning-dress, and one kiss, with hands off, when I'm my goodnight."

She smiled a little, cold, hard, black smile, smoothing the ruffled feathers with darting glances at herself in the large mirror opposite, as if she considered her terms the most reasonable in the world.

"It seems to me very little," said Alfred Dinks, discontentedly; "besides, you always look best when you are dressed."

"Thank you, love," returned Fanny; "just remember that morning-dress, for I shall—and now tell me all about your conversation with your mother."

Alfred told the story. Fanny listened with alarm. She had watched Mrs. Dinks closely during the conversation, and was sure—for Fanny knew herself thoroughly, and reasoned accordingly—that Alfred's would plan at nothing in the pursuit of her object.

"What a selfish woman it is!" thought Fanny. "I don't suppose Mrs. Alfred's would plan at inheritance, she wants to bring the whole Bart family into her family. How inestimable some people are!"

Alfred, has your mother seen Hope since she talked with you?"

"I'm sure I don't know."

"Why didn't you ask her not to?"

"I didn't think of it."

"But why didn't you think of it? If you only have put her off, we could have got time," said Fanny, a little pettishly.

"Get time for what?" asked Alfred, blankly.

"Alfred," said Fanny, coaxing herself to speak gently, "I'm afraid you will be trying."

"Fan, I am very much afraid of it."

The lover looked doubtful and alarmed.

"Dearest, dear, I ask Alfred, for Heaven's sake!" cried Fanny; but she immediately recovered herself, and said, with a smile, "You see, dear, how I can scold if I want to. But you'll never let me, I know."

Mr. Dinks looped certainly that he never should. "But I shall be a very hard husband, Fanny. I shall let you do pretty much as you want to," said he, with the air of a chivalrous resolution.

"Dearest, I know you will," rejoined his fiancee. "But the thing is now to know whether your mother has seen Hope Wayne."

"I'll go and ask her," said Alfred, rising.

"My dear Alfred," replied Fanny, with her mouth screwed into a semblance of smiling, "you'll excuse me, I'm sure, if I insist on common sense. It is too delicate a question for you to ask.

Mr. Dinks grinned and looked bewildered. Then he assumed a very serious expression.

"It means more to me than you know my mother if she has seen my cousin."

"Pooh! you silly—I mean, my precious darling, I never needed to tell you before. You shall have every thing out of you in a twinkling."

"I suppose so," said Alfred, slowly.

Fanny Newt wagged her foot very rapidly and looked fixedly upon the floor. Alfred gazed at her admiringly—thought what a splendid Mrs. Alfred Dinks he had secured, and smacked his lips as if he were tasting the kiss. Then he leaned to her as he sat. He kissed the air toward her. But he might as well have blown kisses to the brown paper of Trinity Church.

"Alfred, you must solemnly promise me one thing," she said, at length.

"Sweet," said Alfred, who began to feel that he had aimed very much, indeed—"sweet, what thing?"

Fanny flushed and wrinkled her brow. Mr. Dinks was thinking.

"Oh no, dear—no, not at all," said he.

"My love," said she, in a voice as soft but as black as her eyes, "do you promise or not? That's all."

Poor Dinks! He said Yes, in a feeble way, and hoped she wouldn't be angry. Indeed—indeed—he didn't know how much he loved her darling. But Miss Fanny, after ordering wine and he had to drink on, and, oh! dear, he couldn't do any thing of Fanny could forgive him. Dear, dear Fanny, please to forgive a miserable fellow! And Miss Newt's betrothed walked out and sat and rolled upon the sofa in inaudible woe.

Fanny looked cruel, patting the floor with her foot and looking at this spectacle. She thought she had counted the cost. But the price seemed at this instant very little. She ordered collected here not less than 225,000 troops, and continued them in person. His evident purpose was to make a stand here, and risk the fortunes of the war upon the issue of the day. Napoleon promptly accepted the challenge, and commenced the attack as soon as it was light this morning, by placing cannon upon the hills all around the Austrian position, and at the same time, and opening fire upon them from the heights of Solferino. The battle thus began, which commenced as a magnificent, sharp, hand-to-hand fight, which continued for the entire circuit of the plain, and from that our view of the entire operations was in every direction from the centre of the day. The French very soon got the centre and right of the Austrian position under their fire, and followed them into the small villages of the plain. There were three of these villages, which were the scenes of a sharp and protracted engagement. The Austrians disputed every inch of this ground, and when they at last did throughout the day, with the utmost desperation. They were three times driven out of the village of Solferino, and three times the people of the village say they would stay only to see the French upon them, and then leave their houses. The French were compelled, at a sacrifice, to burn the town.

THE BATTLE BECOMES GENERAL.

"When they found it necessary to hold their ground any longer, they fell back, slowly and steadily, until they reached the ridges of Volta, which, you will see by the map, lies directly southeast from Castiglione, and is only about a mile from the village of Solferino. Here, also, it is separated by a range of hills. Upon these hills, in the rear of the town, and overlooking the country to the south and southeast also, the Austrians had planted their heaviest batteries, and when I arrived upon the field some hours after the battle had begun, I found the French at the opening of the engagement, between two and three hours after it had begun, and at that time these batteries were blazing away upon the French who were stationed in the plain. It was a fine sight to see all in advance with any accuracy the successive steps of this action, but I could see enough to form a clear idea upon the broad plain, and moving up in masses toward the front, where the battle was raging, as the reserves were required. But so soon as they reached this point they were speedily ordered to the centre and the centre, and dissipated from observation. But the general result was true to the plan of the battle. The centre of the Austrian line, and the strongest position, was the point of attack, and the main reliance on the part of that attack rested upon the French infantry. The cavalry and artillery lasted for over an hour; but in precisely what manner the Austrians were driven out of their position from the position I occupied is not. I saw afraid to change it, however, because the smoke of the battle-field have gone down directly and closely upon the field, I could not have found my position again, and the point to which I could have had no sweeping and complete a view.

THE STORM.

"But the battle continued to rage all over the region northwest of a line connecting the towns of Castiglione, Solferino, and Volta. And about two o'clock, a very commanding would arise and continue for half or three-quarters of an hour—and then the storm would subside, and the battle would be renewed again, and the air was cooled and perfectly delightful. Through the thunder of the cannon and the din of battle, I could hear the rain falling upon the leaves of the trees, from the same storm which was passing over the field.

"The second of the decisive battles of the present war, will be found on page 466.

ANOTHER ACCOUNT.

The correspondent of Galignani's Messenger writes: "We arrived at Castiglione at 4 o'clock yesterday morning, and found a column of French troops engaged in half a league's distance from the town, commanded by the Emperor in person, and who had, it is said, remained that he would not leave the field of battle in the evening, and on the following day drove all the Austrians from the town. It appears that the left of the Austrian army was a most formidable one. The attack, which commenced at 4 o'clock in the morning, was met by Lake of Garda, and on account of the nature of the ground the engagement was carried back place without material advantage on either side. The French had to contend with the Austrian and Ninety-eight—of the line, and the Seventeenth battalion of foot chasseurs, the last having signed a force ten times superior in number, and advantageously posted on a range of hills. The French had to fall back, overcome by numbers, when the battalion of chasseurs of the Guard, which had been stationed at Castiglione, forming together the First brigade of the Second division, under General Bazaine, came to their assistance. On seeing this reinforcement the former force rallied and rushed like lions upon the enemy, who left their position. They were pursued at the point of the bayonet, and the Austrians, who had received a supply of ammunition, were also driven back. The village of Castiglione remained from the windows of the houses and from loopholes in the walls, which had been prepared before. The Austrians were, however, at last driven out of the village, and from the right of the village of Solferino, which they occupied on the hills along the Lake of Garda. Several other villages were also taken by the French, the French had expended all their ammunition, and had nothing left but their bayonets. The French, at the head of their weapon, but the enemy perceiving their intention turned their forces.

"Fortunately, at that time, the Emperor arrived with a reinforcement of 20,000 men, and with them a supply of ammunition, and the Austrians retired on the strong village of Cavriana, which is situated on the hills between the towns and on the towers of the churches, whence they keep up a galling fire. At the same time the French got on the hill on which the village is built, a horrible carnage took place, and the Austrians said they were driven back on Peschiera. While the issue of the battle of the Guard was pending, the Austrians, on the hills, the cavalry, which had only joined during the last few days, were brought into action.

THE AUSTRIAN ACCOUNT.

The following is the text of the telegraphic dispatch, published by the Vienna Gazette:

VIENNA, June 25.

The Austrian army passed the Mincio yesterday, the 24th of the 24th, and the following battles were fought: Pozzolengo, Solferino, and Cavriana, the left wing advanced on the hills between Pozzolengo and Solferino, and fought back an overpowering force of the enemy, which had advanced from Brescia, and from Montechiaro, and had moved forward from the Castiglione, the centre, who had advanced from Cavriana, and from Guidizzolo, to turn the town.

The battle began at 3 o'clock in the morning, and lasted until 7 in the evening. The enemy's forces were commanded by the Emperor Napoleon in person, and consisted of the Second corps, under General Niel, the Fourth, under General Canrobert, the Third, under General Baraguay d'Hilliers, and the Imperial Guard, under General Regnaud de St. Jean d'Angely, and the Sardinian army, under the King Victor Emanuel, and General Della Marmora. The Austrian army was under the command of the Emperor Francis Joseph, and consisted of the First corps, under General Count Clam Gallas, the Fifth, under General Count Stadion, the Seventh, under General Zobel, the Eighth, under General Count Schaffgotsche, the Ninth, under General Count Schaffgotsche, the Tenth, under General Count Wimpffen, and the Reserve cavalry, under General Count Stadion.

The Austrian army passed the Mincio with the First corps, which was also reinforced by the Reserve cavalry, and the Fifth corps, which was also reinforced by the Reserve cavalry, and the Fifth corps, which was also reinforced by the Reserve cavalry, and the Fifth

MALEGNANO.

The accompanying magnificent engraving of the battle of Malegnano is from a drawing by the celebrated Gustave Doré, who had before him sketches by M. Durand Brager. It is probably the finest of the war pictures which have appeared.

The battle of Malegnano was fought, as our readers will remember, on 8th June. Malegnano, or Marignano, as the French call it, is a small town ten miles east of Milan. It occupies a place in mediæval history as the spot where the Guelphs and Ghibellines concluded their famous treaty in 1275. Subsequently, in 1515, it was the scene of a terrible battle between Francis the First of France and the Milanese and Swiss. At this latter fight more than 20,000 men were left on the field, and the conflict was from its desperate character called the battle of the Giants. More recently, Marshal Baraguay d'Hilliers has given it fresh claims to historical note.

The story of the new battle may be briefly told. After the evacuation of Milan the Austrians took up a strong position in and around Malegnano. On the evening of 7th June the Emperor directed Marshal Baraguay d'Hilliers to drive them out, and ordered Marshal MacMahon with his corps to assist in the operation. The business was quickly done, but the slaughter was terrible. The Austrians had barricaded every street, and loopholed every house; in the cemetery, especially, which is distinctly shown in our picture, they made a desperate resistance.

A newspaper correspondent, who visited the scene the next day, writes:

"The conflict had been a dreadful one in the village, and as the Austrians were behind the walls of gardens and in houses they succeeded in killing about an equal number of French as long as they remained behind cover; but once driven out of the houses they were killed in great numbers. They retreated rapidly, and as they passed out of the village they then encountered a foe not expected. One hundred and four shots were fired at them with cannon loaded with canisters containing eighty bullets. Where this occurred the Austrians are lying in heaps. They were actually mowed down, and their wounds are the most ghastly and horrid ones I have ever seen. The French lost a number of officers; and I was pained in observing among those whose bodies were being embalmed two captains in the 1st Zouaves with whom I have often dined, and for whom I felt the most lively regard and friendship. Poor fellows! They were both married, and my heart bled as I thought of the two poor fond wives, far away, waiting with beating hearts for news of their husbands. Alas! war is a dreadful thing, and misery and suffering are its attendants. I saw among the Austrians that were killed the bodies of one general and thirty-five superior officers. The struggle in the streets was a dreadful one, as is attested by the aspect of the houses. At the cemetery the Zouaves were forced to provide themselves with ladders and barrels or boxes, as the walls were high and the entrance barricaded. They jumped down into the interior, and soon the bayonet had done its fatal work. I must tell you of the result of a charge with the bayonet, made by a company of Hungarian Grenadiers. 'They came upon us,' said the officer of Zouaves who told me of the affair, 'in a determined manner. I ordered my men to halt, and when they were within ten feet I gave the order to fire and charge. Every man of the foremost company went down before our volley, and not one of the Hungarians was alive ten minutes after.' This first attempt was a most decided failure. While I remained in the village a most painful and revolting event took place. Some Zouaves, who were attending the wounded, both Austrians and French, deposited in a house some fire-arms they had picked up in the streets. They asked the woman who lived in the place whether she knew of any Austrians being hidden in the town, as if she did, they had better surrender at once, and have their wounds attended to, besides which they were sure of good treatment. She refused to answer the soldiers, saying she knew nothing about the Austrians. She then commenced carrying the guns up stairs, saying they would be safer there. The Zouaves, who were commanded by a sergeant, then left to resume the care of the wounded, when a musket shot was heard, and the sergeant I have spoken of fell upon his face dead! He was shot through the body, the ball having entered between the shoulders. Looking hastily around, his men saw an Austrian leaving a window of the very for the future to keep away from the battle-fields until the wounded had been attended to and the dead buried. The prisoners will be marched off to-night to Novara."

It will be noticed that our picture represents a thunder-storm bursting on the scene. The Austrians ascribe the cessation of the battle to this incident. The official report telegraphed to Vienna says:

"A violent thunder-storm, and perhaps an intention to move on Paris, induced the enemy to break off the engagement, and the division Borger continued its march toward Lodi without further molestation."

Other correspondents say: "Before attacking, a few cannon shot were fired from the bridge before the town, which the Austrians had again left standing. These latter did not reply. On this the order to advance was given, and the Zouaves, full of desire to emulate their comrades who had distinguished themselves at Palestro and Magenta, rushed on with, even for them, unusual élan. No resistance was met until they came to a cemetery to the left of the road, just before the entrance of the town. It is surrounded by a wall from fifteen to eighteen feet high, and covered outside with tombstones of black marble imbedded in it. The only entrance to it is a large, massive iron gate. This cemetery the enemy occupied in strength. Beneath, from a little chapel which is inclosed by the wall, and ladders were placed against the inclosure to serve as a banquette to the defenders. In spite of these preparations the resistance on this point was not great, for already had the 10th Chasseurs, to the left, turned the position. When they arrived at the river, which, as I said before, crosses the main road, and runs to the other side of the town, they found the bridge leading over it broken. Nothing daunted by this, they jumped into the stream, and made their way through it in spite of its depth. Immediately behind the cemetery is a large farm-house, which forms the first house of the town on this side. The walls of it had been loopholed, and the windows were occupied by riflemen. This was attacked first, and carried. What follows after it was a street fight, the 1st Zouaves supported by the 3d of the Line, on one side, and the 10th Chasseurs and the 15th of the Line on the other. Every house was strongly occupied and obstinately defended. Concealed behind the windows, the enemy, sufficiently protected, directed a murderous fire on the attacking columns. They never showed themselves for an instant in the open, but loading behind the walls, ran out and fired. In spite of this disadvantage, which occasioned a good deal of loss, one house after another was cleared of the Austrians. Just on the outskirts of the town is a large building, once a chateau, and lately used by the Austrians as a House of Correction; it stands in the midst of a square, and is surrounded by a large dry ditch. To this square a large mass of Austrians was pressed back. There is a double gateway, the outer a square tower, having evidently once been connected by a drawbridge with the inner one; now a causeway leads over it, and through this the Austrians had to make their way. They were here caught by the Zouaves, and a number of them bayoneted. Those who could get through in time ran to the garden which leads off the courtyard into the fields. A massive iron gate separates the two, and the Austrians found means to shut this. The building on all other sides is surrounded by a ditch, flanked with masonry about 15 to 20 feet high, so that there was no issue on that side. Besides, the Austrians had thrown up some earthworks in the fields facing it. But this interruption lasted only just long enough to allow another body to go round, and once in the open field, it was a child's play.

"In an hour and a half the Austrians were driven out of the town, with a loss of 1000 prisoners, one gun, and at least 6000 dead and wounded."

A Milan letter relates the following episode of the battle:

"During a charge of the 1st Zouaves their commanding officer, Colonel Lummel, found himself opposed hand to hand to the colonel of an Austrian regiment. Being both on horseback, they seized each other by the body, and a tremendous struggle ensued. The Austrian officer fired his revolver, but his arm being forced up at the moment, he missed the French colonel, who in his turn fired, and shot the horse of his adversary. As the animal was falling he ran its rider through the body and killed him."

AUDUN AND HIS WHITE BEAR.

FROM THE OLD NORSE.

[The following quaint story of the adventures of an Icelander in the eleventh century is taken from the Saga of King Harold Hardgrave. This was that Norwegian king whose hard, unyielding temper gained him the nickname of Hardrada, "hard ruler." He was St. Olof's brother, after whom death he fled East to Byzantium, and became captain of the Greek Emperor's Varangians. Returning, after several years, to found Magnus, Olof's son, on the Norwegian throne, a share of which he claimed and got. At the death of his nephew he became sole King of Norway and at last, having taken up the cause of Tostig, he fell at the battle of Stamford Bridge, in Yorkshire, in 1066, and found there those sorts of an English ground which his namesake the Anglo-Saxon Harold had grounded him. Snorro, whose bounty rained out so characteristically in the story, was that King Sverre of Denmark who claimed the crown of England from Edward the Confessor as Canute's heir, and whose death, by falling overboard when on the eve of invading for England to assert his right, may still be seen sculptured as one of God's judgments in the Chapel of the Confessor, at the back of the High Altar in Westminster Abbey.]

THERE was a man named Audun, an Icelander and Westfirther; his means were small, but his goodness was well known. This Audun once sailed from Iceland with a Norwegian merchant named Thorir, but before he went he made over almost all his goods to his mother—and after all, it was not more than enough to keep her for two years. After that they put to sea with a fair breeze, and soon made Norway. Audun sailed with Thorir that winter, and next summer they both sailed out to Greenland, and were there the next winter. Then Audun bought a white bear, well tamed, and he gave for the beast all the money he had—for it was the greatest treasure of the land. Then he went on board of.

Next summer they sailed back to Norway, and had a good voyage; as for Thorir, the captain, he went back to his own house, but Audun got himself a passage to the north in the Dublin ship. He took his bear with him, and looked about for a lodging for the night; for he meant to make his way south to Denmark, and give the bear to King Sweyn. But just then the war and strife between King Harold and Sweyn was at its height. It happened, too, that Harold was then in the town with his court, and when the king heard how an Icelander had come from Greenland with such a tame white bear. The king sent at once for Audun, as he was before the king and greeted him. The king took his words well, and asked,

"Hast thou that white bear which is such a treasure?"

"I have," said Audun.

The king said, "Will thou sell us the beast for the same price thou gavest for it?"

"I will not do that, lord," said Audun.

"Will thou," says the king, "take it give then twice as much, and that a father, if indeed thou gavest for it all thy money?"

"I will not do that, lord," he said.

"Will thou give it me, then?" says the king.

"That, too, I will not do," says the Icelander.

"What will thou do with it, then?" said the king.

Audun answers: "What I have already made up my mind to do: go south to Denmark and give it to King Sweyn."

Then King Harold said, "Is it now that thou art so ignorant a man that thou hast not heard of all this war and strife which is between the lands here, or dost thou think thy luck so great that thou will be able to bring this treasure to King Sweyn when others can not get to his land without trouble, even when need force them to go?"

Audun answers: "I, lord, am now lies in your power, but I will say yes to no other way than the one I have already spoken of, and made up my mind to follow."

Then the king said, "I see no reason why thou shouldst not go on thine pleasant trip to make this bargain, that thou canest here to me when thou gettest back, and tell me how King Sweyn received thee for the beast. Maybe thou art a man of luck."

"I'll give you my word to do that," said Audun. And away he went, and got a passage south to Denmark. And when he got there he gave proof of his money was spent, and he had to beg for food both for his bear and himself. So he went to a bailiff of the king, whose name was Auki, and begged him to get him some food, that he might feed himself and the bear, which he meant to give King Sweyn.

Auki answers: "I will tell thee food, if then will."

"I have nothing to give for it now," said Audun; "but I would be glad to bit upon some way of bringing the beast to the king, for it were a great exathe if so precious a thing were to do on my hands."

Auki said, "Ye'll both of ye need much food before ye get to the king. And now I'll make you this offer: I will feed ye both till then, but then I must have half the beast; and what thou hast now to look at is this—that thou wilt not have even half of it if it starves to death on your hands."

Audun thought this choice hard, but still could see nothing better for it as things stood now, and struck a bargain, and he agreed to sell Auki half the bear, on condition that they started for the king's house at once and should reckon the worth on both sides, first on the food which Auki gave him, and then all that Auki should find out that he pay Audun so much as was over, if the king thought half the bear worth more than the food. So they set off for them, till they found King Sweyn. He greeted Auki, the bailiff, well, but asked the man who came with him who he was, for he did not know him.

Audun answers: "I am a man from Iceland, now come from Norway, but before that I come from Greenland. My errand thither was to give him this white bear which I bought out there in Greenland with all my goods; but a great change has befallen me, for now I own no more than half the beast."

After that he told the king the whole story, and all that passed between him and Auki.

"Then the king said, "Is this true, Auki, what he says?"

"True it is," says Auki.

Then the king said, "And thoughtest thou it all to thine own profit to take what I had given and given there great place, to tax and toll what an outlander and a stranger had purchased with his own goods; and that, too, when our greatest foes brought it great luck to go and buy in peace? Think, now, how truthless it was in thee to do such a thing, and see what a great difference there is between thee and Harold, when he gave him safe-conduct. And now it were meet thou shouldst be put out of the land, and that I did it, but that though I will not slay thee this time, still thou shalt go away at once on the spot a beggar from my realm, and never come into my sight. But for thee, Icelander, as thou hast given us the whole of the bear and that worth for more than the food which Auki sold, but which he ought to have given thee, I accept it, and ask thee to stay with me here."

Then Audun thanked the king for his words and invitation, and said that, since the king now went away unhappy, and lost great goods, because he coveted that which did not belong to him.

Audun laid away with King Sweyn a little while when he said he was eager to go away. The king was rather loth to part with him.

"What wilt thou do, then," he asked, "if thou wilt not be with us?"

"I will go south to Rome," he says.

Then the king said,

"Hadst thou not taken such good counsel, I had been very angry at thy eagerness to go away, but now thou shalt not be thwarted in my heart." So the king gave him much silver, and settled all about his journey, and put him in the way of getting on board a ship which was ready to sail. Him to come to see him when he came back.

So Audun went south, but when he was coming south he took a great sickness, and lay long abed. All the money was spent which Sweyn had given him, and he was sometimes ashamed to show himself before their eyes. But when the king had sat down to the table Audun went and dined his meat outside under the wall of the hall, as is pilgrims' went, so long as they have not been away and sell and scrip. And now he made up his mind to throw himself in the king's way as he went to archeology, for he took as this seemed to him earlier in the day, just half as bold again must he have been to bid the king see his new that they had sold drunk. So, when Audun saw them coming, he turned short off and ran away to hide himself. But the king thought he caught a glimpse of a man, and as he came out of church, and all his men took counsels inside their lodging, he turned round and went out again, and called out with a loud voice, as soon as he was out of doors,

"If there be any man here in Rome Andalusia there is, who wishes to see me, and has hardly been to do so, let him come forward now and let himself be seen."

Then Audun came forward, and fell at the king's feet. The king knew him at once, and took him by the hand and bade him welcome.

"And now," he says, "thou art greatly changed since we saw one another last, for I scarce knew thee."

So the king led him into the hall there and then; but all the king's train laughed at Audun as soon as ever he saw him. But the king bade

"Ye have no need to laugh at him, vile and mean though he seems to ye to look on; he hath been much better for his soul's health than ye, and therefore to God's eye he will seem bright and fair."

Then the king made them get ready a bath, and waited on him with his own hands, and gave him afterward good clothes, and made much of him in every way. So Audun soon got back his strength and health; for he was young, and there he staid a while. He knew, too, how to behave himself among the crowd of men; he was an easy-tempered, well-weighing man, and not given to gossip. So all men liked him; and as for King Sweyn, he was most gracious to him.

So it fell out one day, when spring-tide was drawing on, that they two were talking together; and all at once the king said,

"South to say, Audun, I have never yet repaid thee in a way thou wouldest like, by a gift in return for the white bear. And now, if thou will, thou shalt be free to stay long here with me, and I will make thee my henchman; and, at the same time, treat thee honorably in all things."

Audun answers, "God thank you, lord, for your generous offer, and for all the honor you show me; but I have set my heart at sailing out to Iceland."

"This seems to me a most wonderful choice," said the king.

Then Audun said, "I can't bear to think that I am sitting here with you in great honor and happiness, while my mother trumps about on the beggar's pulse out in Iceland. I ask for now the time it up during which I gave her means to live, before I sailed away from home."

"Spoke like a good man and true," answers the king; "and no doubt thou wilt be a man of luck. This was the only thing which would not have misliked me, if thou hadst asked leave to go away. But now stay here a while with me, till the ships are being got ready."

So Audun staid. But one day, when the spring was near at hand, King Sweyn went down from the town to the landing-place, and then they saw men have fitting out their ships for various lands; East to Russia, or to Saxony, to Sweden, or to Norway. So Audun and the king came to a fair ship, and saw men hard at work on her: she was a merchantman of fine size.

Then the king said, "What thinkest thou, Audun, of this ship?"

He said, "She was fine enough."

"Now," said the king, "I will repay thee for the bear, and give thee this ship with a full lading of all that I know is handiest in Iceland."

Audun thanked the king as well as he could, for this gift; but when time went on, and the ship was ready for sea, they two went down again to the strand—King Sweyn and Audun. Then the king spoke:

"Since thou wilt go away from me, Icelander, nothing shall now be done to hinder thee; but I have heard that thou hast a will of the house, and that there are great shoals and risks for ships; and now, if things do not turn out well, it may be that thy ship goes to pieces, and thy lading will be lost: little then will be left to show that thou hast met King Sweyn, and given him a thing of great price."

As he said this the king put into his hand a big leathern bag full of silver, and said, "Thou wilt not be now altogether penniless, though thy ship goes to pieces, if thou only hadst this."

"Many, too," the king went on to say, "that then losest this money also, what good will it then have been to me that thou gavest King Sweyn thy treasure?"

As he said this the king drew a ring of gold from his arm, and gave it to Audun; that was a thing of costly price, and the king went on:

"Though things go so ill that thy ship goes to pieces, and all thy goods and money be lost, still thou wilt not be penniless, if thou consent to land with this ring, for it is often the case of men to bear their gold about them when they are in risk of shipwreck, and it will then show that thou hast met King Sweyn Wolfson, if then holdest fast the ring, though thou losest the rest of thy goods. And now I will give then this bit of advice, never to part with this ring, for I wish thee to enjoy it to the uttermost, and then thinkest thyself bound to repay so much goodness to some great man as to deem it right that thou shouldst give him a great treasure. When thou findest such a one give him the ring, for it is worth a great man's while to own it; and now farewell, and luck follow thy voyage."

That was what King Sweyn said.

After that Audun put to sea, and ran into a haven in Norway, and as soon as he heard where King Harold was he set out to find him, as he had given his word. So Audun came before King Harold and greeted him, and the king took his greeting kindly.

"Sit here now and drink with us," said the king.

So Audun sat and drank. Then King Harold asked,

"Well, how did King Sweyn repay thee for the white bear?"

"In that wise, lord," says Audun, "that he took it when I gave it."

"In that case," said he, "I had repaid him myself," says the king. "What more did he give thee?"

"He gave me silver to go south."

The king answers, "King Sweyn has given many a man before now silver to go south, or to help his need, though he had not brought him things of price. What hast thou more to show?"

"He asked me," answers Audun, "to become his henchman, and to give me great honor if I staid with him."

"That was well spoken," says the king; "but he must have repaid love with more still."

Audun said, "He gave me a big merchantman, full laden with the best of freight."

"That was a noble gift," says the king; "but I would have given thee as much; or did he give thee any more gifts?"

Audun answers, "He gave me, besides, a leathern bag full of silver, and said I would not then be penniless if I held fast to it, though my ship went to pieces off Iceland."

"That was indeed thought of," answers the king, "and then I would not have done. I should have thought much of the gift had it given thee ship and lading. Gave he ought besides?"

"Yes, lord, he did," says Audun: "he gave me this ring which I have on my arm, and said it might so happen that I lost all my goods and the ship too, and yet, he said, I should not be penniless if I still had the ring. He bade me also not to part with the ring unless I thought that I owed so much to some great man for his goodness that I ought to give it him; but now I have found that man, for it was in your palace, lord, to take my bear from me, and my life too, but you let me go in peace to Denmark when no one else could get thither."

The king took the ring blithely, and gave Audun good gifts in return before they parted. So Audun sailed to Iceland that very summer, and all thought him the luckiest of men.

AN EVENING AT A MILAN CAFE.

I GOT to Milan, through fat dark plains, starry with fire-flies, and through a night air heavier with frogs. As the diligence swept into Milan through clouds of powdery white dust, I caught, on my way to the hotel, moonlight glimpses of the great white marble cathedral, with its pinnacles fine as so much goldsmith work, stretching up toward heaven. . . .

And now, from the dark hush of the outer square, with its sky full of all violet depths of dimness, and spangled thick as the imperial robe of Charlemagne with jewel stars, I turned into the Caffe Galways double f in Italian) del Duomo, in the great square of the cathedral. The place was full of Austrian officers in their spoken white uniforms, faced and starred down with waxation blue and heavy color, their heavy steel-sheathed cavalry swords, tasseled and knotted with white pipeclayed leather, rested on chairs. Their spurs stood on the wall beside their cocked-hats, or chucked as they moved insolently along the white-and-black tiled floor of the café. It was a wonderful change from the darkness and almost mournful hush of the outer square, roofed by the black blue sky, where the white marble Duomo showed only by ghastly glimmers through the darkness.

I there myself on a long settee that lined the wall, within convenient reach of the little innocuous round marble table on which some empty coffee-cups stood, and fell to study the Milanese. I soon forgot the outer darkness, where the great white shrine of marble, pale and wan, heaped up in little dust-out casket pinnacles, fine-leaded and neat, onto the lingering stars, that seemed to turn like angels' watch-fires on their highest crossing peaks, and plunged myself, with the relish and abandonment of a traveler courting forgetfulness and pleasure, in the maze of crystaled lights that the great mirrors on the walls echoed and repeated till they seemed to lengthen into avenues and corridors of endless lamps, repeating, to the very darkness, and the plumed hats, and the fair Bavaran mustaches, and the white and rose-colored arms of fancy others, till the place seemed the bouquet-hall of the whole white-coated Austrian army; the waiters who moved about among the crowd standing for orderlies or aid-de-camps. Glimpses of side rooms showed groups of officers assembled round small ground-plans of black-and-white dominoes before them, and each with a small wine-glass and engraved pocket-tumbler at his elbow, and the low, and from other door-ways leading into inner rooms, I heard the roll and rattle of dice, the shuffle and rush of cards, and the green cloth, luminous in the shining lamplight.

It was some time before my pleased eye could take in the various elements of this animated scene; but, as my eye grew used to it, I found that its occupants of this café—like 'till the Milanese Cafés I had seen—could easily be divided into three sections: the Austrian officers, the waiters, and the landlord (the padrone) and his busy staff of waiters.

There—at a sort of idealized bar built up with ices, many coffee cups, trays for change, bottles, cake baskets, little receipt-books, and every clear tumblers of water, which the Italians drink to counteract the bilious effects of coffee—sat the landlord, playing ingerdesmain tricks with silver coins, handing in and dealing out copper change; and there were the waiters, with napkins on arm and bow, bringing in empty cups, or loading tray with smoking coffee, or with small wineglasses and cool Austrian capitain. The padrone looked like a male Fortune, distributing gifts and favors, as he tore another rolled, or a fresh pile of counters, or of clearly Chiavenna wine. The Milanese citizens there were not many, and they were, by flippant, unwary manner, and dark pale faces, richer effeminate in character. Each had his little party dog or sewing-poll, and was playing at cards, each his smoking fragrant coffee cup, tray of sugar, and tumbler of water. Among the Austrian officers, were excavating the strawberry ice's melting mine; some discoursed with frivolous enthusiasm about the long or the short sword, according to fancy of greeting or departing, courteously meant for the entire company, worked in and out the swinging door.

But in all the Austrians I saw one professional, unrestrainable feeling of defiant, cool, and successful hatred for their conquerors. They sat away from the officers' table, and, when with contemptuous defiance, which, though only conveyed by the eyes, was as insolent as if a sword-hilt had been touched, or a pistol cocked. They sat by seeing the old story—the old quarrel from the old wars—the injured Italian, the insulting Turk, the Chinaman, over again. Let a drunken man shout a word and blush in a moment—and he is sober. There was not a gesture or motion of either the black-coated Milanese or the white-clad Austrians that was significant of "fraternity." If the glass door opened and an itinerant blind guitarplayer came in, led by a poodle dog, he proved about each of the tables for alms—for "quelcosa, for" the little money, for "the very small money for sake of Heaven," and the Austrian waiting would go on in their knees of guard-room talk and not go to bed, as the old man's misery, and the young curled darling of the Vienna drawing-rooms might pull down his great trailing flaxen mustache and "answer a sou-markee." Potentates of Hester'—at the old gray head; or a fat general, jubbed and stiff with pride and Austrian wine, would let pantaloons steel sword, so that it flapped against the beggar and warned him off; and as often as this happened, when the poor man, counting his itinerary, reached the Milanese tables, he would be received with words of kindness and sympathy, and trays of change would be poured into his hat, with a kindly "God be with you!" If an Italian accidentally jostled an Austrian off his table, or clashed a spoon unseemingly loud, or took a paper too long, or a cup too quickly, or made any his itinerary, reached the Milanese tables, he would be received with words of kindness and sympathy, and trays of change would be poured into his hat, with a kindly "God be with you!" If an Italian accidentally jostled an Austrian off his table, or clashed a spoon unseemingly loud, or took a paper too long, or a cup too quickly, or made any other offense, he was instantly challenged to single combat, and the Austrian would go on in their knees of guard-room talk and not go to bed, as the old man's misery, and the young curled darling of the Vienna drawing-rooms might pull down his great trailing flaxen mustache and "answer a sou-markee." Potentates of Hester'—at the old gray head; or a fat general, jubbed and stiff with pride and Austrian wine, would let pantaloons steel sword, so that it flapped against the beggar and warned him off; and as often as this happened, when the poor man, counting

A ZOUAVE CHARGE ON THE BANK OF THE MINCIO.

A ZOUAVE CHARGE AT SOLFERINO.

THE accompanying engraving, which represents a charge of Zouaves upon the flank of an Austrian column, will enable our readers to realize the terrible scenes which are of daily occurrence during the present war in Italy.

It may not be inappropriate to give in this place the following extract from a letter of the Hon. H. J. Raymond, of this city, who was, by good fortune, an eye-witness of the great battle of Solferino. Mr. Raymond says:

"From about seven o'clock until after nightfall an incessant and most terrible combat was here kept up. The batteries of the two armies were apparently about half a mile apart—and at the outset they were both served with nearly equal and effective vigor. But the Austrians gradually slackened their fire and several times took up new positions, while the Sardinian pieces poured a rapid and uninterrupted shower of balls upon them, responding only for a few minutes at a time, and then renewing it again with redoubled fury. The wind had now gone down, the air was still, and the sound of musketry, as well as of the cannon, was distinctly heard. The former was continuous, sharp, and incessant, sounding like the constant and irregular pattering of hail upon a roof, while the latter was occasionally suspended, but while it lasted was overwhelmingly grand and terrific. Over the Sardinian park rose a dense white cloud of smoke, directly upward, its sides perfectly upright and well defined, and spreading outward both ways at the top like an enormous sheaf of wheat. The sun was making a glorious setting in the west, and as his light gradually departed, the vivid flashes at each discharge of the cannon gleamed through the smoke like sharp lightning through the breast of an enormous cloud. Sometimes only a single flash would be seen, then two or three at once, and sometimes half a dozen would break forth in instant succession. It was beginning to be dark when I turned to decend the hill, and all the way down I could hear the roar of the cannon.

"I am afraid to venture upon any conjecture as to the number of killed and wounded in this battle; but from the nature of the case it must be enormous. I am confident that not less than ten thousand wounded have been brought into this village above during the day, to my nothing of those that were left on the field or taken to other places. The first intimation we received of an engagement having taken place, was from meeting three or four carts, drawn by oxen, and filled with wounded, before we reached Montechiaro on the road from Peschiera. As we had heard of no battle, we naturally supposed that these wounded had been received in some skirmish. Soon after we met a one-horse carriage, in which was laid a full length an officer of rank, whose face wore so ghastly a look as to make it evident he was dying. On reaching Montechiaro, and stopping for a moment to rest our horses, we were told that a great battle was then going on in the plain before Castiglione. The main street was densely crowded with carts, carriages, horses, donkeys, oxen, soldiers, sutlers, and persons, and animals of every description. We pushed our way, without hinderance, directly past the house marked as the Quartier Général, or head-quarters of the Emperor, and was thus within the camp. We had gone but a short distance when we came to where the great procession of the wounded was turning down a cross street to a church which had been taken for a hospital. It was certainly the most dreadful sight I ever saw. Every conceivable kind of wound which can be inflicted upon men was here exhibited. All who were able to do so, were obliged to walk—the wagons and animals at command being all required for those who could not otherwise be moved. Some walked along, their faces completely covered with blood from sabre cuts upon their heads. Many had their arms shattered—hundreds had their hands tied up, and some carried most ghastly wounds upon their feet. Some had tied up their wounds, and others had stripped away the clothing which chafed and made them worse. I saw one man walking along with a firm step and a resolute air, naked to his waist, and having a bullet round upon his side, an ugly gash along his cheek, and a deep bayonet-thrust, received from behind, in his shoulder."

THE NEW AUSTRIAN COMMANDER, MARSHAL SCHLICK.

WE present herewith a portrait of the new commander of the first (but second Austrian) armies in Italy, Marshal Count Schlick.

A Bohemian by birth, Marshal Schlick comes of a family distinguished both by rank and by wealth. Several generations since, the house of Schlick was enriched by the discovery of gold mines on their estates in Bohemia; the riches thus acquired, added to their high rank, enabled them to wield great political influence. For several generations the heads of the house have been soldiers. Marshal Schlick's father and grandfather were both field-marshals.

The present Count was born in 1789 at Prague, and is, consequently, in his seventieth year. He joined the army in 1808, and served in all the Austrian wars against the French, until the battle of Wallan, at which he was wounded in the head. The wound cost him one of his eyes, and for the time obliged him to withdraw from the army. He still hides the scar with a black silk handkerchief as shown in our portrait.

During the long peace which succeeded, Count Schlick served as colonel of hussars, until, on receiving the title of field-marshal lieutenant, he was allowed to retire from the army. He then began to figure as a politician, and occupied a conspicuous place among the liberals who were opposed to the régime of Metternich and the Archduchess Sophia. This won him no little disfavor at Court.

His military fame stood so high, however, that when, in 1848, the Austrian empire appeared to be breaking to pieces, he was solicited to take the command of an army against Hungary. He obeyed, and in the battles of Torre, Kaschau, and Szouta, defeated the insurgents with great slaughter. He subsequently, by a very brilliant manœuvre, extricated himself from a trap which had been laid for him by Gorgey and Klapka, and succeeded in rejoining the main army of Austria.

This was in 1849. Ever since then Schlick has ceased to figure in Austrian history. It is said that his liberal sentiments were so offensive to the Court that care was taken to place him where he could do no mischief and win no glory. When the present war broke out, he was assigned to the army of Galicia, and, notwithstanding the loudly expressed desire of the army in his favor, the chief command in Italy was given to the Hungarian General Gyulai.

It was not till after the disastrous defeat at Magenta that the Emperor of Austria recognized his error, and relieved Gyulai of his command. Then, but not till then, was Schlick sent for. A telegraphic message summoned him to the post vacated by Gyulai. It would appear, however, that he is still not invested with supreme command. At the battle of Solferino, the Emperor Francis-Joseph commanded in person; and now that we hear of the Emperor returning to Vienna, old Marshal Hess seems to possess some sort of general control. The Austrians, it seems, have not yet learned the evils of a divided command.

In person, General Schlick will compare favorably with his predecessor. His figure is tall and imposing; his face is said to be very handsome, notwithstanding the scar and the black silk bandage. As a soldier, the Austrians say that he is the only man they have who is fit to wear the mantle of Radetzky.

CHAPTER XII.

THE FELLOW OF DELICACY.

MR. STRYVER having made up his mind to that magnanimous bestowal of good fortune on the Doctor's daughter, resolved to make her happiness known to her before he left town for the Long Vacation. After some mental debating of the point, he came to the conclusion that it would be as well to get all the preliminaries done with, and they could then arrange at their leisure whether he should give her his hand a week or two before Michaelmas Term, or in the little Christmas vacation between it and Hilary.

As to the strength of his case he had not a doubt about it, but clearly saw his way to the verdict. Argued with the jury on substantial worldly grounds—the only grounds ever worth taking into account—it was a plain case, and had not a weak spot in it. He called himself retained for the plaintiff, there was no getting over his evidence, the counsel for the defendant threw up his brief, and the jury did not even turn to consider. After trying it, Stryver C. J. was satisfied that no pliaintiff case could be.

Accordingly, Mr. Stryver inaugurated the Long Vacation with a formal proposal to take Miss Manette to Vauxhall Gardens; that failing, to Ranelagh; that unaccountably failing too, it behoved him to present himself in Soho, and there declare his noble mind.

Toward Soho, therefore, Mr. Stryver shouldered his way from the Temple, while the bloom of the Long Vacation's infancy was still upon it. Any body who had seen him projecting himself into Soho while he was yet on Saint Dunstan's side of Temple Bar, bursting in his full-blown way along the pavement, to the jostlement of all weaker people, might have seen how safe and strong he was.

His way taking him past Tellson's, and he both banking at Tellson's and knowing Mr. Lorry as the intimate friend of the Manette family, entered Mr. Stryver's mind to enter the bank, and reveal to Mr. Lorry the brightness of the Soho horizon. So he pushed open the door with the weak rattle in its throat, stumbled down the two steps, got past the two amazed cashiers, and shouldered himself into the musty back closet where Mr. Lorry sat at great book ruled for figures, with perpendicular iron bars to his window as if that were ruled for figures too, and every thing under the clouds were a sum.

"Halloa!" said Mr. Stryver. "How do you do? I hope you are well!"

It was Stryver's grand peculiarity that he always seemed too big for any place or space. He was so much too big for Tellson's that old clerks in distant corners looked up with looks of remonstrance, as though he squeezed them against the wall. The House itself, magnificently reading its paper quite in the full-day perspective, lowered displeased, as if the Stryver head had been butted into its responsible waist cost.

The discreet Mr. Lorry said, in a sample tone of the voice he would recommend under the circumstances, "How do you do, Mr. Stryver? How do you do, Sir?" and shook hands. There was a constancy in his manner of shaking hands, always to be seen in any clerk at Tellson's who stands with a customer who has the House pervaded the air. He shook in a self-abnegating way, as one who shook for Tellson & Co.

"Can I do any thing for you, Mr. Stryver?" asked Mr. Lorry, in his business character.

"Why, no thank you; this is a private visit to yourself, Mr. Lorry; I have come for a private word."

"Oh indeed!" said Mr. Lorry, bending down his ear, while his eye strayed to the House after me off.

"I am going," said Mr. Stryver, leaning his arms confidentially on the desk: whereupon, although it was a large double one, there appeared to be not half desk enough for him: "I am going to make an offer of myself in marriage to your agreeable little friend Miss Manette, Mr. Lorry."

"Oh dear me!" cried Mr. Lorry, rubbing his chin, and looking at his visitor dubiously.

"Oh dear me, Sir?" repeated Stryver, drawing back. "Oh dear you, Sir? What may your meaning be, Mr. Lorry?"

"My meaning," answered the man of business, "is, of course, friendly and appreciative, and that it rises you the greatest credit, and—in short, my meaning is every thing you could desire. But—really, you know, Mr. Stryver—" Mr. Lorry paused, and shook his head at him in the oddest manner, as if he were compelled against his will to add, internally, "you know there really is so much, too much of you!"

"Well!" said Stryver, slapping the desk with his contentious hand, opening his eyes wider, and taking a long breath, "if I understand you, Mr. Lorry, I'll be hanged!"

Mr. Lorry adjusted his little wig at both ears as a means toward that end, and bit the feather of a pen.

"D—n it all, Sir!" said Stryver, staring at him, "am I not eligible?"

"Oh dear yes! Yes. Oh yes, you're eligible!" said Mr. Lorry. "If you say eligible, you are eligible."

"Am I not prosperous?" asked Stryver.

"Oh! if you come to prosperous, you are prosperous," said Mr. Lorry.

"And advancing?"

"If you come to advancing, you know," said Mr. Lorry, delighted to be able to make another admission, "nobody can doubt that."

"Then what on earth is your meaning, Mr. Lorry?" demanded Stryver, perceptibly crestfallen.

"Well! I— Were you going there now?" asked Mr. Lorry.

"Straight!" said Stryver, with a plump of his fist on the desk.

"Then I think I wouldn't, if I was you."

"Why?" said Stryver. "Now, I'll put you in a corner," forensically shaking a forefinger —which I hope I do not—whose taste was so magnificent, and whose temper was so overbearing, that he could not restrain himself from speaking disrespectfully of that young lady at this desk, not even Tellson's should prevent my giving him a piece of my mind."

The necessity of being angry in a suppressed tone had put Mr. Stryver's blood-vessels into a dangerous state when it was his turn to be angry: Mr. Lorry's veins, mutholicial as their courses could usually be, were in no better state now in his turn.

"That is what I mean to tell you, Sir," said Mr. Lorry. "Pray let there be no mistake about it."

Mr. Stryver sucked the end of a ruler for a little while, and then stood hitting a tune out of his teeth with it, which probably gave him the toothache. He broke the awkward silence by saying,

"This is something new to me, Mr. Lorry. You intimate that you advise me not to go to Soho and offer myself—myself, Stryver, of the King's Bench bar?"

"Do you ask me for my advice, Mr. Stryver?"

"Yes, I do."

"Very good. Then I give it, and you have repeated it correctly."

"And all I can say of it is," laughed Stryver, with a vexed laugh, "that this—ha, ha!—beats every thing, past, present, and to come."

"Now understand me," pursued Mr. Lorry. "As a man of business I am not justified in saying any thing about this matter, for, as a man of business, I know nothing of it. But as an old fellow who has carried Miss Manette in his arms, who is the trusted friend of Miss Manette and of her father too, and who has a great affection for them both, I have spoken. The confidence is not of my seeking, recollect. Now you think I may not be right?"

"Not I!" said Stryver, whistling. "I can't undertake to find third parties in common sense; I can only find it for myself. I suppose sense in certain quarters; you suppose nonsense in certain quarters. At new to me; but you are right, I dare say."

"What I suppose, Mr. Stryver, I claim to

"D—N IT ALL, SIR! AM I NOT ELIGIBLE?"

at him. "You are a man of business and bound to have a reason. State your reason. Why wouldn't you go?"

"Because," said Mr. Lorry, "I wouldn't go on such an object without having some cause to believe that I should succeed."

"D—n me!" cried Stryver, "but this beats every thing!"

Mr. Lorry glanced at the distant House, and glanced at the angry Stryver.

"Here's a man of business—a man of years—a man of experience—in a Bank," said Stryver; "and having summed up three leading reasons for complete success, he says there's no reason at all! Says it with his head on!" Mr. Stryver remarked upon the peculiarity as if it would have been infinitely less remarkable if he had said it with his head off.

"When I speak of success, I speak of success with the young lady; and when I speak of success and reasons to make success probable, I speak of causes and reasons that will tell as such with the young lady. The young lady, my good Sir," and Mr. Lorry, mildly tapping the Stryver arm, "the young lady. The young lady goes before all."

"Then you mean to tell me, Mr. Lorry," said Stryver, squaring his elbows, "that it is your deliberate opinion that the young lady at present in question is a mincing Fool?"

"Not exactly so. I mean to tell you, Mr. Stryver," said Mr. Lorry, reddening, "that I will hear no disrespectful word of that young lady from my lips; and that if I knew any man characterize for myself. And understand me, Sir," said Mr. Lorry, quickly flushing again, "I will not—not even at Tellson's—have it characterized for me by any gentleman breathing."

"There! I beg your pardon!" said Stryver.

"Granted. Thank you. Well, Mr. Stryver, I was about to say: it might be painful to you to find yourself mistaken; it might be painful to Doctor Manette to have the task of being explicit with you; it might be very painful to Miss Manette to have the task of being explicit with you. You know the terms upon which I have the honor and happiness to stand with the family. If you please, committing you in no way, representing you in no way, I will undertake to correct my advice by the exercise of a little new observation and judgment expressly brought to bear upon it. If you should then be dissatisfied with it, you can use it or not, as you please for yourself; if, on the other hand, you should be satisfied with it, and it should be what it now is, it may spare all sides what is best spared. What do you say?"

"How long would you keep me in town?"

"Oh! it is only a question of a few hours. I could go to Soho this evening, and come to your chambers afterward."

"Then I say yes," said Stryver: "I won't go up there now; I am not so hot upon it as that comes to. I say yes; and I shall expect you to look in to-night. Good-morning."

Then Mr. Stryver turned and burst out of the Bank, causing such a concussion of air on his passage through, that to stand up against it leaving behind him two country, required the utmost remaining strength of the two ancient clerks. Those venerable and feeble persons were always seen by the public in the act of bowing, and were popularly believed, when they had bowed a customer out, still to keep on bowing in the empty office until they bowed another customer in.

The barrister was keen enough to divine that the banker would not have gone so far in his expression of opinion on any less solid ground than moral certainty. Unprepared as he was for the large pill he had to swallow, he put it down. "Ah, now," said Mr. Stryver, shaking his forensic forefinger at the Temple in general, which was then, "my way out of this is to put you all in the wrong."

It was a bit of the art of an Old Bailey tactician, in which he found great relief. "You shall not put me in the wrong, young lady," said Mr. Stryver, "if I do that for you."

Accordingly, when Mr. Lorry called that night as late as one o'clock, Mr. Stryver, with a quantity of books and papers littered out for the purpose, seemed to have nothing less on his mind than the subject of the morning. He even showed surprise when he saw Mr. Lorry, and was altogether in an absent and preoccupied state.

"Well!" said that good-natured emissary, after a little hesitation, bringing messages to bring him round to the question, "I have been to Soho."

"To Soho?" repeated Mr. Stryver, coldly. "Oh, to be sure! What am I thinking of?"

"I shall have no doubt," said Mr. Lorry, "that I was right in the conversation we had. My opinion is confirmed, and I reiterate my advice."

"I assure you," returned Mr. Stryver, in the friendliest way, "that I am sorry for it on your account, and sorry for it on the poor father's account, too. I know this must always be a sore subject with the family; let us say no more about it."

"I don't understand you," said Mr. Lorry.

"I dare say not," rejoined Stryver, nodding his head in a smoothing and final way; "no matter, no matter."

"But it does matter," Mr. Lorry urged.

"No it doesn't, I assure you it does not. Having supposed that there was sense where there is no sense, to back a laudable sentiment with a not laudable ambition, I am well out of my mistake, and no harm is done. Young women have committed similar follies often before, and have repented them in poverty and obscurity often before. In short, my dear friend, to be plain with you, the thing has dropped, because it would have been a good thing for others in a worldly point of view; a selfish aspect, I am glad that the thing has dropped, because it would have been a bad thing for me in a worldly point of view—it is hardly necessary to say I could have gained nothing by it. There is no harm at all done. You are free, projected to the last moment, and between ourselves, I am by no means certain, on reflection, that I ever shall not have committed myself to that extent. Mr. Lorry, you can not control the motions of a free young fellow's mind (we are not commanded to do it), or if you I regret it on account of others, but I am satisfied on my own account. And I am really very much obliged to you for allowing me to sound you, and for giving me your advice; you know the young lady better than I do; you were right, it never would have done."

Mr. Lorry was so taken aback that he looked quite stupidly at Mr. Stryver shouldering him toward the door, with an appearance of showering generosity, forbearance, and good-will on his erring head. "Make the best of it, my dear Sir," said Stryver; "say no more about it; thank you again for allowing me to sound you last night!"

Mr. Lorry was out in the night before he knew where he was. Mr. Stryver was lying back on his sofa, winking at his ceiling.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE FELLOW OF NO DELICACY.

If Sydney Carton ever shone any where he certainly never shone in the house of Doctor Manette. He had been there often, during a whole year, and had always been the same moody and morose lounger there. When he cared to talk he talked well; but he rarely cared for anything, which overshadowed him with gloom, and his darkness was very rarely pierced by the light within him.

And yet he did care something for the streets that environed that house, and for the senseless stones that made their pavements. Many a night he repaired to them to pace them for hours, when wine had brought no transitory gladness to him; many a dreary daybreak revealed his solitary figure lingering there, and still lingering there when the first beams of the sun, brought into strong relief, removed beauties of architecture in spires of churches and lofty buildings, as perhaps that quiet time brought other things. Of late, the inner life of this solitary man had been stirred, and pained more sensibly than ever; and often, when he had thrown himself upon it no longer than a few minutes, he had got up again, and haunted that neighborhood.

On a day in August, when Mr. Stryver (after notifying to his jackal that "he had thought better of that marrying matter") had carried his delicacy into Devonshire, and when the sight and scent of flowers in the City streets had some waifs of goodness in them for the worn, of health for the sick-bed, and of youth for the oldest, Sydney Carton, wandering idly and sadly, but being irresolute and purposeless, his feet became animated by an intention; and in the working out of that intention they took him to the Doctor's door.

He was shown up stairs, and found Lucie at her work, alone. She had never been quite at her ease with him, and received him with some little embarrassment as he seated himself near her table. But looking up at his face in the interval before she first free herself-possession, she observed a change in it.

"I fear you are not well, Mr. Carton!"

"No. But the life I lead, Miss Manette, is not conducive to health. What is to be expected of, or by, such profligates?"

"Is it not—forgive me; I have begun the question on my lips—a pity to see no better life?"

"God knows it is a shame!"

"Then why not change it?"

Looking gloomily at her again, she was surprised and saddened to see that there were tears in his eyes. There were tears in his voice too, as he answered:

"It is too late for that. I shall never be better than I am. I shall sink lower and lower, worse."

He leaned an elbow on her table, and covered his eyes with his hand. The table trembled in the silence that followed.

She laid her work down softened, and was much distressed. He knew her to be so without looking at her, and said:

"Pray forgive me, Miss Manette. I break down before the knowledge of what I want to say to you. Will you hear me?"

"If it will do you any good. Mr. Carton, if it would make you happier, it would make me very glad!"

"God bless you for your sweet compassion!" He unshaded his face after a little while, and spoke steadily.

"Don't be afraid to hear me. Don't shrink from any thing I say. I am like one who died young. All my life might have been."

"No, Mr. Carton. I am sure that the best part of it might still be; I am sure that you have a heart capable of better things, gentle things, and good things."

"Say of you, Miss Manette; and although I know better—although in the mystery of my own wretched heart I know better—I shall not forget it!"

She was pale and trembling. He came to her relief with a fixed despair of himself which made the interview unlike any other that could have been holden.

"If it had been possible, Miss Manette, that you could have known me in the past, that you could see before you—self-flung away, wasted, drunken, poor creature of misuse as you know him to be—he would have been conscious this day or this hour, in spite of his happiness, that he would bring to you nothing but the worthless fragments, the heap of ruin, which is all that remains of him. Since that can never be, since you never can know what might have been, since you never can be to me what the dearest thing in my life would have made you, what you were on the forlorn beach, you see me as I am, and you will readily believe that no thought of making love to you has been in my mind. Firmly believing that, you can bear with me."

"I do bear with you, and I do believe that what you say of yourself is true. I am sorry for you. I wish very much that you were more hopeful."

"Hopeful!" he echoed; "I have no hope, and I deserve none. One thing more I will say, and then I will detain you no longer. I am the reverse of what you first knew me, I know myself to be so, and I am glad of it. Let me carry back the memory that you have given me, unmixed with worse, and it will be a kind of consolation to me. Let me see you sometimes. What you have said to me recalls to me that in the mist and misery of my life, I did truly love the beauty that was in you. Not love it enough, or with enough control of myself, to act upon it in the only way that could have been serviceable to it; but love it truly. So truly, that if you were to marry a good man, and if his life were imperilled, and you knew that your life would purchase his safety, I could honestly lay down mine for him and hold it cheap."

As he stopped for a few moments, unable to go on, she gently said, "Will you not take some assurance that you have touched my heart?"

"Can I take assurance that I have touched it? Can I not recall to-day—forgive me again!—to a better course? Can I in no way repay your confidence? I know that is a thing impossible, I impulsively said, after a little hesitation, and in earnest tears. "I know you can not, and that no one else. Can I turn it to good account for yourself, Mr. Carton?"

He shook his head.

"To none. No, Miss Manette, to none. If you will hear me through a very little more, and you can ever do for me is done. I wish you to know that you have been the last dream of my soul. In my degradation I have not been so degraded but that the sight of you with your children and husband has stirred old shadows in me which have been roused by no other hand. If it be a consolation to you to know that such as I can look upon what you are, and can see the drudging life you lead, and can hear the cheerful tones you use, and see the bright heads you have trained to be fit companions for their parents, without the sacrifice of a vestige of self-respect, you have it. If it be any thing to you to know that such as I, without a grain of self-respect remaining, can yet put my head down on my pillow after seeing you and your husband and child in your home, and can thank God for it as a sacred thing, you have it. If it be any thing to you to know that the man you see before you, self-flung away, wasted, drunken, poor creature of misuse as you know him to be—he would have kept the life you have restored to him, in case of your husband's death, or your child's, and would have thrown it away with as much alacrity as he has thrown away his own, you have it. If it be any thing to you to know that sometimes, in the mist and misery of my life, even my own wretched heart has been softened by the tears that I have seen you shed for others, you have it. Since I recalled you to-day by your name, I have never called myself by mine. I never shall do it more. Be satisfied that the last prayer of my life will be for the happiness of you and yours. Will you let me shake hands with you for the last time?"

She had withheld her hand, but she held it out. He touched it, and said, "A life you love."

"Will you take nothing back?"

"Nothing."

He bent over it, touched it with his lips, and went out without another word.

When the door had closed upon him, she laid her hand where his had been, and thought how strange it was that the first friendly touch it had known, since it had been a child's, should have been his.

He had heard her say that she was going out with her husband that night, and he knew where they were going, and that their return would be late. He did not present himself in the street, but he took his post over against the house, and waited and watched in its shadow.

New Freezing Process for Men and Wine.

BY HENRY L. BALLEH.

Oh! summer is upon us,
With her noons and her freezes;
The weeds are full of mockery,
The haze are in their leaves;
The mill cream hoards in the shore,
The sea is calmer than before,
And all the summer of Jim Jim
Prepare for sudden flight.

To Newly and Saratoga,
To Sally and Nahant,
To caucus and to Lebanon,
Your shivering swede invade;
They'll go for cooling applejack,
For purer air and skies,
And the wretch compelled to pant at home,
With every valley sighs!

But mark you all the FATHERS,
And mark you all the SONS,
Ere they pack their rods and fishing-gear,
Their tackle and their guns—
Oh! almost every MAN and BOY
Who ought of comfort wants,
Will visit SMITH, in FULTON STREET,
And not continue on
For those gummed up with acidulent
That can't serve wine.
The genial, clear-eyed, cheerful
Imperial ever brew;
The suits, we mean, solid SEVEN SORTS,
Which are so cool and nice,
That if you wrap them round a flask,
THE WINE WILL NEED NO ICE.

Charles Grobe's New Method
FOR THE PIANO FORTE.

Mr. Grobe is so well known, that any remarks as to his qualifications would be superfluous. Suffice it to say that he has been employed in the Method work for nineteen years, and is now conversant in all that is recently the Best for the People, and as the result of the Best Experience of the Leading Masters of Europe and the People. Nothing is anticipated, nothing buried. The pupil is led by easy degrees, natural and gradual means to the desired end. The Hymens so often complained of in works of instruction is altogether avoided, and the Melodies believe it to be the most simple, clear, progressive, and judicious system of instruction yet given. The work contains ten engraved figures, illustrating the different positions of the hands and fingers. The type is new and unusually beautiful and distinct. The paper is of the finest quality. Price, in boards, complete, $2 00 (a bargain). Sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of the marked price. The trade supplied. A handsome discount to Teachers and the Profession.

THE Dred Scott Decision.

OPINION OF CHIEF-JUSTICE
ROGER B. TANEY,
WITH AN INTRODUCTION
BY DR. I. N. VAN PEVE.

ALSO,
AN APPENDIX,
BY SAM. A. CARTWRIGHT, M.D., of New Orleans,
REVISED,
"Natural History of the Prognathous Race of Mankind."

ORIGINALLY WRITTEN FOR THE NEW YORK DAY-BOOK.

THE GREAT WAR CRY OF A RIPE PAMPHLET, containing the famous decision of Chief-Justice Taney, in the celebrated Dred Scott Case, has induced the Publishers of the Day-Book to present this edition to the public. It contains a Historical Introduction by Dr. Van Evrie, author of "Negroes and Negro Slavery," and an Appendix by Dr. Cartwright, of New Orleans, in which the physical differences between the negro and the white races are forcibly presented. As a whole, this pamphlet gives the historical, legal, and physical aspects of the "Slavery" Question in a concise compass, and should be circulated by thousands before the next presidential election. All who desire to answer the arguments of the abolitionists should read it. In order to place it before the masses, and induce Democratic Clubs, Democratic Town Committees, and all interested in the cause, to order it for distribution, it has been put on sale at the following low rates, for which it will be sent, free of postage, to any part of the United States. Dealers supplied at the same rate.

FEMALE PHILANTHROPIST FROM NEW YORK. "My dear MR. BULL, I'm so glad I've found you. Here's a little Subscription-List for a suffering Church in New York—a very miserable Church, Mr. Bull,—all of white marble—situate in a wretched locality—west side of Union Square—dreadfully distressed on the NIGGER Question, good MR. BULL, with which, in reality, it has nothing to do, but then, you know, there's humanity to consider—and the Congregation are really very badly off, indeed—quite a number of them, I assure you, haven't over twenty thousand a year: so, my good, generous, MR. BULL, put your name down for a trifle for the sake of the distressed pastor (who really lives in a love of a parsonage) and the poor NIGGERS."

JOHN BULL. "What! NIGGERS again! Good gracious, Madam! am I never to get clear of NIGGERS? Here are my NIGGERS in India, who are eternally rebelling; and my emancipated NIGGERS in the West Indies, who are costing me thousands of pounds to enable them to enjoy the blessings of freedom; and my NIGGERS in South Africa who make war upon me year after year to prevent me civilizing them; and my CUBA NIGGERS, who not only cost me something enormous, but get me shamefully abused in Exeter Hall; and now you actually come across the sea to pester me about your American NIGGERS. Upon my word, madam, I think I shall go mad on NIGGERS—and that you (excuse me for saying it) are mad already!" [See Report of the last Mission to England in search of and for Dr. Cheever's Church, in Herald of July 8, 1859.]

MRS. TONGS. "LOR, Adolphus! how beautiful those Beans smell!"
ADOLPHUS (probably in the Hair-cutting line). "They do indeed, my Love! They remind one of the most delicious Hair Oil!"

HEALTH OF AMERICAN WOMEN.

Under this head the Graefenberg Company, of No. 32 Park Row, New York, have published a series of articles upon the diseases peculiarly affecting women, and which are met with in nine tenths of all women in the country; upon Consumption, the great scourge of the American Continent; and upon all the diseases incident to this country and climate.

In these articles the Graefenberg Company have proved their eminent position as a Chartered Medical Institution, and have based their claim to confidence upon the fact that they have studied the laws of nature, rather than the laws of Galen and Hippocrates, and have applied common sense principles to the plainly-received necessities exhibited by symptoms of local or general derangement.

The proof of their successful treatment is found in testimony from leading physicians of all schools, from public and private individuals who have tested the remedies, from clergymen who have witnessed their immense value upon the health of their churches, and from notices given in the leading journals of the day.

[From the New York Tribune.]

The Graefenberg Family Remedies are most valuable. In the universal and distressing diseases of women, their effects are quick, judicious, and surely effective.

[From the New York Times.]

The Graefenberg Company have refitted their rooms, so that every accommodation is afforded those who desire the personal advice of the consulting physician. All invalids, and strangers visiting the city, who require professional advice, had better call upon Mrs. Dr. Bridge is a regular physician, of rare attainments, and of great judgment and discrimination in the treatment of disease. THE GRAEFENBERG MARSHALL'S UTERINE CATHOLICON

Is offered as a certain cure in cases accompanied with any of the following symptoms:

Irregularities—Weakness—Faintness—
Deranged Appetite—Sallow Complexion—
Pain in the Back and Kidneys—Chills—
Cold Hands and Feet—Headaches—Drowsiness—
Neuralgia—Palpitation of the Heart—
Dizziness—Nervousness—Hysterics—Restlessness—
Disturbed Sleep—Flushes of Heat—General Pain—Crawling Pains in the Limbs—Pain between the Shoulders—
Acid Stomach—Nausea—Indigestion—
Difficult Passing of Urine with Heat or Smarting—Itching—Burning—Scanty Urine—Diabetes—Urethra Organs—Nightsweats—Decpair—Hysterics—Anxiety—
Red face—Nervous Twitchings—Starting—Constipation—Irritability—Fretfulness—Despondency—Apoplexy—
Flatulences—Blotted and Irregular Breths—
Unpleasant Dreams—Weakness of the Digestive Organs—
Numbness and Pains in the Limbs—
Loss of Memory—Bewilderment—Soreness in the Feet—Pain in the Back.

All acquaintance in young girls, and the cough and decline so enormously attending them, in the young, are related genitally and sterily by the Catholicon.

In this connection Miss Beecher, sister of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, in "Letters to the People," page 139, says: "I have nine sisters and sixteen children, and fourteen female cousins, all married, and all delicate and ailing. Amid the immense circle of my friends and acquaintance I can not recall ten married ladies, born in this country and country, who are perfectly healthy." In cases, however, where the Graefenberg Catholicon has been used, we must say that health has rapidly taken the place of disease, and ladies have become robust, strong, vigorous, and healthy.

OUR SERIALS.

WE commenced in the last Number a new serial tale, entitled "A Good Fight," by CHARLES READE, author of "Love me Little, Love me Long;" with Illustrations by Tenniel.

In reply to several inquiries, we beg to say that Mr. DICKENS's new serial, "A TALE OF TWO CITIES," was commenced in HARPER'S WEEKLY on May 7, and Mr. CURTIS's delicious Story of American Society, entitled "TRUMPS," on April 9. We can send the back numbers from those dates, or from the beginning of the year, to any person who remits the money.

PRINCE METTERNICH.

WE mentioned in a recent number the death of the famous Prince Metternich. We are now enabled to lay before our readers an authentic portrait of that celebrated man, together with a few details of his life.

He was born at Coblentz, May 15, 1773, and was consequently eighty-six years of age at the time of his death. He was born noble, handsome, intelligent; a thorough course of studies at the University of Strasburg developed his mind; association with a refined aristocracy polished his manners. At the age of seventeen he was selected to be master of ceremonies—an office requiring nothing beyond a showy person and a courtly carriage—at the coronation of the Emperor Leopold the Second. Thus brought into proximity with courts, his vocation declared itself. After a term of law study he was formally enrolled in the Austrian diplomatic body, and became, at twenty-one years of age, Austrian Ambassador at the Hague. Such opportunities might well presage a brilliant career.

At the age of twenty-three he was selected by the ancient and haughty nobles of Westphalia to represent them at the Congress of Rastadt. Here first, it is said, he gave evidence of possessing more than good looks and good breeding; he developed such diplomatic ability that his Government soon afterward transferred him from the Hague to Dresden, and from Dresden to Berlin. It was at Berlin that he began to take a lead in Continental politics. Napoleon was again preparing to convulse Europe. Metternich proposed, and in spite of the opposition of rival ministers succeeded in consummating a league between Prussia, Austria, and Russia. This placed him at the first rank of diplomatists; and when, in 1806, Austria needed a Minister at Paris whom Napoleon could neither frighten nor cajole, Metternich was selected.

"You are very young," said the Emperor, on seeing the Minister of thirty-two, "to represent so old an empire as Austria."

"Not younger than your Majesty was at Austerlitz," was the courtly reply.

The Emperor soon found him old enough.

The Treaty of Fontainebleau showed no evidence of inexperience; and the Prince's success in French society was unbounded. He was gifted with extraordinary conversational powers, great fascinations of manner, and an exceedingly sweet smile. Among women he was irresistible at an age when few men preserve any pretensions to the favor of the sex. Austrian as he was, and vigorously as he opposed Napoleon, the ladies, and many of the men, of the gay French capital had nothing to refuse him. Napoleon himself, as he said, had "a sort of liking for him." It was during this embassy, in all probability, that he had the interview with Napoleon which he described, forty years afterward, to M. Veuillot, of the Univers. The account is in Metternich's own words:

"I had a conversation with Napoleon one day when the Pope was at Savoana, a prisoner of France. Napoleon was not wanting in certain affections for me, and he knew that the Pope honored me with some confidence. He called me one day, and said to me, 'Do me a service. I am tired of the captivity of the Pope. It is a situation from which nothing good can arise, and it is necessary that it should not be prolonged. I wish you to go to Savona. The Pope grants you his friendship: you will speak to him on my behalf, as a common friend; and you will induce him to accept a plan which I have arranged to settle that unfortunate affair.'

"I observed that the authority of the Emperor would be necessary for me. 'Do you refuse me that,' he replied. 'It seems to me that you will be in no way concerned in employing your efforts for the peace of the world.' 'It is this,' I continued, smiling, 'I doubt if that is really peace which your Majesty proposes to the Pope. Will you make your plan known to me?' 'Here it is,' said Napoleon, in a very tranquil manner. 'In future the See of the Church would not be any more at Rome, but at Paris.'

"I could not restrain a movement of surprise and a smile of incredulity.

"'Yes,' replied that formidable man, 'I will bring the Pope to Paris, and I will establish the See of the Church there. But I wish that the sovereign pontiff should be independent. I will give him a comfortable establishment near the capital. I will give him a chateau; and in order that he might be in his own house, I will make the territory for some leagues around his palace neutral ground. He will there have his college of cardinals, his corps diplomatique, his congregations, his court; and, as this he should want for nothing, I will guarantee him an annual endowment of six millions. Do you think he will refuse that?'

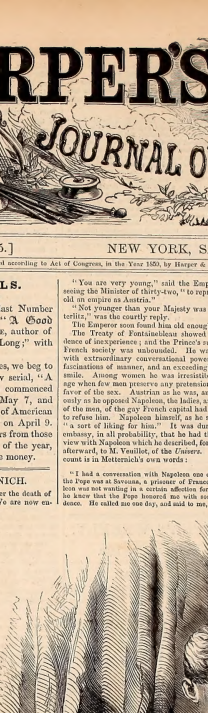
"'I am sure he would, and all Europe would support him in his refusal. The Pope would feel, not without reason, that he would be as much a prisoner with your six millions as he is at Savona.'

"Napoleon declaimed very loudly, sounded in argument, and alleged a thousand amusing reasons. At last I said to him, 'Your Majesty has drawn a secret from me. The Emperor of Austria has had the same idea on yourself. He says that you do not wish to send back the Pope to Rome; he does not wish the Pope to remain in prison; and he also thinks, notwithstanding, of making provision for him. Your Majesty knows the royal chateau of Schoenbrunn. The Emperor will give it to the Pope, with a territory of ten or fifteen leagues, entirely neutral, and he will add an allowance of twelve millions of revenue. If the Pope accepts that arrangement, would you consent?'

"He perfectly understood the apologue, but he was the stronger, and he wished to have the opinion of Pius VII. on his plan. The sovereign pontiff replied, as I had so easily foreseen, that Savona appeared to him as good a prison as Paris; that he was there, moreover, in the centre of the Church; that his residence was his free territory; that six millions a year were not necessary for his wants, and that twenty sous a day, which he would thankfully receive in voluntary alms from Christians, were sufficient for him."

After a couple of years' stay at Paris he was recalled to Vienna to take the post of Minister of Foreign Affairs. He was only thirty-six years of age. He signalized his assumption of office by a remodel of the war against France—it must be admitted, with very poor success. As the Chartreux says, the French have always been in the habit of beating the Austrians, and it is a difficult matter to get rid of old habits. In the war of 1809 the Austrians were most thoroughly beaten in battle after battle, their capital was taken, their army destroyed, their empire dismembered, and the Emperor forced to accept a humiliating peace. A poor commencement for Metternich's administration! He contrived, however, when all was lost, to make the best of the situation, and gladly embraced Napoleon's offer of a matrimonial alliance between his House and the Hapsburgs. It was Metternich himself who conducted Marie-Louise to Paris.

It seems, from the writings of those who knew his sentiments, that he had hopes of reducing Napoleon to terms Austria as the equal of France. He was soon disappointed. In 1812 the Austrian army was forced to join the French in the disastrous campaign against Russia. Metternich's wrath at the result knew no bounds. All that winter (1812-'13) he devoted his energies to creating and fomenting a fierce anti-Gallic spirit among the Germans; by the spring it was ready to explode. Metternich played his game with consummate dexterity. The war began in March; Russia and Prussia were in the field in May; in June some of the smaller German States joined them; but it was not till the 27th July, when Napoleon's army had been much weakened, that Austria joined the coalition at Teplitz. Napoleon was now ready for terms, and an armistice to 10th August was agreed upon; the time was wasted in negotiations; at 1 A.M.



THE LATE PRINCE METTERNICH.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.]

on His Metternich declared war, and presented it with vigor until the battle of Leipsic, which destroyed the French power in Germany.

It was just previous to the Austrian intervention—in the month of June, 1813—that Napoleon had a conversation with Metternich, which has been recorded. The Emperor complimented the Austrian in the highest manner, and then went on to ask him if, in obedience to his policy, he was to evacuate Europe, half of which he then held with his victorious legions, and to place himself at the mercy of those of whom he was victorious in Europe? It was while his standards still floated at the mouths of the Vistula and on the banks of the Ebro; when his victorious army was at the gates of Berlin and Breslau, and he in person at the head of three hundred thousand men, that Napoleon, with disdain, put to pride without striking a blow. "And it is my friend-in-law," said he, turning to the minister, "that has matured such a project; it is he that sends you on such a mission. Is what position would be for me in your view? Is it that of people? Does he suppose that a ill-honored and humiliated throne is a refuge for his daughter and grandson? Ah! Metternich, how much has England given you to make war upon me?"

This single catastrophe was delivered while Napoleon, strongly excited, was striding up and down the apartment, and at the moment of repetition which nothing in the character or conduct of the Austrian diplomatist could for an instant justify, the Emperor laid on his back, which he held in his hand, fell to the ground. Metternich trembled, but without changing the movement of his head, which his politeness would at any other moment have caused him to turn and repass it several times, and at length the Emperor raised his noble himself.

The wisdom of Metternich's policy was acknowledged by the Emperor, who created him a Prince of the Empire on the field of battle at Leipsic. It was the 8th day after the battle of the nations which delivered, and which led to the retirement of Napoleon in Elba; and it was more glorious for Austrian as President of the National Congress which met at Vienna in the ensuing spring. It was then that the brightest days of age fell in man of very striking appearance; an admirable linguist in the dialect; and owning as he was, in person, to be a fanatist and statesman as any of the heavy-headed ministers by whom he was surrounded.

Then following the brief but stirring episode of the Hundred Days, during which Metternich watched all events keenly prepared in every case his measures for his master and himself. Ten days before the battle of Waterloo he organized the German federalists, under the Presidency of Austria, and succeeded in persuading all the German States to enter into a solemn league for the peace and safety of the number which was assailed by a foreign Power. In September the Holy Alliance was signed at Paris. The Holy Alliance, of which he more than any other man deserves to be called the father, was duly communicated to all Europe, with the exception of France, which was paralyzed, placed herself in the hands of Metternich; at his bidding the foreign envoys deliberately entered upon a career of deputation which seems almost incredible at this present day. It was at this time that the "Metternich system" began to be first talked of. The Prince himself refused to lay,—it is said,—claim to it, and to M. Veuillot jeked on the long dissertations of the journals on the Metternich system, "I study my field," he said, "where I am sure of well! I try to assimilate it or to make it prevail, but always having regard to men, and to the circumstances and time. I have a principle never to bring myself in contact with impossibilities. That is all my system."

In point of fact, for nearly a generation after the decade of sovereigns, the system of the Holy European Sovereigns were directed toward crushing out popular aspirations for liberty and political rights, and the consolidation of Austrian power by the double base of divine-right superstitions and powerful standing armies. The latest champion and champion of this system was Prince Metternich.

How will it succeeded we all know. Honors and power were showered upon the Prince himself. His master gave him the castle and estate of Johannisberg—perhaps the noblest in Germany. Other monarchs loaded him with orders and titles. Naples—grateful for the aid of Austrian soldiers to put down Neapolitan patriots, loaded him with gifts. Even the university of Oxford made him a Doctor of Laws.

It was then that he began that policy in Italy which rendered his name most execrable. By means of secret treaties with all the potentates of Italy, except the King of Piedmont, he loaned the sovereigns the threatened assistance of his regiments, and acquired the right of quartering Austrian soldiers in their States. He obtained, after all the advantages of actual dominion without any of its drawbacks. It is curious to read Metternich's own account of his views on the Italian question, as stated to M. Veuillot:

"The Prince spoke with great contempt of Italian unitarianism. 'Of all the elements of the time,' he said, 'perhaps that is the most stupid. That which at the end might be remodeled was a kingdom of Upper Italy, formed of Lombardy and Piedmont; but union is opposed to the character of the two peoples. All the letters of all their patriotic preachers which were purposely held up, the blindest could be clearly seen. Political terms hide each other—commercial terms unite to destroy each other. Alone, strong in the affinity Turin, Genoa can be united.'

"If Venice leaves the Austrian dominion, she will fall into immediate and absolute ruin. Genoa and Ancona are not ignorant of that. I would like very much, on every occasion, that Venice should cut be necessary to save Austria as a military position, and that it could be conserved. That would be a great relief to the treasury. The imposts of Venice scarcely suffice to pay for creating the canals each year. To keep up the city, to preserve the palaces from falling to ruin, and to fill up the lagoons, the Emperor has to expend many millions every year. The brackwater, which is on the point of being produced, by cutting off the fresh water from the rivers that feed, has not thirty millions. It is not Venice herself that should possess such great wealth, but rather that of the kingdom of Upper Italy. The rival cities would put up to it. The commerce would be more flourishing, yet under the protection of a great empire."

By such specimens manifestly this ingenious man succeeded in laying Italy waste, and sowing the seeds of disaster for his own country, of which we are now the witness.

His life at this time was much devoted to pleasure. He was a man of the most elegant manners in society, and in his youth is said to have been extraordinarily successful with ladies, and utterly unscrupulous. He was three times married, and his wives, who were much younger than their husband, were remarkable for their beauty and accomplishments. Common report, however, accuses him of neglecting them for the fresher attractions of the Austrian Court beauties. It is said that he is familiar with the scandalous stories to which his intimacy with the Princess Lieven gave rise, and is more than one rising youth at Vienna is said to owe his patronage to the gay amours of Prince Metternich. He was three times married, and was divorced. M. Veuillot has drawn quite a touching picture of the domestic life of Metternich, and of how his third wife presided over his household;

"The following Saturday," says M. Veuillot, "I dined at a round table in the house of Dr. Jaquemet. I was at the side of the Princess, a very noble lady, who had not left the Prince during his exile, and who was versed in his language, in attitude, and sentiment—perhaps a little more than in his policy. And she showed me the tenderness which she exhibits to her husband—a great and whole tenderness, free of that kind of coquetry which she renders him. Besides, she did not crush me with her superiority, as I feared she would. I had to be classed among the sons of God, as Le Broyere says. We are not polished and single flowers of the earth, or earth.

"I spoke to her of the respect with which the Princes inspired me, and of the repugnance which he always excited in me, as well as in my countrymen, when he always manifested toward me.

"He is so good," she said to me. 'I can not help.' I could not help answering to your highness how much I regret being condemned to see that grand and noble character in a false and misunderstood light." At this expression tears started to her eyes. "Aggression and violence are nothing," she added, "by which is hard to suffer are the studied outrages of ingratitude." To the insolence of individuals the Princess had become more wicked than they ought to be after having for so many years been on a throne. She was, in fact, between the opinion of the Prince—they have a thousand times repeated his tenderness—and the opinion of the world, the most convincing proofs of his loyal wisdom, and at the same time between the sentiment of gratitude and that of horror.

"Madame," said I, "it is necessary to follow the example which he gives you, and forget the rebellion of those unfortunate subjects who have not known what they have defined. They have dared to speak ill of the master of humanity. . . . The Princes have been loved and served by country, and who has suffered in such a manner from the world has received consolation, and these others have."

The Revolution of 1859 seems to have taken Metternich by surprise. Europe had been so long quiet, and the Germans took so kindly to his methods of conducting their affairs, that even the Powers interested of politics, that he seems to have supposed there was no more to be done. Some trouble about such abstractions as popular rights.

The first exclamation of Francis, when the intelligence arrived at Vienna, was, "Alas, Metternich!" and "All is lost!" seemed for a moment to become the motto of the Minister. During his embassy, however, he soon learned the secret of the new French King's character, and a tacit understanding arose between him and the ministers of Austria and France.

The affair of February upset him altogether. To quote from a well-informed writer:

"In February, 1848, the monarchy of France was again overturned. The shock reached Vienna. A street battle was fought in the streets of the capital. March, 1848, was sufficient to destroy the entire fabric of the Metternich system. The Chancellor of State fled to the last moment to his old system. At the deputation of citizens, on the night of the 13th March, which at last forced they passed through a suit of rooms into a spacious hall, he had already been rescued by his valet. At the sight of the deputation depicted the unfortunate state of affairs, and urged the necessity of a speedy decision as the best of the Government. Archduke John quitted him by the back door, and moreover sent the Archduke Stephen of Prince Metternich. At these words the Prince came out of the adjoining room, in which he had assembled and ministers had assembled to deliberate, and having the floor open, he said in a loud tone, 'I will not resign, gentlemen.' He then left, not regarding the deputation upon this, without answering the Prince, reported what he had heard in an undertone to the ministers, who had ready told you. Prince Metternich resigns.' At these words the deputation left the room in a great commotion, with 'What! is this the return I now get for my fifty years' service,' were the words of the Chancellor, when he found their broke out into a loud laugh, which seemed to have been premeditated. Metternich, on the following day of the 14th he arrived at the station of the Gregnitz Bridge, under the name of Dr. Jaquemet, and was conducted to Wieser Neustadt, and from thence to Freiedorf, where, apparently, he was to be in safety. But his expectations, however, were not realized; and he then fled to Feldkirch, one of the most southern towns of the Tyrol, on the frontiers of Moravia, and subsequently to his own property, Kopstein."

He spent some time in England, and after a while, when Austria returned to her old system, returned to his own country. For the last ten years he has occupied a very enviable position. Without the responsibilities of office, he has enjoyed as much power as he desired, and has invariably been consulted by every minister on the chief occurrences of the Government. Latterly he became quite popular at Vienna; his age rendered him venerable, and the victims of most of his acts of cruelty had disappeared and been forgotten.

It would be easy to extend this paper far beyond its proper limits with anecdotes of the late Prince. One or two must suffice. One writer says:

"Metternich reigned triumphantly in Austria, teaching the people to dance and sing, and even to enjoy art and literature, for amusement; but lying like a second sleeper on all letters of progress, on all motions of liberty. Austria was the Russia of Europe. The most enlightened statesmen were always going to and fro in this city to see with their own eyes the working of things, if not a nobleman, a soldier, and calling in peace. The most extraordinary contrasts were to be found there. When Trollope had made a good thing of laughing at the Americans, and in general to put Austria in a right, the good people of Vienna were alarmed at the prospect of being laughed at in their turn. Not so, however, the wily Metternich said, smilingly, 'Oh no, she will not laugh at us—we'll engage for that.' Accordingly Mrs. Trollope was not admitted to the court circles—every thing was shown her, and the virtuous minister was on particularly polite terms with her. Trollope laughed, because was nothing but laudation.

"Some time after the deceased statesman on the affairs of the United States can not fail to be interesting. In the year 1848 there was a famous citizen of the city of New York, on a visit to Vienna, called upon Metternich. They conversed freely together, and in their exchange of sentiments Metternich remarked that if he were an American he would be an out-and-out Democrat—a Democrat free-born' said he, 'as you call it out there. But I am a Conservative, and why? I am conservative on the right party.'

"When the Marquis of Londonderry visited Vienna in 1840, after eighteen years' absence, Prince Metternich told him that the old women were dead, and that the young women were old since his late visit, and that was the history of eighteen years. Even then he was almost the only survivor of the generals-in-chief, the plenipotentiaries, and the kings who had assisted at the settlement of 1815, which Count Londonderry had witnessed."

Prince Metternich died at Vienna on 11th June, three days after the entry of the French into Milan, and the consequent defeat of the Austrians which it was his boast to have founded. Was it the hand of Fate?

OUR NEW MAP.

WE publish in this Number our Third War Map, showing the seat of war in the present contest and the famous Austrian Quadrilateral. We believe this map to be the best in existence of the region in question. The scale is five miles to the inch.

THE NATURALIZATION LAW PUT TO THE TEST.

CHRISTIAN ERNST, a native of Hanover, came to this country at the age of twenty-two, resided here ever since, and in February last became a naturalized citizen of the United States. He settled in the village of Hoboken, city. After a few days' residence in the village where he was born he was arrested by the authorities of Hanover, on the charge of desertion, forced into the Hanoverian army, and compelled to serve as a soldier; in consequence of which his business is being abandoned and his family, who are here, impoverished.

The facts are not the extent in which the decree expressed in the Leclere letter forbade Mr. Cass to interfere. Since the recantation of that famous document, Mr. Cass has acted a better chance; and we have now before us the opinion of Attorney General Black pronouncing that a naturalized citizen of the United States, in his manner at Berlin, demanding his immediate surrender by the Prussian authorities.

It will be interesting to watch the progress of the negotiation. Hitherto, whenever our Government has demanded the surrender of American citizens seized by military power abroad, and the demand has been met by a refusal by the foreign Government, the United States Government has abandoned its claim to forcible protest. Several such cases arose while Mr. Marcy was Secretary; that of Koszta was the only one in which any decisive action was finally and forced into a foreign army; but he never had perseverance enough to follow up his assertion. The enemy understood this weakness, he let the matter rest. What should be shortly be enabled to gauge the perseverance and sincerity of Mr. Cass.

The chances are that the Government of Hanover will not surrender Christian Ernst, if they can help it. These German Princes, as a general rule, know nothing about the United States, and are likely to treat any representations sent from Washington with a good deal of contempt. They regard their subjects as property of Government. Latterly it became quite popular at Vienna; his age rendered him in idleness. Many German Princes have been in the habit of living by hiring out their subjects as soldiers to foreign powers. Others, which do not go quite as far as this, seek and obtain power, and not unfrequently subsidies from other States by keeping a large number of their subjects under arms at home. The very State which has seized our fellow-citizen, Prince Hanover—is at this moment struggling to advance its influence in the German Confederation by increasing its army, and bellowing for a war with Prussia. This is their habit, it is natural for the Princes of Germany to act as they decidedly to the expatriation of their subjects; and to use their power to the expatriation themselves whenever they can. Nor is it likely that they will resign the tyrannical privilege without a struggle.

The King of Hanover will probably say to Mr. Wright, when he demands the surrender of Ernst, that Hanover does not recognize the right of her subjects to change their allegiance, or to absolve themselves from the obligation of performing military duty. What will the administration do then?

It is greatly to be regretted that Mr. Cass was ever permitted to write the Leclere letter. By citing on this topic; for his letters to Leclere and Hofer will afford Hanover a whole arsenal of arguments against the United States. If Hanover takes the ground that, by the Hanoverian law, Ernst was in the army when he left his native country, and that he was only seven years old at the time, and that he stands in the light of a deserter, it is impossible for Mr. Cass, on his letters to Hofer, to say that he was not in reply. His absurd attempt to discriminate between Germans who were in the army, and Germans who were not at the time of their leaving of their expatriation, will place Mr. Wright at such disadvantage that it would not be surprising if he should be compelled to write to Hofer letter was disavowed; for Hanover, clearly, is entitled to decide who are in her army and who are not. If the boy was preliminary business for the next day in the cool afternoon hours, they are open only during the sunnig height of the heat. It is their own affair, certainly. We are only speaking of common sense and comfort.

Our climate is very trying in its sudden changes, and we make it as much more so as we can. Instead of humoring it we ignore it. It is like some political questions which certain timid, decorous, feeble people will not see to be the questions which are most vital. The questions which are real shows the decorous people to be most completely unreal. They stay aside and smile feebly; and while the tornado is ripping up the earth around them they murmur weakly, "What lovely weather it is if you only wouldn't cry out so about that accident, and which will really find out precisely which it is so much pleasanter to enjoy—has no one whatever to do!"

Now hot days, like the vital questions, are very positive facts. We may ignore them, but it is to have heat and unhealthiness. The rich people have not got rid of the butchers by plunging his head in the sand. When it is thoroughly understood by my insist that no hunters are in sight. But they are coming up for all that, and he will only have the degrees of being killed in the rear.

However, we probably have not time to keep cool.

KING POPE.

Every man who wishes well to his fellows, who believes in some kind of progress, who cherishes a hope, however small, for mankind, must earnestly desire that a better spirit may fill the ruler righteously of the Papal temporal power, shall be terminated by the present Italian movement. If the toppling of the Pope from his temporal throne shall be the only result of the war, it will be one to be remembered with gratitude forever. The Austrians are bad in Lombardy, but the Pope is a hundred-fold worse in the Romagna.

The present Pope Pius Ninth, Giovanni Mariano of the Counts of Mastai-Feretti, is now about sixty-seven years old. He was a young man when he rose to be a weak, sealing, good-natured, pious old gentleman, who knew the world from the kind of convenient for human progress and welfare An Austrian's in—the observation of any currency travel er in the United States will understand the fearful study of About into every detail and department of the Papal Government in Rome.

His royal temporal power is an enormity in itself. By what right on more than three millions of people appointed, without their consent or their leave, to support the temporal splendor and all the despotic whim-shows and sinnes of the Bishop of Rome?

Do you say that his States have been governed by thousand or more years ago, and they have always been confirmed to his successors except during the Avignon feud and the enforced exile of Pius Seventh?

To this the reply is swift—that ill-used power in the day of its sufficient and the most enlightened reconstructing governments, and that that reconsideration shows no more disposition to the sacrifice of the happiness of thirty-six hundred thousand people to a despotism in which they have no more amount of liberty than the Grand Seignior has Sandwich islanders have.

The Papal headship of the Romish Church has nothing to do with the temporal sovereignty of a Bishop. M. Thiers thinks it has; so did the late lamented M. Metternich. But the world is much better thought otherwise, and perhaps he was as wise as either Thiers or Metternich.

The book of Ahasuerus is unquestionably prepared with reference to the present complication in Italy. Of facts crowd, its writers, the annalists of a State preternaturally rotten to the core. It stirs the deepest sympathy for the unhappiness of the Romans. It arouses indignation at the intolerable outrages under which they suffer.

That wonderful waste of power, Augusta, that desert which howls at the very gates of the tomb of the all mistress of the world—who that has seen it does not remember how it rolls its waves of dust in spite of the city it surrounded? And within the walls the decay is hardly less sad. Rome was once useless to the new. Universal ignorance, stupor, and despair rest upon the population. Are it is a ruin; there is literature and art; there is social progress in human welfare a dream; and the re- Spes which affects to patronize all these is the symbol of the Devil, which prefers a shout of Victoria! to a noble action, is a corroding superstition.

The question to be decided by the Mighted States of Central Italy is not whether the Bishop of Rome is a good or bad priest of his Church, nor is it any question of the character of that Church. It is simply a matter of human welfare and progress; of political tyranny and freedom. It is whether thirty-six hundred thousand people shall be ground into the dust, and the world be prevented from ever seeing, or whether that Government, in the name of humanity, and justice, and decency, shall have notice from its own people, supported by the sympathy of the intelligent world and the presence of friendly French and Italian neighbors to quit.

ANTI-DOGS.

THE GALLOPHOBES
LIBERTY, Mid-summer, 1859.

DEAR MR. LONGER,—The hot weather naturally suggests dogs, and dog-days, and dog-nights. I have no desire to bark or to bite my neighbor. I am a peaceful citizen living in the country. Being a peaceful citizen, and wishing to dwell in quiet with all men, I keep no dogs. In not keeping dogs I do what every self-respecting man, who loves his neighbor as himself, will naturally do. For why keep dogs? Perhaps, Sir, you have dogs and may sneer. I beg you to know that suffering has made me strong. I am prepared to say sneers upon the subject—and I repeat, why does any sane human being keep a dog?

I know what Lord Byron said about dogs, and I have heard of the lady who named her dog "Beefsteak," because, forsooth, "it improved his temper." He, I know what Goldsmith said about them, and Scott, and Wordsworth. I know all about Helvellyn and Newfoundland, and that great St. Bernard. Great Heavens! Sir, I live next to a dog-fancier, and, sadly! dare not go to rest at night in consequence.

Dogs bark, and eat a great deal of meat, and snarl, and jump up on your best clothes, and rush out with a rent at passing carriages, overturning children, and, in short, misbehave generally. They also eat chickens and dig up the garden or the grass, seeking for moles, mice, or rats. They small "dog-stealers" about the premises, and throughout their tongues in a manner to appall any extended nose. Besides all this, they have a habit of your feet and the bottoms of your legs in an extremely disagreeable manner, constantly suggesting the propriety of washing, that they may like small and take a piece. At night, also, in the house they often howl in the most dismal manner, for without a door or sneeze, and upon this is predicated the absurd theory of protection against burglars which is entertained by many people.

One of my neighbors was very wise about that. He had a dog which he called "Bull," and was very fearful as the whole Metropolitan police. I asked him a few months afterward, "How about your dogs?" "Oh! I've got rid of them," he said, "they because he barked every night, and every night I would my children's rest by the disturbance. I was commending my soul and my wife and family to divine protection. I found nothing—but every night I was awakened by the noise of a dog—and at times—but I only got an inflammatory rheumatism; so I parted with him. He went to a butcher's, I believe; at any rate with him. He was a nice little fellow, very! But he ate up a good many of my chickens."

The keeping of dogs in my own neighborhood, Mr. Longer, is productive of many unpleasant consequences. Among other things it puts an end to all social intercourse. We are mainly business men here, and we like to go to and fro from our work in and pass an hour with a neighbor. But I can not, if I do, for the dogs bark and bite. Even the lady who still awaits at large in my neighbor's grounds. I hear them roar—but I have no idea of feeling with them.

There is a butcher near me who keeps a bulldog—a fine animal, I am willing to admit. Most decidedly, a widow in my neighborhood, has a lapdog!

Sir, I forbear. I grow warm as I write. I ask you merely, what is an honest man to do, who doesn't wish to be bitten, who doesn't wish to bark, —who doesn't wish to go to the dogs before his time? Yours respectfully,

DANIEL SMALLWEB.

P.S.—I think I ought to add that I have my own opinion of ladies who keep lapdogs. Why, then, is not society full of most presentable young men?

THE SEAT OF WAR IN ITALY, SHOWING THE FAMOUS AUSTRIAN QUADRILATERAL.

OUR NEW MAP OF THE BATTLE-FIELD IN ITALY.

We publish herewith a new Map of the battle-field in Italy, the best we have seen. It is drawn by John Dower, the author of the admirable Map of Northern Italy which we published some weeks ago, and which has been so generally admired. The four great fortresses which constitute the famous "quadrilateral," and every town, village, stream, road, and mountain of the neighborhood, will be found clearly marked in its proper place. With this Map the history of the war becomes clear as noonday; without it, the accounts which are appearing in the papers are generally unintelligible.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE HONEST TRADESMAN.

TO the eyes of Mr. Jerry Cruncher, sitting on his stool in Fleet Street, with his grisly urchin beside him, a vast number and variety of objects in movement were every day presented. Who could sit upon any thing in Fleet Street during the busy hours of the day and not be dazed and desfened by two immense processions, one ever tending westward with the sun, the other ever tending eastward from the sun, both ever tending to the plains beyond the range of red and purple where the sun goes down.

With his straw in his mouth, Mr. Cruncher sat watching the two streams, like the heathen rustic who has for several centuries been on duty watching one stream—saving that Jerry had no expectation of their ever running dry. Nor was it to have been an expectation of a hopeful kind, since a small part of his income was derived from the pilferage of timid women (more of a full habit and past the middle term of life) from Tellson's side of the tides to the opposite shore. Brief as such compunctious was in every separate instance, Mr. Cruncher never failed to become so interested in the lady as to express a strong wish that the next horse of drinking her very good health. And it was from the gifts bestowed upon him toward the exercise of this benevolent purpose that he recruited his finances, as just now observed.

Time was when a stool set upon a stool in a public place, and mused in the sight of men, Mr. Cruncher, sitting on a stool in a public place, but not being a poet, mused as little as possible, and looked about him.

It fell out that his thus engaged in a season when crowds were few, and belated women few, and when his affairs in general were so unprosperous as to awaken a strong suspicion in his breast that Mr. Cruncher must have been "flopping" in some pointed manner, when an unusual concourse pouring down Fleet Street westward attracted his attention. Looking that way, Mr. Cruncher made out that some kind of funeral was coming along, and that there was popular objection to the funeral, which engendered uproar.

"Young Jerry," said Mr. Cruncher, turning to his offspring, "it's a buryin'."

"Hooroar, father!" cried young Jerry.

The young gentleman uttered this exultant sound with mysterious significance. The elder gentleman took the cry as if he had not watched his opportunity and smote the young gentleman on the ear.

"Now then?" said Mr. Cruncher.

"Now then, father!" remonstrated his sagacious son.

"What d'ye mean? What are you hooroaring at? What do you want to convey to your own father, you young Rip? This boy isn't a getting too many for me?" said Mr. Cruncher, reversing him. "Him and his hooroars! Don't let me hear no more of 'em, or you shall feel some more of me. D'ye hear?"

"I wasn't doing no harm," young Jerry protested, rubbing his cheek.

"Drop it, then," said Mr. Cruncher; "I won't have none of your no harms. Get a cop of that there seat, and look at the crowd."

His son obeyed, and the crowd approached; they were bawling and hissing round a dingy hearse and dingy mourning coach, in which mourning coach there was only one mourner, dressed in the dingy trappings that were considered essential to the dignity of the position. The position appeared by no means to please him, however, for he was not attending to it, rounding the coach, deriding him, making grimaces at him, and incessantly groaning and calling out, "Spies! Tell 'em, Old Bailey! Spies!" with many compliments too numerous and forcible to repeat.

Funerals had at all times a remarkable attraction for Mr. Cruncher; he always picked up his mourner, and became excited, when a mercenary passed Tellson's. Naturally, therefore, a funeral with this uncommon attendance excited him greatly, and he asked of the first man who ran past him—

"What is it, brother? What's it about?"

"I don't know," said the man. "Spies! Yah! Tell 'em, Old Bailey!"

He asked another man. "Who is it?"

"I don't know," returned the man, clapping his hands to his mouth nevertheless, and vociferating in a surprising heat and with the great est ardor, "Spies! Yah! Tell 'em, Old Bailey!"

At length a person better informed on the merits of the case, hustled against him, and from this person he learned that the funeral was the funeral of one Roger Cly.

"Was he a spy?" asked Mr. Cruncher.

"Old Bailey spy," returned his informant. "Yah! Tell 'em, Old Bailey Spi-ies!"

"Why, to be sure!" exclaimed Jerry, recalling the Trial at which he had assisted. "I've seen him, Dead, in he?"

"Dead as mutton," returned the other, "and can't be too dead. Have an end, out there. Spies! Pull 'em out, there! Spies!"

The idea was so acceptable in the prevalent absence of business, that the crowd caught it up with eagerness, and loudly repeating the suggestion to have him out, and to pull 'em out, mobbed the two vehicles so closely that they came to a stop. On the crowd's opening the coach door, the one mourner writhed out of himself, and was in their hands for a moment; but he was so alert, and made such good use of his time, that in another moment he was scouring away up a by-street, after shedding his cloak, hat, long cravat, white pocket-handkerchief, and other symbolical tears.

These the crowd tore to pieces and scattered far and wide with great enjoyment, while the tradesmen hurriedly shut up their shops; for a crowd in that state stopped at nothing, and was a monster much dreaded. They had already got the length of opening the hearse to take out the coffin out, when some brighter genius proposed instead, its being escorted to its destination with general rejoicing. Practical suggestions being much needed, this suggestion, too, was received with acclamation, and the coach was immediately filled with eight inside, and a dozen out, while as many people got on the roof of the hearse as could by any exertion maintain a precarious stick upon it. Among the first of these volunteers was Jerry Cruncher, who modestly but effectively concealed his spiky head from the observation of Tellson's, in the further corner of the mourning coach.

The officiating undertakers made some protest against these changes in the programme; but the river being alarmingly near, and several voices remarking on the efficacy of cold immersion to allay excitement, they bowed to the decision to reason, the protest was faint and brief. The remodelled procession started afresh, Jerry's new-sweep driving the hearse—advised by the regular driver, who was perched beside him, and who recognized, for the purpose, every face with a pieman, also attended by his cabinet mourner. Games ensued, in the course of which the leader, a popular street character of the time, was impressed as an additional ornament, before the procession had gone far down Fleet Street; and his bear, who was black and very mangy, gave quite an Undertaking air to that part of the procession in which he walked.

Thus, with beer-drinking, pipe-smoking, song-roaring, and infinite caricaturing, the disorderly procession went its way, recruiting at every step, until all the shops in Fleet Street were shut. Its destination was the old church of Saint Pancras, for oft in the fields. It got there in course of time; insisted on pressing open the burial-ground; finally accomplished the interment of the deceased Roger Cly in its own way, and highly to its own satisfaction.

The dead man disposed of, and the crowd being under the necessity of providing some other entertainment for itself, another blighter genius (or perhaps the same) conceived the humor of impeaching casual passers-by as Old Bailey spies, and wreaking vengeance upon them. Chase was given to some scores of inoffensive persons who had never been near the Old Bailey in their lives, in the realization of this fancy, and they were roughly hustled and maltreated. The transition to the sport of window-breaking, and thence to the plundering of public houses, was easy and natural. At last, after several hours, when sundry summer-houses had been pulled down, and some area railings had been torn up to arm the more belligerent spirits, a rumor got about that the Guards were coming. Before this rumor the crowd gradually melted away, and perhaps the Guards came, and perhaps they never came, and this was the usual progress of a mob.

Mr. Cruncher did not assist at the closing sports, but had remained behind in the churchyard, to confer with the undertaker's men. The place had a nothing influence on him. He procured a pipe from a neighboring public house, and smoked it, looking in at the railings and maturely considering the spot.

"Jerry," said Mr. Cruncher, apostrophizing himself in his usual way, "you see that there Cly that day, and you can with your own eyes that he was a young un and a straight made un."

Having smoked his pipe out and ruminated a little longer he turned himself about, that he might stretch the other leg a little, and took his station at Tellson's. Whether his meditations on mortality had touched his liver, or whether his general health had been previously at all amiss, or whether he desired to show a little attention to an eminent man, is not so much to the purpose as that he made a short call upon his medical adviser—a distinguished surgeon—in Fleet Street.

Young Jerry relieved his father with dutiful interest, and reported No job in his absence. The bank closed, the ancient clerks came out, the usual watch was set, and Mr. Cruncher and his son went home to tea.

"Now, I tell you where it is!" said Mr. Cruncher to his wife, on entering. "If, as a honest tradesman, my wentars goes wrong to-night, I shall make sure that you've been prayin' against me, and I shall work you for it just the same as if I seen you do it."

The dejected Mrs. Cruncher shook her head.

"Why, you're at it afore my face!" said Mr. Cruncher, with signs of angry apprehension.

"I am saying nothing."

"Well, then, don't meditate nothing. You might as well fly as meditate. You may as well go again me one way as another. Drop it altogether."

"Yes, Jerry."

"Yes, Jerry," repeated Mr. Cruncher, sitting down to tea. "Ah! it is Yes, Jerry. You'll be at it. You may say Yes, Jerry."

Mrs. Cruncher had no particular meaning in these sulky corroborations, but made use of them, as people not unfrequently do, to express general resolute dissatisfaction.

"You and your Yes, Jerry," said Mr. Cruncher, taking a bite out of his bread and butter, and seeming to help it down with a large invisible oyster out of his saucer. "Ah! I think so, I believe you."

"You are going out to-night?" asked his docile wife, who took another bite.

"Yes, I am."

"May I go with you, father?" asked his son Jerry.

"No, you mayn't. I'm a going—as your mother knows—a fishing. That's where I'm going to. Going a fishing."

"Your fishing-rod gets rayther rusty; don't it, father?"

"Never you mind."

"Shall you be using your fish home, father?"

"If I don't you'll have short commons to-morrow," returned that gentleman, shaking his head. "That's questions enough for you. I an't a going out till you've been long abed."

He devoted himself, during the remainder of the evening, to keeping a most vigilant watch on Mrs. Cruncher, and sullenly holding her in conversation that she might be prevented from meditating any petitions to his disadvantage. With this view he roped his son to bold her in conversation also, and led the unfortunate woman a hard life by dwelling on any causes of complaint he could bring against her, rather than he would leave her for a moment to her own reflections. The devotional person could have rendered no greater homage to the efficacy of an honest prayer than he did in this distrust of his wife. It was as if a professed unbeliever in ghosts should be frightened by a ghost story.

"And mind you!" said Mr. Cruncher. "No games to-morrow! If I, as a honest tradesman, succeed in patrolling a little of meat or two, none of your not touching of it, and sticking to bread. If I, as a honest tradesman, am able to provide a little beer, none of your declaring on water. When you go to Rome, do as Rome does. Rome will be a ugly customer to you if you don't. I'm your Rome, you know."

Then he began grumbling again:

"With your flying into the face of your own wittles and drink! I don't know how scarce you mayn't make the wittles and drink yourself by your flopping tricks and your unfeeling conduct. Look at your hair! Look at your head! He's as thin as a lath. Do you call yourself a mother, and not know that a mother's first duty is to blow her boy out?"

This touched Young Jerry on a tender place; who adjured his mother to perform that duty, and, whatever else she did or neglected, serve all things to her general stress on the discharge of that maternal function as effectingly and delicately indicated by his other parent.

Thus the evening wore away with the Cruncher family, until Young Jerry was ordered to bed, and his mother, laid under similar injunctions, obeyed them. Mr. Cruncher beguiled the earlier portion of the night with solitary pipes, and did not start upon his excursion until nearly two o'clock. Toward that small and ghostly hour he rose up from his chair, took a key out of his pocket, opened a locked cupboard, and brought forth a sack, a crow-bar of considerable size, a rope and chain, and other fishing-tackle of that nature. Disposing these articles about him in a skilful manner, he bestowed a parting defiance on Mrs. Cruncher, extinguished the light, and went out.

Young Jerry, who had only made a feint of laying down his head on his pillow, was not long after his father. Under cover of the darkness he followed out of the room, followed down the stairs, followed down the street, followed out into the streets. He was in no uneasiness concerning his getting into the arms again, for he was full of fingers, and the door stood ajar all night.

Impelled by a laudable ambition to study the art and mystery of his father's honest calling, Young Jerry, keeping as close to house-fronts, walls, and door-ways as his eyes were close to one another, held his honored parent in view. The honored parent stealthily northward, but not gone far when he was joined by another people of Israel, Walton, and the two trudged on together.

With a halt an hour from the first starting they were beyond the winking lamps, and the more than winking watchmen, and were out upon a lonely road. Another halt, and they picked up here—and that so silently, that if Young Jerry had been superstitious, he might have supposed the second follower of the night a creature of the air, and not a sudden, split himself into two.

The three went on, and Young Jerry went on, until the three stopped under a bank overhanging the road. Upon the top of the bank was a low brick wall surmounted by an iron railing. In the shadow of bank and wall the three lay down, and, put up a blind lane, of which the wall—there rose to some eight or ten feet high—formed one side. Crouching down in a corner, peeping up the lane, the next object that Young Jerry saw was the form of his honored parent, pretty well defined against a watery and cloudy moon, quietly scaling an iron gate. He was soon over, and then the second fisherman got over, and then the third. They all dropped softly on the ground within the gate, and lay there a little—listening perhaps. Then they moved away on their hands and knees.

MR. CRUNCHER'S FRIENDS.

It was now Young Jerry's turn to approach the gate: which he did, holding his breath. Crouching down again in a corner there, and looking in, he made out the three fishermen creeping through some sunk grass; and all the grave-stones in the church-yard—and it was a large church-yard that they were in—looking on like ghosts in white, while the church tower itself looked on like the ghost of a monstrous giant. They did not creep far before they stopped and stood upright. And then they began to dig.

They fished with a spade at first. Presently the bowsed pattern appeared to be something some instrument like a great cork-screw. Whatever tools they worked with they worked hard, until the solid striking of the church clock appalled Young Jerry where he made off, with his hair as stiff as his fears.

But his long-cherished desire to know more about these matters, not only stopped him in his running away, but lured him back, and back. They were still labouring perseveringly, when he peeped in at the gate for the second time; but now they seemed to have got a bite. There was a screwing and complaining sound down below, and their heads gazed very hungrily over it by a weight. By slow degrees the weight broke away the earth upon it and came to the surface.

Young Jerry very well knew what it would be; but when he saw it, and saw his honored parent about to wrench it open, he was so frightened, being new to the sight, that he made off again, and never stopped until he had run a mile and more.

He would not have stopped then for any thing less necessary than breath, it being a spectral sort of race that he ran, and one highly desirable to get to the end of. He had a strong idea that the coffin he had seen was running after him; and, pictured as hopping on behind him, bolt upright in its narrow end, always on the point of overtaking him and hopping on in his wake—perhaps taking his mother for a pursuer to shun. It was an inconsistent and ubiquitous fend too, for, while it was making this whole night behind him dreadful, he darted out into the roadway to avoid dark alleys, fearful of its coming hopping up behind him with a bump on every stair, scrambled into bed with him, and bounced up, dead and heavy, on his breast when he fell asleep.

From his oppressed slumber, Young Jerry in the morning was roused, after declining to go before sunrise, by the presence of his father in the family room. Somebody had been up to see him; at least so Young Jerry inferred, from the circumstance of his holding Mrs. Cruncher by the ears, and knocking the back of her head against the head-board of the bed.

"I tell you I would," said Mr. Cruncher, "and I did."

"Jerry, Jerry, Jerry!" his wife implored.

"You oppose yourself to the profits of the business," said Jerry, "and me and my partners suffer. I was to honor and obey; why the devil don't you?"

"I try to be a good wife, Jerry," the poor woman protested, in tears.

"Is it being a good wife to oppose your husband's business? Is it honoring your husband to Balsover his business? Is it obeying your husband to disobey him on the vital subject of his business?"

You hadn't taken to the dreadful business then, Jerry."

"It's enough for you," retorted Mr. Cruncher, "to be the wife of a honest tradesman, and not to occupy your female mind with calculations when he took to his trade or when he didn't. A honest tradesman's wife, and a honest let his trade alone altogether. Call yourself a religious woman! If you're a religious woman, give me a irreligious one! You pious female, not a real sense of duty than the bed of this here Thames River! You shall go to pile, and simplify it must be knocked into you."

The altercation was conducted in a low tone of voice, and resulted in the honest tradesman's kicking off his evil-soiled boots, and lying down at his height on the floor. After laying a timid prop at him lying on his back, with his rusty hands under his head for a pillow, his pious wife lay down in the full safety position.

There was no fish for breakfast, and not much of any thing else. Mr. Cruncher was out of spirits, and out of temper, and kept an iron pot-lid by him as a projectile for the correction of Mrs. Cruncher, in case he should observe any symptoms of her saying Grace. He was hooked and washed at the usual hour, and went off with his son to pursue his ostensible calling.

Young Jerry, walking with the stout under his arm at his father's side, was a sight to be crowded Fleet Street, was a very different Young Jerry from him of the previous night, running home through darkness and solitude from his grim purpuser. His cunning was fresh with the day, and his qualms were gone with the night—in which particulars it is not improbable that he had compeers in Fleet Street and the City of London that fine morning.

"Father," said Young Jerry, as they walked along, taking care to keep an arm's-length and to have the stout well between them, "what's a Resurrection-Man?"

Mr. Cruncher came to a stop on the pavement before he answered, "How should I know?"

"I thought you knowed every thing, father," said the artless boy.

"Hem! Well," returned Mr. Cruncher, going on again, and lifting off his hat to give his spikes free play, "he's a tradesman."

"What's his goods, father?" asked the brisk Young Jerry.

"His goods," said Mr. Cruncher, after turning it over in his mind, "is a branch of Scientific goods."

"Person' bodies, ain't it, father?" asked the lively boy.

"I believe it is something of that sort," said Mr. Cruncher.

"Oh, father, I should so like to be a Resurrection-Man when I'm quite growed up!"

Mr. Cruncher was evidently much shocked by this declaration of his hopeful son. He shook his head in a grave and moral way. "It depends upon how you develop your talents. Be careful to develop your talents, and never to say no more than you can help to nobody, and there's no telling at the present time what you may come to be fit for."

As Young Jerry, thus encouraged, went on a few yards in advance, to plant the stout in the pavement edge, Mr. Cruncher added to himself, "Jerry, you honest tradesman, there's hopes that boy will yet be a honor to you, and a recompense to you for his mother!"

THE SONG OF COURTESY.

WHEN Sir Gawain was led to his bridal bed,
By Arthur's knights in scorn God-speed:
How, think you, he felt?
He felt the cold chain
Was yellow and dry as a snake's old skin;
Leathly as sin!
Scarcely facetable,
Quite unendurable;
With a beg! for the knight's chain
Gentle Gawain felt on should we,
Little of knightly fire knew he
But he was the Knight of Courtesy.

II.

When that evil lady to lay beside
Rode him from the revelous his bride,
What, think you, he did?
He bade her go,
And let not his loathliness vain
Mirror too plain,
Sadly, sadly,
Almost dimly!
Turned he and kissed her once and again.
Like Sir Gawain, gentles, should we?
Silent, oh! But for pattern agree
There's rose like the Knight of Courtesy.

III.

Sir Gawain sprang up used lores and curls:
Kisses are not pearls,
What clung in his arms?
Oh, a maiden flower,
Burning with shame to be wrent bride-lower,
Beauty her dower!
Breathing profoundly,
"Shall I live blooningly,"
Said she, "by day, or the bridal hour?"
Thereat he bent him, and whispered he,
"Thine, rare bride, the choice shall be."
Said she, "Twice should is Courtesy!"

IV.

Of gentle Sir Gawain they had no sport,
When to court and Arthur's court;
Wast, think you, they cried?
"Now, lids and eyes!
This bride is the rose a dream of a prize,
Drab from the skies!
See ye not, Courtesy
Is the true Alchemy,
Turning to gold all it touches and tries?
Like the bridal we'll Make the jousts that be Beautiful ever by Courtesy!"

EXPLANATION BY DANIEL E. SICKLES.

The following letter has been addressed to the editor of the Herald in relation to the publication of a statement in reviewing his marital relations with his wife:

"NEW YORK, TUESDAY, July 19, 1859.

"Through the courtesy of said events, which during the last few months have brought so much affliction upon my family, I have been absent. No amount of misrepresentation, however gross, could induce me to notice it, but for my son. Up to the present time I have not seen a single publication, and have no notice what has been or can be said. My friends never published a word in reply to the slanders of public opinion, for in these it is too often obvious that self-ends and malevolence prompt the publication; and assists upon the private life of citizens holding public offices. I have, however, been informed that on Sunday last, yesterday, although conscious of which I do not complain, while I deplore the publication, the Herald, with base and temper from the misery of sensitive and unlearned minds, has published a most unfounded statement in relation to my domestic relations, that I can not allow a mistake, which, if not corrected, may be taken for an admission, to pass without such a correction as will relieve others from unnecessary pain. I have endeavored to be the subject of the multitude at the moment to keep open and not to close.

"DANIEL E. SICKLES."

"Referring to the forgiveness which my sense of duty and my feelings impelled me to extend to an erring one, I have only to say that I have no fear of the future. I have no apprehension of the consequences which may exist. I regret that the object of the affair was brought about through the agency of the press. This action, however, proves that I did not exchange a word with one of my counsel upon the subject, and that I was not in the slightest degree in unity with any acts we may act, done without consultation with any relative, counselor, friend, or adviser. Whatever blame, if any belongs to the step, should fall alone upon me. I am pressed to defend what I have done before the only tribunal I recognize as having the right to question my motives—that of my own conscience and the God of Heaven. I can not waive or sacrifice so vital or morals which matter it intimate to forgive a wrong; nor is it based to make any domestic life a subject of consultation with friends, no matter how near and dear they may be. I have no fear that the world considered to decide to me the reputation of my wife, when I have the heart to forgive her and restore her to my confidence and protection.

WHY HE TOOK HIS WIFE BACK.

"If I now believe in recognizing the utterly desolate position of an offending though penitent woman—in taking her hatters, with the dark possibilities of danger, by which she is environed when proscribed as an outcast—I can not see plainly enough in the almost out-cast bowl of denunciation with which she is followed to say therefore that the injury and guilt from which I have rescued the mother of my child. And although it is very sad for me to leave the Home of Friends and the Temple of many wise and good people, I shall strive to prove to all who may feel that my interest in me, that I am the man who was has ventured to say to the world an error. I have no fear of the future. I have no fear of the world, that, in spite of adversity, I shall not be able to maintain my position. Many people shall entitle it to the imitation of the generous, and the commendation of the just.

WHAT HE INTENDS TO DO HEREAFTER.

"There are many who think that an act of duty, prompting noble feelings, and dictated by the purest motives, should be left in the heart of a husband and a father, is to be dealt by my friends, and never to say no more than you can help to nobody, and there's no telling at the present time what you may come to be fit for."

As Young Jerry, thus encouraged, went on a few yards in advance, to plant the stout in the pavement edge, Mr. Cruncher added to himself, "Jerry, you honest tradesman, there's hopes that boy will yet be a honor to you, and a recompense to you for his mother!"

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE WAR.

THE TREATY OF PEACE.

A TREATY of PEACE has been signed between the Emperors of FRANCE and AUSTRIA, and the Italian war has been brought to a sudden termination. The terms agreed upon by important intelligence by the North Britain, which arrived at Queenstown on the 23d inst., and dated July 12th. In an order of the day issued by Napoleon on the 11th, he announces the conclusion of the armistice, the terms of peace, and the reasons which led to them. On the 11th an interview took place between the two Emperors at Villafranca, on the basis of which was a treaty, the outlines of which are given in a telegram from Paris published in the Times. The object of the Confederation is to be established, under the honorary presidency of the Pope. Venetia, though Austria may not consented to France, and by France transferred to Sardinia, to which Lombardy is annexed. Austria is reforming an integral part of the Italian Confederation, is to be governed by her own laws, but by the Emperor of Austria. The effect of the news of peace on the Money Markets was quite instantaneous. The Three per Cents were published on the Paris Bourse on the 12th, and the funds rose 2 per cent. The Rentes did not come into the market on the 13th, but the impression in Paris generally is that the full effect is not known, but sales were made late in the day at 70.

THE ARMISTICE.

The following official dispatch has been received:

"The Emperor to the Empress: An armistice has been concluded between the Emperor of Austria and myself. The preliminaries of peace are proposed to serve as the last element.

"The Emperor, after giving the official dispatch announcing the armistice, adds: 'It is unnecessary that the public should not misunderstand the extent of the armistice. It is a suspension of arms, and not a treaty concluded between the belligerent powers, which, though leaving the latter free to continue their preparations, does not appear to be how the war may be terminated."

The Times of July 13th publishes the following:

"The armistice was signed at Villafranca on the 8th instant, between Marshal Vaillant and Baron Hess. Its term is fixed for the 15th August. It stipulates that concerned vessels, without distinction of flag, shall be free to enter the ports of the belligerent powers.

The Paris news: "With regard to the armistice there is little to communicate beyond what the public already know. All that seems to be well authenticated is, that the proposal came from France, and was the result of the battle of Solferino, fought on the 24th ult. Austrian Napoleon should stop short in a career of victory and make overtures for peace, the fact cannot be detailed in the published battles and buried back to the limits of Lombardy, argues the moderation or the necessities of the French ruler. It seems that the hostile powers have been the event of this sudden resolve."

THE CLOSE OF THE BATTLE.

Mr. Raymond, from whose letters from the seat of war we have quoted most, continues to write to the Times. He thus describes the last scene of the battle of Solferino:

"Night finally ended the contest, and left the Imperials able certain between the combatants. The field was then admirably contained on both sides. All agree that the Austrians fought with desperate courage and resolution, and that their troops were well handled. The Austrians stood to their guns until they were absolutely on the piece of bayonet all of their artillery horses. It was in that weapon, and in the headstrong, unsteadiness, and unconquerable courage of the troops, that the fate of the upper city of the French was most marked, and it was by the superiority of the French in these that they were beaten. Had not a portion of the French army fallen back after carrying a general view of the field from the height of Solferino for the purpose of forming a new line of battle from place to place as the emergency required. One of the best-placed men told us he saw the Emperor, who constantly exposed to the most imminent danger, on the hills where he had taken his position. The Prince Napoleon, and, who stood near the Emperor all day, but resided upon the front of the left wing. Marshal Vaillant, who had intended the metal and inflicted a slight wound upon his head, was also constantly exposed to fire, and were behaved with sufficient gallantry, and to have died on the field of battle. Marshal Niel, who had left the day was at Solferino, and was present at the close. Neither after the battle, but immediately established, a head-quarter camp at Castiglione, and Marshal Canrobert—at wire nither for us. As I descended the hill I met the Imperial carriages coming up, and the troops in motion, and the flags from the house in bed occupied were taken down.

REMOVAL OF THE WOUNDED.

Speaking of the wounded the correspondent says: "As fast as their wounds could be dressed they were removed to the rear from which they had come, sometimes a mile distant, and from thence to Brescia, twelve miles further on, but being the first town of any considerable size and all adequate to the care of such an immense number of persons. I saw no wounded left on the field when operations began to arrive. At the entrance of the town stands a large building used as a hospital, and there is a small open space, and being placed at the angle of two diverging roads. As the wounded arrived they were laid in a good go no further were taken off the carts and left here, when the cart returned to Brescia for a fresh load. Resting a sight as was presented in front of that hospital, no one who witnessed it will ever forget. Wounded men covering the hospital, the ground, and the open carriages every half minutes from the surrounding gig and operating.

HOW THEY TRAVELED.

Every thing for miles around had been called into requisition. For the wounded who could not walk, and who were not placed in the hospital, carts, carry sheets or other ponderous articles were the fields. Many of these had a bed placed in them, and were filled with straw and filled long. Some hay was spread upon this, and upon that the wounded were placed as gently as possible, and could be laid, without undue of any kind, or pillow for their heads; all were supplied with a little straw, and they might happen to have upon them. The weather has been continuously warm and dry since the 24th, and baths being the best rein that has fallen; and yesterday and to-day the dust has been intolerable, and has been heated with the overcast rays of an Italian sun. The roads are paved with flint stones, and the cart it was utterly impossible for well persons to travel above three miles an hour, and the wounded, of course, much less than that. Every cart was filled with wounded men, among which those thousands of maimed and mutilated creatures must have suffered during the first twenty hours of ten or fifteen miles, performed at the slowest pace of heavy oxen, and frequently stopped for the total interception of the procession. It was enough to melt the most obdurate heart to see the cart as they slowly arrived. The peasants, who drove them, seemed not to mind the sufferings of the poor fellows behind, but kept their pace to alleviate their misery. Some of the soldiers themselves, by means of their own handkerchiefs, supported them to move about, but not branches from the vicinity of the road, and with these they endeavored to form a shade for the poor fellows' sad—and he had put through enough left to lift himself up and beg for water. It was immediately given to him, and he was then taken off perceived we were lifted off the cart in the blanks it which he was carried, and laid on the side of the field—but he lived only a few minutes longer. As they were lifting him from the ground his head fell down upon the feet of another poor fellow lying in the same cart, and he expired without even a cry of anguish or pain, unless than I ever heard before.

THE HOSPITAL.

"Just before dark on Sunday evening I looked into the hospital at Brescia. It was a large building and number of the wounded were taken. It was a Catholic institution, and was under the control of nuns. All the furniture of every kind had been taken out from the floor and sides of the rooms, and the floor of the building, and upon rows of mattresses extended lengthwise of the rooms, the wounded were laid, and as many as could were placed. All about injuries would permit death in the hospital was very small, and those who died were the most severely wounded. Many of the wounded men with fractures, and other bones, and only those were left in the hospital who were unable to be removed. The medical attendance was very good, and the nuns were in the very act of dying—and not one of the whole eight paid penalty, as I was informed, for their care. The Prince was covered with the poor victims of war, nearly all of whom were suffering from wounds. He had not been, charged with the care of them, were passing to and fro among the cots and pallets of the sick. I had no time for that—but looking for those who might still be found. And there I found Lieutenant Colonel Count Della Torre, an intimate friend of mine, who had been wounded in the leg.

A DAY.

"We were speedily recognized as an evident and renewed connection, and, looking up, we saw men coming out of the street with two enormous spits. They entered and they spoke loudest. Zouaves and other soldiers were running as fast as he could, and to take the street and asked them to first soldiers in connection with the Zouaves, and to the same reply, 'I do not know,' and never dropped his running in his head. Not only one student, as lonely as his spirit, I took myself permit. 'He must, he must!' they are killing him!' wounded. And when I asked him, 'Who?' he replied, 'The Austrians!' I could obtain no further information, and as I was hurried up by a spirit of the whole town to be present at the execution, I thought time for us to be moving also. We accordingly started off at a round pace, but were compelled to stop now and then and dismount close to the way to prevent being run over by the advancing troops. Several regiments passed us coming down the street, spurring their horses into a mad run over the pavements. Shutters were closed, doors bolted, and Sardinian dogs pulled in with a good deal more alacrity than they had been hung out the day before. Every body who had a cart and horse pressed it and started. I saw a Zouave, who had been limping through the street not a moment before, seize a horse which stood at the door of a cart-load of wine, cut the saddle, bridle, or even halter, loop on his back, and swing by the mane, and ride off with only one leg to the gallop. One of the regiments that was running the four miles from the city to the front, in the hot sun, lost seven men and reached the field with only three hundred men, whom I recognized as one I had seen in command of the guard of the wounded, some distance back on grand pulop. I called out to him as he rushed past, "Are the Austrians beaten?" "I don't know," was the reply. Following close to his heels came one of the large regiments belonging to the Imperial Army, and as I stepped up to them I had seen the engross of the Imperial household uniform intermixed in the ranks. The first came an open cloak, with two civilians, one of whom was holding the reins, and the other was one of the soldiers who were trying their best to climb up. Indeed, there was a perfect rush of the soldiers to get into the carriage, which was filled with the wounded officers, who, apparently stunned to us that we had been successful, were sitting with their heads bowed down, and their hands hanging their way, right and left, directly in our rear. This decided me to fight with the soldiers, as it was quite hopeless to run away from pursuing cavalry.

HOW I CONGRATULATED.

"This was certainly the most remarkable instance of a pure panic I ever saw—and the most striking feature of it was the rapidity with which it communicated itself to all the individuals around. We were all cool enough, and had seen the most serious results when it overtook the legion of wounded and fugitives. Some of the men stumbled headlong from the carts into the roadside, and many of them were run over by the artillery-wagons, as they were utterly conscious from sight by the dense cloud of dust which they raised. The fact is, the panic once very hard to find out how it originated, but with any sufficient reason. At first we were under the impression of Piedmontese cavalry, who were pressuring the enemy to the extreme left of Castiglione, and had mistaken for Austrians. But no officer in the camp of the Piedmontese could be found who would not admit the further retreat of the field of battle—sold us that it was impossible for the Austrians to have succeeded themselves in so tremendous a victory as to be obliged to surrender. They were said to have stated that the Austrians were certainly coming up to the front, and would soon be in possession of Castiglione. In that camp no alarm seems to have been created, but when I reached the ammunition-train, a mile or so in the rear, I felt this atmosphere of fear in the strongest degree. Indeed, they ran their forces all the way to Brescia—some seventeen miles—without stopping for a single o'clock. Why they did not communicate the alarm to the camp of Chiasteo, and Napoleon, through it, to the panic, or why their officers did not pause for further inquiry, are among the mysteries of the campaign.

DEATH OF A WAR-HORSE.

"One of the most striking sights in the camp of Chasteo had been badly wounded by a ball, which had broken one of his hind-legs, and had passed out at the hip. He was a black part of the field and lost him through the heat with pain. The poor creature, divided by the pain of his wound, had failed to kill him, shocked rapidly round half a dozen times in a circle, and fell down in the middle of the three legs, and dashing out the men, who tried in vain to get him to stand upon his three legs. The poor animal took his amusement of this kind for several hours, and was at all ends to relieve him in spite of all efforts to prevent him he succeeded in doing so. He would lie down for many minutes before they could force him away. He seemed determined to die, if he could, in the midst of his companions."

CANNONBET CENSURED.

One of the grievances of the battle of Solferino is the severe reprimand subjected by the Emperor to Canrobert. Canrobert, whom he accused of not having taken a sufficiently prominent part in the battle. The Emperor, it is said, found himself by declaring that he had scrupulously followed the Emperor's orders. "If all the orders," he said, "remarks the chronicler, "were to confine themselves within those limits, the battle of Solferino would be much facilitated in their efforts to repel the attack from the Piedmontese."

HOW THE EMPEROR LOST HIS RAZOR.

The Emperor was wounded in the face, and part of his beard has been replaced. The shot which shattered the second Aide-de-camp's sword off his guard, and, striking him, being brought to the rear for amputation, encountered the Emperor's razor, a kind itself necessary for every body during the fight. Seeing the General's wound, he politely tendered one of his own pocket-cases, placed it on General Ango's shoulder, thereby crushing him a General of Engineers, and left the rest to the surgeon given of this extraordinary incident. The Emperor, having seen religious matters with entire and with which he was supposed to have been deprived of the other by a cannon-ball but which, as it turned out, was a trifling wound have been seriously injured him.

HOW THE EMPEROR RODE INTO HIS MEN.

An officer of the Zouaves related the following incident that occurred in the battle of Solferino:

"We were fighting desperately to get into Cavriana. The Emperor rode up, and, evidently himself in a state of going on, the bolts whirled round us, and shell burst. Some of my men, who had been ordered to the rear, pressed to the head of the battalion, and the fire became so hot that I was obliged to command a halt. Some of the men broke and ran, and I was obliged to threaten. The colonel thing himself in front of the Emperor, and said, 'Sire, do not expose yourself so much; you are risking.' 'Very well,' replied the Emperor with a smile, 'remove them, and I will fire in front of them.' The remain gave me a fresh vigor, and I cannot but how it was, but in a short time we were in the midst of the mêlée, and in twenty minutes after we had taken Cavriana."

HOW THE EMPEROR WAS SAVED.

A letter says: "As all the roads are between the different wars, such have been the difficulties that attaining were consequently directed upon the heights themselves. Most of men are up to the top of their speed, and the position surrounded by any thing but the greatest difficulty in climbing them. Such was the position of the Emperor. As the French soldiers got to the top with their packs, the Austrians on the other side had left their knapsacks, and waited the attack in this manner. Add to this difficulty a morning fog, so dense that the troops could not see the top grow, and a dense mass of infantry firing down from the hills, and you have some before the Emperor's eyes could. A brigade of the first division of the first corps, which had been ordered to support the left of the line, took heart to get possession of the heights, but they had to go back; and the Emperor, finding that the position could not be won, ordered the retreat to be sounded. At that moment, that the Emperor, and in imitation of him, the whole staff, turned their backs and shouted, 'Bravo, the Tyrol was!' I got to the place a short time after it had been taken, and I can assure you that the sensation of admiration of humanity in so small a space. You see what the fight coal both sides when you remind the Germans and feelings of the different regiments engaged. The weather to me to have the position could not be taken. Three of the Emperor's staff were killed by his side, and I think seven have been prisoners. They had eaten to behind the place to the left army.

MILITARY BALLOONS.

The correspondent of the Journal des Débats states that on the 24th of June M. Godard made two balloon ascensions, taking up with him officers of the staff and engineers. They went up from the Sardinian outposts, about a mile from the walls of Peschiera, to learn the positions of the enemy and the condition of the place.

ARMY GOSSIP.

The Turin correspondent of the Morning Herald, writing on the 1st inst., says: "Detailed accounts of the slaughter at Solferino continue to arrive. 20,000 extra beds are being prepared at Milan, and 10,000 at Turin, 10,000 beds from here. Moreover, well provided as the Austrian army is with ambulances, the number of which was stated long ago at 1,000, they are quite inadequate to the scene of the late battle. The weather is frightfully hot, and the roads are so bad that, even under the most favorable circumstances, would probably have recovered that fall victims to hospital gangrene. Among the Austrian Generals Auger, of the Artillery, whose arm was shot off, underwent the operation of amputation, and died in consequence of having the sanitized stump taken out of the socket. It was performed by the Emperor's own surgeons. Among the Emperor's own surgeon, Baron Larrey, but poor Auger is still among the living. He is a fine old soldier who won his name in one of Gregor but Fever, the same who, when he was told that the Austrians had made a campaign with the Russians, replied, 'Then I suppose Count Cossbeck's conduct in the late action is severely blamed, as he was commander-in-chief of the Russian auxiliaries.' I do not know how far the account which reaches me may be correct, as I have not seen it mentioned in the French camp. It is said that General Niel, who was very severely wounded, is going on satisfactorily. He has a fine cohort with a request for assistance. Canrobert replied that he was very sorry, but that he could not spare a single battalion, as he had received notice from the Imperial Guard that they would be attacked in force at 4 o'clock in the morning. It was not until six hours later, on the 25th, that the Austrians withdrew their troops from Pozzolengo, and then only to the right of Sant Nazi's attack. Had he done so before, much bloodshed would have been saved. The fact is, the battle was so general on the subject that I do not think it possible that the Austrians can claim victory in a general sense."

MOVEMENTS OF KOSSUTH.

A letter says: "When Kossuth arrived after midnight at Casarsa, he was told that Napoleon was gone. In short, 'the dreams fate cut fatal.' He could quietly go to a hotel and have refreshments and rest. He could, however, the waiter brought the foreigners' book to get the names of the guests. Kossuth, in a hurry, wrote, 'Kossuth,' he rushed out of the room like a madman. Had new entrance to the hotel, and, as if called together by the magic of Plantes, knew it already, and, as if called together by the same bell, they were all there. Kossuth was received in their vivas with the heartiest good-will. The mayor of the town presented him with the keys of the city, and complimentary addresses were delivered to him. Last night, the respected late minister of Tuscany, who left Florence on the 15th, fighting in the ranks of the 3d Rifles. The room is soon overcrowded with visitors. Kossuth is up to a hint—gives the keys to the mayor, and then starts the crowd rushes to him, kissing his hands and garments, his boots and spurs, and cheering him to the echo. The carriage along thousands and thousands follow, and others are drawn up in front of the hotel. In the enthusiasm of remnant liberty, the population incident to the scenes on the streets, and the universal sympathy for liberty, and therefore is taken by them for a pledge of their own happiness."

HIS ARRIVAL AT PARMA.

A letter says: "Kossuth arrived at Parma. The town was quietly silenced in expectation of the arrival of Prince Napoleon. He was accompanied and officially recognized by some Italian standing before the hotel, he stated, 'General Kossuth, and I were sent by Napoleon to decide the eye of the Italian lighted up, and he began to speak. 'General Kossuth,' he said, 'I am a Piedmontese all the town was alive with the news; the crowds accumulated under the hotel; the carriage arrived at the barrier; and a guard of honor was placed before the door. The Prince Napoleon arrived at the hotel, and he was received by the municipal authorities, and, as I believe, since it was Prince Napoleon who had to receive him, some of the guests of Kossuth would not divert the attention of the Italians."

A COCK AND BULL STORY ABOUT KOSSUTH.

The London Daily News publishes the following as a perfectly reliable financial clamour information between the interpreted publication by a Paris correspondent of the paper Napoleon with regard to Hungary. They will excite surprise, but the statement is made on authority which the account is derived, and the nature of their appearance is not inconsistent with the facts already known. It is announced that Kossuth was a passenger in the same train and interview with the French Monarch at headquarters, and that he had a long conversation with him, which was preceded are thus narrated: Colonel Nicolas Kou, who is residing at Turin, and who has received a large sum of fortune, conducted all the preliminary steps. Overtures were made to the Emperor by the Hungarian exiles in Kossuth, and he has, therefore, of late been constantly in and for interviews with the Emperor. In these he found it impossible to bring about an understanding, and the conversation terminated in a way that left the Emperor when his Majesty hesitated to give, and it was then determined that Kossuth should be dismissed. An interview of this kind took place on the 24th, and Kossuth left without his aid. Kossuth replied that if the Emperor would insist on giving him a written statement of the terms on which he would be willing to accept the Hungarian crown, he would do so. Napoleon accordingly wrote out the terms, and handed the paper to Kossuth, who left London for that city a few days before the departure of his Majesty for the seat of war. The terms are the following are the Emperor, and certain defined conditions were given during the interview. The Emperor would give Kossuth a corps d'armée, and arms and ammunition for an army of 100,000 men. The Emperor should issue the first proclamation to the Hungarian nation, and Kossuth should follow it up with a second. The Emperor should not be required to make any formal treaty with Kossuth, France should be the first officially to recognize the Hungarian Republic, and Kossuth should then obtain the same recognition from her allies. Such are the terms which Kossuth has taken back to Turin. Across as his part, to chosen her own form of government, and to make such terms with Austria as he might deem most desirable. 3. That the formation of a Hungarian legion should be immediately entrusted to Kossuth, that as a token of agreement to the foregoing, the Hungarian national colors should be adopted by the legion, and the management of which, Kossuth having given his word of honor that he would not make any use of it by with the adoption of this arrangement Kossuth received personal assurances from the Emperor that he would for the maintenance of a strict neutrality—a task which the public are aware he has effected by the issue of several severe public speeches in this country, he then left for Italy, and when he arrived at Alessandria he sent him to that, accompanied by Colonel Kou and Major Frey, to inform the Emperor of the result of his mission.

AUSTRIAN EXTORTIONS AT VENICE.

The Times correspondent writes: "The most distressing scenes took place on the 24th. The Austrians did not go on as they are much longer. We shall have open hostilities with them. They have begun to collect their landing-note. Some time since I received a letter from the letter at a large family—Germans and a progressive—who, under any ordinary Government, would be considered in affluence, and who are now reduced to the most pecuniary distress, and with the remainder without means of support for any whole family. The head of this family was a banker of the highest order of rank. We are reduced to genteel beggary. And now a fresh decree, a fresh loan of 50,000,000 florins (£5,000,000) is to be exacted from the Lombardo-Venetian Kingdom! Of this 50,000,000 florins, 10,000,000 are to be levied on Venice alone. I have heard how Verona plunder in their American times. Let them prosper those days."

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

The following letter has been addressed to the editor of the London Morning Chronicle:

"Sir—Considerable malicious advertisements having been put in circulation, with the object of injuring this enterprise, by creating an impression that the cable laid down between Newfoundland in August last, was incapable of transmitting messages between Ireland and Newfoundland, I should feel greatly obliged if you will do me the favor to record in your journal my solemn assurance that the following is a correct statement of the number of messages, words, and letters that passed through the Atlantic telegraph between the 16th of August and the 1st of September, inclusive:

"That there was a great many more is very simply to the fact, that the Newfoundland company had not completed the necessary arrangements for adjusting and regulating the novel apparatus at the landing-place and in the signal-room.

"The message actually recorded, emitting converses, during the period above named, was 271, containing, in detail, were as follows:

From Valentia to Newfoundland, 97 messages, containing 1,062 words, containing 6476 letters. From Newfoundland to Valentia, 129 messages, containing 1,270 words, containing 7,842 letters. Total, 369 messages, 2,332 words, 20,125 letters.

"Among these were some by the Governor-General, by the staff of the Europa's passengers after her collision with the Arabia, and by the Governor of Her Majesty's Warships to Halifax and Montreal respectively, by which latter a speedy reply was made to the receipt of this message.

FRANCE.

THE EMPEROR TAKES AN ACTIVE PART OF THE POPE.

An official condemnation by the Government of an article which appeared in the Univers newspaper in respect for the Papacy forms part of the programme which, the Emperor of the French has laid down for the settlement of the conflict of Princes is cast on those who condemn the Pope's Government, and who are the real enemies of the Pope's Government. The Siècle has replied to the Government's condemnation, and has declared its intention to do so. The Patrie also protests against the apprehension that the Pope's Government is to be forced upon it at Perugia.

LEADING BOYS IN THE WAY THEY MUST GO.

The Messager publishes a circular from M. Rouland, the Minister of Public Instruction, to the Rectors of Academies, explaining them to leave all the bulletins of the Empire of July and the Moniteur of the 1st of August, and by the 20 sections, as "result is open to make assistance, and the letter is to be sent to the Academies, and to make the dynastist that knew how to undertake them," etc.

LETHAL CHAMBER AT THE HOSPITALS.

A complaint was lately laid before the Tribunal of Correctional Police against M. Marmier, a surgeon of Paris, in a work called "Le Cancer," printed largely free of charge, and distributed to the poor at the hospitals (Hôtels de Schamp)," and against the printer and publisher of "Le Cancer," for having in the work in question, the surgery. M. Marmier, a literary man, proved that he is a surgeon of the Hospitals of Paris, and that for many years; that it contains a history of the captivity made to Theodore Ferdinand, Emperor of Abyssinia, and Orbelian, and a French woman, Madame Dunivey, and that the work in question is not a medical work, and that great part of that history had been copied verbatim from the work of Mr. Rochet, entitled "Abyssinia." M. Marmier, in his defense, stated that he had published his advice; that the details of the said captivity were published in the Moniteur, and in the Siècle newspaper in Europe, so that M. Merlieux had no exclusive right to publish it. M. Merlieux, the publisher, pleads for any writer, in relating them, not to imitate to a literary theft. The Court, after hearing the speeches of the two prisoners, whom he saw at Tiflis, had given him an outline of the captivity, and that he had published it in the book in question for all the additional details he could require, that the publication of the work was not acknowledged in fact-notes that he was indebted to the Moniteur and the Siècle, and that he had "not intended to appropriate to himself the work of Mr. Rochet," and added that the former continued so many letters at once from the Emperor, his printer and publisher 125 francs, and it condemned each of them to pay that amount.

WANTED TO SEE "EUGENY."

We read in the Evening Post: "Among our recent representations was one by a gentleman from Virginia at our Week. On his way to the scene of his diplomatic labors he had stopped at Washington, and called on the Secretary of State, who introduced him to the Attorney-General of Napoleon, by expressed a special desire to "see Eugeny." He was informed that there was no such person in the Emperor's household, and that Napoleon III. was the only Eugeny in France. At this time appointed our Western friend made his appearance expressing the greatest disappointment at the absence of the Iowa militia. He was formally presented to the Emperor as the Governor of Iowa, and duly accredited to the Court of Rome. The usual formal salutation having been performed, the Governor proceeded to business.

"I'm proud to make yer acquaintance, ma'am," said our Governor, "and I'm sorry I've come so late to see the fun. I've got a thousand men in the field, all raised within two days in Yeurrup, and seen pretty much all the men and boys in the State. I've got a splendid body of men, and they're the very first man in Yeurrup—the very first, by a long sight. I'm sorry I've come so late to see the fun, and miss the very finest. That are monstrous friend of ours in Judge Douglas, of Illinois, and I tell yer he's a first-rate judge of wimmin, he is."

THE MASSACRE AT PERUGIA.

Mr. Perkins, the American gentleman who was in Perugia during the late revolt, says that the inhabitants barbarously cooked and plundered it, furnishes the following particulars: "The soldiers entered the town about eight and day along the road with very short rations; they had been marching and fighting for several days, and were famished. Their officers could not control them at all, where they had probably first struck the high road, they entered the houses and forced the people to cook for all their wine, so that they were maddened and furious with excitement and drink. Their officers could not, if it in the inn was ransacked, two hundred the pillage of the town had then been completed. The people of the town began to commit such outrages, for, once within the gates, their self-control was entirely destroyed. Many of them they first rifled and left into the shops and houses, and about ten hours after the soldiers had commenced to do so, the people began to do the same. Mr. Perkins and the inn was ransacked, two hundred several, and made their escape.

THE ATTACK ON THE HOTEL.

"At the end of that time a party of Austrians who were calling out it was an inn; and, knowing aware that the people had been plundering it, they entered in great danger, the whole of our party went into an inner room on the top of the house, and, as the only way to be concealed ourselves in a long narrow closet, into the which we crowded ourselves to the number of seven, and one of the servant women. Our own family consisted of my gentleman, four ladies, and two servants, so that we were all crowded into a place not more than ten feet wide. We remounded ourselves to God; moreover, and prepared ourselves for death. The minutes of awful suspense and they were in the room, and, hunting upon the door, they presented their bayonets. These those they threatened us; they were like wild beasts, and in order to prevent them from breaking in, one of the ladies had thrown herself on her knees the keyed portion of the door when her servant maid was beside, as

Swiss soldier rushed forward, crying, 'Shame, to kill women!' and thrusting aside the bayonets of the first opened the others by telling them we would give them what we had about us, and after taking our watches and what money we chanced to have they left the room. The good fellow, several, said he would defend us, but that they were mad with wine, fatigue, and hunger.

SLAUGHTER OF WORKS AND CHILDREN.

"A half hour of tranquility, and we heard another party coming through the house, and just before they reached our room the good fellow in whom we saw our first friend in the Austrian army, cried out, 'Hello, Mike! Are you there?' and again we were hidden for an hour. These last comers completely ravaged the house, and the manner of the Austrian rules was unarmed, endeavoring to expostulate with them, and to prevent them from doing more than they had already done. It was a monstrous. One soldier was only prevented from setting fire to the two great wooden doors of the house-entrance by the wretched with him while they ran to us. Two different times we were obliged to hide ourselves, and about nine o'clock they were allowed to sack and plunder the house; and in one room that they entered the wife of the house mother had placed a cockade upon it. Seven women and children were in the room, and the mother of the household—children of the Saint Padre. Desolation the room was soon filled with drunken soldiers, who, with such sympathy as their remarkable desires for a portion of that evil liberty which they had left their homes to fight for, South Italy, to Austria, to Hungary, to Poland, to Bohemia, and to the same naval retribution through the Dardanelles, and to the same end of self-sacrifice of Christ, such cruel and bloody slaughter should have been the result of their efforts to establish it. Even the Medici de Ferro not to this awful whole table; chairs, benches, every thing was destroyed, and the wine and beer casks were broken open and every thing despoiled. Then they began to search for money, and in the midst of the confusion of the passport, which I providentially had with me, and which I immediately had put in my pocket. Then they began to search along the streets next morning we saw the bodies lying in the gutters."

EXECUTIONS AT NAPLES.

The following is the substance of the letter addressed by Mr. Gladstone to the new King:

"Sire—At the moment of your accession, when the hearts of many are full of hope, and when the eyes and joy so recently awakened throughout the world are turned upon you, a young prisoner, who has been in your dominions are directed. The dungeons of the Penitenzia are coming to be filled with victims of the most cruel tyranny. There are, as never again to be related up. Years have been buried in your feet. It has been governed by the laws of your Cesare of the North, but in our desires, stronger than your dominions. Your father, the late King of the Two Sicilies, seem to at the feet of the either of the avenging Angel, and to have been permitted to go down to the grave unchanging in the midst of a sea of glorious funeral blood. Will you not spare a few of these? Will you not listen to the voice of your own heart, and to the voice of God, and cause! An idea, when it is granted—when it is established—is a principle—and a principle is a power. Invoke of despotism, which turn against those who wield them, and turn it into a blessing. Sire, I am not the first in the country struck Henry IV., Louis XVI., the Duc de Berri, Philip II. of Orleans, and, I will add, the Duke of your father. In the soul of Bomba! and of Milano de' Torri, and of Ferdinand I. himself. Why should you alone do these heinous history? The Constitution recently granted by you is a great act. It is a great concession. It is a gift—a gift, indeed, of solidarity, tyrannical, despotic: a national army, great and powerful, and a free-holding tenantry, and a free people. Your subjects are Italian: in your veins run the noble blood of Savoy, and within the bosom of the country that is the land of olden upon your land, now is the acceptable time! Happy, if you, if you will, be the instrument of these great ages, if beholding, you forget who you are. Remember that your father died a violent death, and that you, also, are of fear, that his dwelling was a rock, fit subject for the lightning's stroke. Remember that he left you a throne, and that you have not to leave forgotten the 23d of May. Finance is in disorder, and the army is the master of the nation. Do not, I pray you, follow the malediction of God hang over the head of the imprudent Rehoboam. The counsels of the young men have been followed—counsels of violence—justice sold—the dungeons filled. Sire, I am a man of peace, and I am not a hasty, and an echo in the magnanimous heart of the conqueror of Solferino. Sire, I implore you, in the recollection that we are Italians will avenge the outrages of our country, and the cause of civilization and of the Italians. Considers' Dender."

THE ARMY DISBANDED FROM MILAN.

A letter from Milan, of the 29th ult., gives some details of the movement which has been made in the city against the Jesuits: "The evening before last the people of Milan, in a manifestation of indignation against the Jesuits, who, after having been kept away from Milan by the Austrian Government, had returned after its bishop, were recalled in 1853, and protected by the Police and Austrian troops, in the Church of Sant' Alessandro. The people were much irritated against the body, whom public opinion accused of having been the principal instigators of the martial law that would be established in Milan, and of the doors of the convent but for the intervention of upon the Jesuits themselves, who gave orders to the municipal guards. A search of their house was, however, allowed, and there in reality was found a great deal of compromising character were found there, since on the following day a large number of proclamations were in the country. This decree is necessary, in conformity with the Code of Piedmont, which declares that the Jesuits and the Dames du Sacre Cœur were ordered away from the city. The people, on hearing of the arrival of the troops, met in the square before the national guard and the Jesuits' house, some distance from the house of the Jesuits, formed a guard of honor to receive them, and put a key into the lock to open it. The national guard had also taken with them a band of music, and, in this way, "I am entering my home." What are you going to do?" asked the people. "I am going to my home, and he was going to my room; but the national guard thought he was not going to his room, but to that of the Jesuit, and pocket and walk the priest of to the question. It is said that the Emperor of the Austrians will not be able to have defiled their Jesuit dress and are concealed in Milan.

SWEDEN.

DEATH OF KING OSCAR.

A telegram from Stockholm announces the death of Oscar, King of Sweden and Norway. The deceased was on the 4th of July, after an illness which had lasted-for some time. Oscar was born on the 4th of July, and was most since September, 1857. King Oscar was the son of Bernadotte, who was elected heir to the throne of Sweden in 1844. Born in Paris in 1799, he was placed at the age of 15 in the military school of that city, and on the expulsion of his father to the throne his studies were interrupted by the political events which followed. He was married in 1823 to Josephine Beauharnais, daughter of Eugene Beauharnais, Duke of Leuchtenberg. In 1824 he acquired a position of the first rank by his marriage to the Swedish Army. In July, 1818, he married Josephine Beauharnais, Duke of Leuchtenberg, daughter of Eugene Beauharnais, Duke of Leuchtenberg. In 1844 he succeeded to the throne of his father, and in 1844 he received

THE BATTLE OF SOLFERINO.

We publish herewith two engravings of the battle of Solferino, from drawings by the Chevalier Giacomelli. These pictures will render the published accounts intelligible.

We have already described the battle at some length. In this place it will be sufficient to give the Austrian account of the battle as communicated to the Times by their correspondent at the Austrian head-quarters, with an extract from the Daily News in reference to the burial of the dead. The Times correspondent writes:

"For up to the north rose the hills on the side of which stands the town of Castiglione, the domes of which were visible to the naked eye. The sun alternately shone out in overpowering brilliancy, anon concealed itself behind clouds over the field of battle. Lists as vast, as enormous a congregation of men engaged in a deadly struggle, I had never seen. The small puffs of the musketry exploding were lost in the immensity of the landscape. It was only when volleys of artillery followed each other in rapid succession that the smoke took a distinct form. It was soon lost, however, in the general haze, and only broken again by the white parabolas of rockets, of which the Austrians were making considerable use. The forms of the men were lost to the eye in the vast proportions of the fight, and it was only when heavy masses lay together, or when they assumed an aggregate shape, that any conception could be obtained of their presence. With a telescope one could see, as it were, myriads of men on each side fighting at all points; dead bodies of men and horses strewn on the ground, with the wreck of uniforms and arms; but to the naked eye it seemed as if a vast anthill were in motion—men scarcely appeared to be, by doubtless are, in encounters of such magnitude.

"The movements of the contending armies had been as follows: At six o'clock in the morning the Piedmontese, who occupied the left of the allied position, advanced against the 5th corps under Benedek, while the French attacked the 9th under Stadion on the heights of Solferino. These movements were no sooner commenced on the French left than the Austrians moved on their left also, the 3d corps, under Schwarzenberg, advancing on the road to Castiglione through Guidizzolo; the 9th, under Schaffgotsch, on the parallel road to Medole. The latter had hardly moved a mile from its bivouac when it met the enemy in front at Medole. Schwarzenberg sent two batteries forward on the Campo di Medole, where the French, as I before observed, had placed three batteries in a crescent, the two extreme or horns of which placed the Austrians under a cross fire. On the heights of Solferino, not to the Austrian right, the attack of the French and Piedmontese was regulated with severe loss, several prisoners falling into the hands of the Austrians. The corps Schaffgotsch successfully advanced, and fought its way in the direction of Medole, but Schwarzenberg's battalion had got into a position in which they were incurring serious losses, and it was found necessary to withdraw them. In order to do this Mondolfi's brigade of cavalry moved out to the right of Schwarzenberg into the plain, and advanced towards the French batteries, thus drawing upon itself part of the fire which was then pouring so heavily upon the Austrian guns. While the latter retired the cavalry charged a party of French cavalry, which it is said to have terribly cut up, and finally fell upon a square of French infantry. It was done at the price of heavy losses. Scores of men and horses fell, and two squadrons of Hussars I saw returning reduced to thirty men. The Austrian guns, however, were now in a position in rear of that which they had previously occupied, reopened fire, and the 3d corps endeavored to advance on the plain and take the French artillery with the bayonet. This they failed, however, to accomplish, and ultimately they had to fall back. From that moment, however, till late in the day the cannonade on that point continued fast and furious. As for the Austrian cavalry, it appeared no more on the field, and for as I could see. It was now past nine o'clock; and though the first attack of the allies on the Austrian right had failed, from the palisatby with which the 5th and 5th corps had repelled it, the French and Piedmontese were but too well aware that Solferino was the key of the Austrian position to spare efforts for carrying it. The French Grenadiers several times made their way to the very top of the rock on which stands 'the spy tower,' but were repeatedly repulsed by the 1st corps, which had been thrown forward from Cavriana to Solferino to strengthen the 5th, then beginning to show symptoms of failure.

"The French, however, continued their efforts, and pressed Solferino, not only in front, but on both flanks. Under cover of the terrific artillery fire which they kept up in the plain of Medole—a fire which had already forced Schwarzenberg to fall back—and while Schaffgotsch was merely, as it ressed, keptin play on the Medole road, the French advanced two heavy divisions from their front to San Cassiano. These were soon lost sight of in the open, and doubtless acted as a column of assault in flank upon Solferino. Till about half past one o'clock the Austrians had repulsed every attack except one. They held firmly at Solferino, at Medole, and on the extreme right of the position, but it soon became obvious that they were rapidly being outdone. The Emperor of Austria, after paying a flying visit to Volta, was now standing with his staff on the hill in front of the last-named village. As it became necessary to give the order for a retreat, which was accordingly done at three o'clock in the afternoon. It was just at this moment that the position of Cavriana was assailed. The French from Solferino began shelling it at short range, and it was no longer a fit place for the Emperor or his staff. The Emperor, leaving his staff at a farm-yard on the road to Volta, turned back with a chosen few, and looked on while a last effort was made to fight for the possession of Cavriana. The last effort was made, but to no purpose. Nearer and nearer fell the French shells, till one actually cracked over the head of the Emperor, and another burst in the middle of the staff. The order for a general retreat had in the mean time been carried out, and while the Emperor and the Archduke rallied by a cross-road to Valleggio the Imperial army began to withdraw toward Mantua."

The correspondent of the Daily News writes on the 27th of June:

"The thousands who fell on the memorable day of Friday but were not yet all buried, so that I could see with my own eyes the dreadful and heart-rending traces of that battle of giants. Many gallant fellows, who are now at rest, can be seen here and at San Martino stripped naked, and waiting for their last receptacle, which the grave-diggers are preparing for them. The number of bodies being so great, hundreds of peasants of Rivoltella, San Pietro, San Martino, Solferino, and Cavriana, were enlisted to perform that painful duty. The scene presented by this accursed field is still more affecting than that of Magenta. Not only was the slaughter far greater, but the intense heat of the season has corrupted the bodies to a dreadful extent, and all the noble features of men's faces have been hideously decomposed by the process of putrefaction. As you may easily imagine, the stench has polluted the air to such a degree, that the surrounding villages are in great danger of typhus. Some cases of that terrible disease have already been noticed in the neighboring villages delle Stivere."

A Good Fight.

CHAPTER III.

"Tree soup is hot," said Gerard.

"But how are we to swallow it?" inquired the senior, despondingly.

"Father, the young man has brought us straws." And Margaret smiled slyly.

"Ay, ay!" said the old man; "but my poor bones are stiff, and, indeed, the fire is too hot for a body to kneel over with these short straws. St. John the Baptist! but the young man is afeist."

For while he stated his difficulty Gerard removed it. He untied in a moment the knot on his breast, took his hat off his back, put three stones into the corner, then, wrapping his hand in the tail of his jerkin, whipped the flask off the fire, wedged it in between the stones, and put the hat under the old man's nose with a merry smile. The other tremulously inserted the pipe of rye-straw and sucked. Lo and behold his wan, drawn face was seen to light up more and more, till it quite glowed; and, as soon as he had drawn a long breath,

"Hippocrates and Galen!" he cried, "'tis a soups au vin"—the restorative of restoratives.

Now, if the 'soupe au vin' had been known in Troy, it is clear that in declining 'vinum merum' upon that scene, he would have added in the next hexameter, 'But a "soupe au vin," madam, I will dogust, and gratefully.' Not only would this have been but common civility—a virtue no perfect commander is wanting in—but not to have done it would have proved him a shallow and improvident person, quite unfit to be trusted with the conduct of a war; for seen going into battle need sustenance and all possible support, as is proved by this—that foolish generals, bringing hungry soldiers to battle with full ones, have been defeated, in all ages, by inferior numbers. The Romans lent a great battle in the north of Italy to Hannibal the Carthaginian, by this neglect alone. Now this divine elixir gives in one moment force to the limbs and ardor to the spirits; and taken into Hector's body at the nick of time, would, by the aid of Phœbus, Venus, and the blessed saints, have most likely procured the Greeks a defeat. For note how faint and weary and heart-sick I was a minute ago; well, I sack this celestial cordial, and now lolloild me leave as Achilles and strong as an eagle."

"Oh, Father! now, an eagle!"

"Girl, I defy thee and all the world. Ready, I say, like a foaming charger, to devour the space between this and Rotterdam, and strong to combat

"No, it belongs to us both now. Let us divide it."

"By all means; you have a knife."

"No, I will not cut it—that would be unlucky. I'll bite it. There. I shall keep my half; you will burn yours the moment you get home, I doubt."

"You know me not. I waste nothing. It is odds but I make a hair-pin of it, or something."

This answer dashed the novice Gerard instead of provoking him to fresh efforts, and he was silent. And now, the bread and soup being disposed of, the old scholar prepared to continue his journey. Then came a little difficulty. Gerard, the adroit, could not tie his ribbon again as Catherine had tied it. Margaret, after shyly eying his efforts for some time, offered to help him; for at her age girls love to be coy and tender, saucy and gentle, by turns, and she saw the lad put him out of countenance but now. Then a fair head, with its stately crown of auburn hair, glossy, and glowing through silver, bowed sweetly toward him; and, while it ravished his eye, two white supple hands played delicately upon the stubborn ribbon, and moulded it with soft and airy touches. Then a heavenly thrill ran through the innocent young man, and vague glimpses of a new world of feeling and sentiment opened on him. And these new and exquisite sensations Margaret unwittingly prolonged; it is not natural to her sex to hurry aught that pertains to the sacred toilet. Nay, when the taper fingers had at last subjugated the ends of the knot, her mind was not quite easy, till, by a manœuvre peculiar to the female hand, she had made her palm convex, and so applied it with a gentle pressure to the centre of the knot—a sweet little coaxing hand-bike, as much as to say, "Now be a good knot, and stay as you are." The palm-kiss was bestowed on the ribbon, but the wearer's heart leaped to meet it.

"There, that is how it was," said Margaret, and drew back to take one last keen survey of her work; then looking up for simple approval of her skill, received full in her eyes a longing gaze of such ardent adoration as made her lower them quickly and color all over. An indescribable tremor seized her, and she retreated with downcast lashes and tell-tale cheeks, and took her father's arm on the opposite side. Gerard, blushing at having seared her with his eyes, took the other arm; and so the two young things went side-by-side and conscious, and propped the eagle along in silence.

They entered Rotterdam by the Schiedamse Poort; and as Gerard was unacquainted with the town, Peter directed him the way to the Hotel Stadt, in which the Stadtheuse was. He himself was going with Margaret to his cousin, in the Oester-Waagen Straet; so almost on entering the gate their roads lay apart. They bade each other a friendly adieu, and Gerard dived into the great town. A profound, an aching sense of solitude, fell upon him, yet the streets were crowded. Then he lamented too late that, out of delicacy, he had not asked his late companions who they were and where they lived.

"Bedrew my shanefacedness!" said he. "But their names and their breeding were shown their means, and something whispered me they would not be known. I shall never see her more. Oh! weary world, I hate you and your ways. To think I must meet beauty and goodness and learning—three pearls of price—and never see them more!"

Falling into this sad reverie, and letting his body go where it would, he lost his way; but presently meeting a crowd of persons all moving in one direction, he mingled with them, for he argued they must be making for the Stadthouse. Soon the noisy troop that contained the manly Gerard emerged, and upon the Stadthouse, but upon a large meadow by the side of the Mane; and then the attraction was at once revoked. Games of all sorts were going on: wrestling, the game of palm, the quintain, legerdemain, archery, tumbling, in which art, I blush to say, women as well as men performed, to the great delectation of the company. There was also a trained bear, which stood on his head, and stood upright and bowed with prodigious gravity to his master, and a hare that beat a drum, and a cock that strutted on little stilts diabolically. These things made Gerard laugh now and then; but the gay scene could not really enliven it, for his heart was not in tune with it. So hearing a young man say to his fair, how that the Duke had lain in the meadow, but was gone to the Studthouse to entertain the burgomasters and aldermen and other dignitaries of the brizes, and their friends, he suddenly remembered he was hungry, and made his way into a tent where a number of people were sitting down to sup with a prince. He left the river side, and this time he found the Hoosh Street, and it speedily led him to the Studthouse. When he got to the door, he was refused, first at one door, then at another, till he came to the great gate of the court-yard. It was kept by soldiers, and superintended by a pompous major-domo, glittering in an embroidered collar and a gold chain of office, and holding a white staff with a gold knob. There was a crowd at the gate of persons entreating to be admitted into the rock. They came up in turn like ripples, and retired to make way for others equally unsuccessful. It cost Gerard a struggle to get near to the gate when he got within hoot-hoot of the gate, he saw something that made his heart leap. It was Count Peter, with Margaret on his arm, soliciting humbly for entrance.

"My cousin the alderman is not at home. They say he is here."

"What is that to me, old man?"

"If you will not let us pass in to him, at least take this leaf from my tablet to my cousin. See, I have written his name: he will come out to us."

"For what do you take me? I carry no messages. I keep the gate."

He then barked, in a stentorian voice, inexorably:

"No strangers enter here but the competitors and their companies."

"Come, old man," cried a voice in the crowd, "you have gotten your answer; make way."

Margaret turned half round imploringly:

"Good people! we are come from far, and my father is old: and my cousin has a new servant who knows us not, and would not let us sit in our cousin's house."

At this the crowd laughed heartily. Margaret shrank as if they had struck her. At that moment a hand grasped her—such a grasp: it felt like heart meeting heart, or magnet steel. She turned, quickly round at it, and it was Gerard. Such a little cry of joy and appeal came from her bosom, and she began to speak precipitately.

They had hustled her and frightened her for one thing; and her rough, thoughtless ones in not even telling his servant they were coming was cruel; and the servant's caution, however wise and faithful to his master, was bitterly unjust to her father and her. And to her—so mottled, and anxious and jealous—came Gerard, like kind hand and face. "How like lucrinus."

All is well now," remarked a coarse humorist: "she has gotten her sweet-heart."

"How! have I how?" went the crowd.

She dropped Gerard's hand hastily, and turned round with eyes flashing through her tears:

"I have no sweet-heart, you rude men. But I am friendless in your town: this man, and this is a friend; and one who knows, what you know not, how to treat the aged and the weak."

The crowd was dead silent. They had only been thoughtless, and now felt the rebuke, though severe, was just. The silence enabled Gerard to treat with the porter.

"I am a competitor, Sir."

"What is your name?" and the man eyed him suspiciously.

"Gerard, the son of Gerard."

The janitor inspected a slip of parchment he held in his hand:

"Gerard Gerardsson can enter."

"With as many companions then you?"

"Nay; there are not your company: they came before you."

"What matter? they are my friends, and without them I go not in."

"Stay without, then."

"That will I not."

"That we will see."

"We will, and speedily."

Gerard then raised a voice of astounding volume and power, and shouted, so that the whole street rang:

"Ho! Philip Earl of Holland!"

"Are you mad?"

"Here is one of your varlets defies you."

"Hush, hush!"

"And will not let your guests pass in."

"Hush! murder! The Duke's there! I'm dead!" cried the janitor, quaking.

Then suddenly trying to overpower Gerard's thunder, he shouted with all his might:

"Open the gate, ye knaves! Way there for Gerard Gerardsson and his company! The feasting is waiting!"

The gate swung open as by magic. Eight soldiers lowered their pikes and formed a sort of arch, under which the victorious three marched in triumphant. The moment they had passed the pikes clashed together horizontally in the gateway, and all but pinned an abdominal citizen that sought to be of Gerard's company unbidden.

Once passed the guarded portal, a few steps brought the trio upon a scene of Oriental luxury. The court-yard was laid out in tables loaded with rich meats, and literally sowed and piled with gorgeous cloth. Guests in rich and various costumes sat beneath a lofty canopy of fresh-cut branches fastened tastefully to golden, silver, and blue silken cords that traversed the area; and fruits of many hues, including some artificial ones of gold, silver, and wax, hung pendant, or peered in the fair eyes, among the green leaves of plane-trees and limetrees. The Duke's minstrels swept their lutes at intervals, and a fountain played red Burgundy in six jets that met and battled in the air. The evening sun darted its fires through them bright and purple wine spouts, making them jets and cascades of molten rubies, then passing on, tinged with the blood of the grape, shed crimson glories here and there on fair faces, snowy beards, velvet, satin, and jewels. Then it fell, and sparkled, ruby red, sparkling glass. Gerard and his friends stood dazzled, spell-bound. Presently a whisper went round them, "Salute the Duke! Salute the Duke!" They looked up, and there on high, under the dais, was their sovereign, bidding them welcome with a kindly wave of the hand. The men bowed low, and Margaret curtsied with a deep and graceful obeisance. The Duke's hand sung up he gave it another turn, and pointed the new-comers out to the head of valley. Instantly seven of his people, with an obedient start, went headlong at our friends, seized them at a table, and put fifteen many-colored soups before them, in little silver bowls, and as many wines in crystal vases.

"Nay, father, do not let us eat until we have thanked our good friend," said Margaret, now first recovering from all this bustle.

"Girl, he is our guardian angel."

Gerard put his face into his hands.

"Tell me when you have done," said he, "and I will respeper and have my supper, for I am hungery. I know which of us three is the happiest at meeting again.

"Mo?" inquired Margret.

"No" repeated Gerard.

"Father?"

"No."

"Then I have no idea which it can be:" and she gave a little crow of happiness and gayety. The soup was tasted, and vanished in a twirl of fourteen hands, and fish came on the table in a dozen forms, but pattens of lobster and almonds mixed, and of almonds and cream, and an immense variety of "drouts," known to us as "rissoles." The next trifle was a wild boar, which smelled divine. Why, then, did Margaret start away from it with two shrieks of dismay, and pinch so good a friend as Gerard? Because the Duke's "cuisinier" had been too clever; had made this excellent dish too suprisingly like as well as natural. He had restored to the animal, by elaborate mimicry with sauces and other edible colors, the hair and bristles he had rubbed him of by fire and water. To make him still more enticing, the huge tusks were carefully preserved in the forty jaw, and gave his mouth that winning smile you may have noticed as a result of tusk in man or beast, and two eyes of colored sugar gloved in his head. St. Argus! what eyes! so bright, so blood-shot, so unspeakably fiendish! It was an awful, an appalling movement. But, indeed, I need the pencil of Doré or Grandville to make you see the two gilt valets on the opposite side of the table putting the monster down before our friends, with a smiling, self-satisfied, yet modest countenance under the ghastly monster was the flower of all comestibles; and further changes both hands in this production of it; Margaret wheeling round with horror-stricken eyes and her hand on Gerard's shoulder, squealing and shaking; his face of delight when he, being pinched, the grizzle brute glaring solidly ahead, and the two gentlemen in charge as ever.

"What's to do?" shouted the Duke, hearing the signals of distress. Seven of his people with a zealous start went headlong and told him. He laughed, and said, "Give her of the beef-stuffing, then, and bring me Sir Boar." Benevolent monarch! The beef-stuffing was his own private dish.

On these grand occasions an ox was roasted whole, and reserved for the poor. But there was as well as charitable prince had discovered, that whatever venison, hares, lambs, poultry, etc., you skewered into that beef cavern got cooked to perfection, retaining their own juices, and avoiding those of the rocking ox. These he called his beefstuffing, and took delight therein, as did now our trio; for a hot wind seven of his people went headlong, and drove silver tridents into the steaming carte at random, and speared a kid, a cygnet, and a flock of wild fowl. These presently smoked before Gerard and company, and Peter's face, profoundly sad and slightly morose at the loss of the savage leg, expanded and shone. After this, feasting different tarts of fruits and jellies, and all of all confectionery on a Titanic scale—cathedrals for dinner, all gilt and painted in the interstices of the bas-reliefs; castles, with their moats and ditches, imitated to the life; elephants, camels, toads; knights on horseback jousting; kings and princesses looking on; trumpeters blowing; and all these characters delicious eating, and Provezins filled with sweet-scented juices—works of art made to be destroyed. The guests breached a bastion, crunched a crusader and his horse and lance, or cracked a bishop, cope, chasuble, crozier and all, as remorselessly as we do a carraway comfit; sipping, meanwhile, hypocras and other spiced drinks, and Greek and Corsican wines, while the harp and two little fiddles, richly tortured, spangled, jeweled, and gilt, came offering an hundred kine golden troupes of rose-water and orange-water to keep the guests' hands cool and perfumed.

Gerard now before any party arrived at this final stage appetite had succumbed, and one or two circumstances had occurred, apparently trifling. Gerard had suddenly remembered he was the lover of a letter to the Princess Marie, and, in an under tone, had spoken of the intricacies of the would undertake to deliver it. The man took it with a slight assurance: "He could not deliver it himself, but would instantly give it to one of the princess's suite, several of whom were about."

"Which? which? have you seen any of my work?"

"I? no. But you will gain a prize."

"I hope so: but what makes you think so?"

"Because you were so good to my father."

Gerard smiled at the feminine logic, and hung his head at the sweet praise, and was silent.

"Don't speak," murmured Margaret. "They say that is a world of sin and misery. Can that be? What is your opinion?"

"No! that is all a silly old song," explained Gerard, with a flash of a by-gone elderly keep reputing out of custom—it is not true."

"How can it be? Men are not a bit a child," said Margaret, with pensive dignity.

"Why, only look round." And then I thought I had lost you—forever; and you ran on by my side; and now the minstrels are going to play again. Sin and misery? Pooh, pooh! and nonsense!"

"What do you admire most of all these beautiful things, Gerard?"

"You know my name? How is that?"

"Whilst many men are a while."

"Angels are never witches. But I can't think how you—"

"Hoosh boy! was it not cried at the gate loud enough to deave one?"

"So it was. Where is my head? What do I admire most? If you will sit a little more that way I'll tell you."

"Yes!"

"Yes! so that the light may fall on you. There, so you are. Margaret, you know you are beautiful then I could have conceived; but the finest of all, to my eye, is your lovely hair in its own form, as it was when you sang to the Queen of Heaven? Oh, Gerard! I thought you were a good young man!"

"So I am. But I can't help having eyes—and a heart—Margaret."

"Gerard!"

"Don't be angry!"

"Nay, it is likely I'm!"

"I love you."

"Oh for shame! you must not say that to me."

"I can't help it. I love you. I love you."

"Hush, hush! for pity's sake! I must not listen to such words from a stranger. I am ungrateful to call you a stranger. Oh, how one may to mistakes! If I had known you were so told—" And Margaret's bosom began to heave, and her cheeks were covered with blushes, and she looked toward her father, and very much like a timid thing that meditates actual flight.

Then Gerard was frightened at the alarm he caused. "Forgive me," said he, imploringly. "How could any one help loving you?"

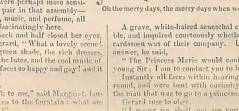
"Well, Sir, I will try and forgive you—you are so good in other respects"; but then you must promise never to say you—to my dear again."

"Give me hand, then, or you don't forgive me."

She hesitated; but eventually put out her hand a very little way, very slowly. He took it, and held it prisoner. When she thought it had been there long enough, she tried gently to draw it away. He held it tight: it submitted quite patiently to his pen. What is the use resisting force? She turned her head away, and her long eyelashes drooped sweetly. Gerard lost nothing by his promise. Words are not needed here: and silence was more eloquent. Nature was in that day what she is to-day: but manners were somewhat first. Then, as now, virgins drew back ashamed at the first words of love; but of prudery and artificial coyness there was little. The two young ones read one another's hearts. Every thing was in Gerard's favor: his good looks had secured him his goodness, his gratitude; and, at the Duke's intercession, his swollen summer eye, all things disposed the female mind to favor him; and then he came to the heart by open; the senses were so soothed and subdued with lovely colors, gentle sounds, and delicate odors; this sun gently shining, the warm air, the quiet canopy, the cool music of the new violet fountain.

Margaret and Margaret, all hand in hand in silence, and Gerard's eyes sought hers lovingly: and hers were shy, and then stole on him timidly and imploringly, and two sweet, unutterable tears rolled down her cheeks, and she smiled deliciously ere she could speak.

And the sun declined; and the air cooled; and the fountain splashed more gayly; and the night throbbed in unison and silence, and this weary world was heaven to them.



A grave, white-haired seneschal came to the table, and inquired courteously whether Gerard Gerardsson was one of their company. Upon Gerard's answer, he said,

"The Princess Marie would confer with you, young Sir; I am to conduct you to her presence."

Instantly all faces within hearing turned sharp round, and were bent with curiosity and envy on the man that was to go to a princess.

Gerard rose to obey.

"I wager we shall not see you again," said Margaret, calmly, but coloring a little.

"That will you," was the reply; then he whisowed in her ear, "This is my good princess, but you are my queen." He added aloud, "Will you not, I pray you? I will presently return."

"Ay, sir!" said Peter, who had just awoke.

Gerard gone, the pair whose dress was so homely, yet they were with the man whom the princes sent for, became the envy of neighboring eyes; observing which, William Johnston came forward, acted surprise, and claimed his relations. "And I think that there was I at your backs, and you saw me not."

"Pardon me, Cousin Johnston, I saw you long since," said Margaret, coldly.

"You saw me, and spoke not to me?"

"Ay, cousin, it was best so. We come to Rotterdam, as it is for us to welcome you at Scotsgreen. Your servant denied us a seat in your carriage."

"The idiot!"

"And I had a mind to see whether it was 'like and like master:' for there is sooth in 'ly-words.'"

William Johnston laughed gayly. He saw Margaret was keen, and suspected him. He did the wisest thing under the circumstances—trusted to deeds, not words. He insisted on their coming home with him at once, and he would show them whether they were welcome to Rotterdam or not.

"We doubt it, cousin? Who doubts it?" said the scholar.

Margaret blushed him graciously, but demurred to the visit. She said she wanted to hear the mountain again. In short a quarrel was imminent, when Gerard reappeared, and bade her observe that many of the guests had left. Then her real manners came out.

"It were ill manners to our friend, and he will hear us. He knows our rank, and will pardon us then, and the city is large, and we have parted company once already."

"Oh!" said Johnson, "we will provide for that. My young man—ahem! I mean my secretary—shall sit here and wait, and bring you to me at my house. He shall bring you, I will go with you, sir."

"Cousin, we shall be too burdensome."

"Nay, nay; you shall see whether you are welcome or not—yes and your friend, too, and you shall be friended, if need be; and I shall hear what the princess would with him."

Margaret felt a thrill of joy that Gerard should be lodged under the same roof with her; then she had a slight misgiving.

"But if your young man should be thoughtless and go play, and Gerard miss him—"

"He go play! He knows this spot where I put him and bid him stay? He Stand forth, Hans Clotzman!"

A dgeat clad in black serge and dark violet hose got up and took two steps, and stood before them, without seeming a question addressed to another young man, the very statue of gravity and stanched propriety. At his aspect Margaret's misgivings subsided; she could hardly keep her countenance. But she disquieted Johnston:

"I would put my hand in the fire for him! We are at your command, cousin, as soon as you have given him his orders."

Hans was then instructed to sit at the table and wait for Gerard, and conduct him to Oosterwyk Street. He replied, "I will do so, sir, and not fail" after all your travel," said Margaret. This boil ten in her mind all along.

Hans Clotzman sat waiting for Gerard, solemn and business-like. The minutes flew by, but excited no impatience in that perfect young man. Johnston did him no more than justice when he laughed to scorn the idea of his secretary leaving his post or neglecting his duty in pursuit of sport, or out of youthful high spirits and folly.

As Gerard was long in coming, the patient Hans—his employer's eye being upon him—read the Rotterdam exotic remedy," improved the time by spelling solemnly, silently, and at short not quarterly-measured intervals, through a Dutch newspaper. The wine was strong, so was Clotzman's head: and it was not until he had finished the paper, a good hour the modest secretary had imbibed the notion that cessation expected of Clotzman to finish the breath of all good fellows, and "consumed of the Dukes of Burgundy, there present. With this view his chief had dismissed him rather tragerly, but solemnly and slowly. Having finished his full height, he instantly rolled upon the grass, golded in hand and foot, and fell asleep as many an noble, but not disturbing a muscle in his wise long face, which, in the total eclipse of reason, retained its gravity, prinness, and infallibility.

ONE YEAR OF MY LIFE.

You can not know Leonah—you can not know me as I knew her. You are not one of those literary-writers, I say she has golden hair, a blue eye, and perfect grace: what if she has? Many are like the lark's at dawn, or the sighing of the summer wind through dancing ferns, and her step as free and graceful as any woman's. Many women are these can not, although I swear with most perfect fervor, bring to your mind any thing more than a mere vague outline of that image which dwells forever in my soul.

While yet a novice in the art of mechanism I went to live with the mother of her whom my heart loveth, next to God, to love dream and do homage to. So it was that, one day upon my travels, seeking, like the German handwerks-burschen, a place to advance myself in my trade, and rest for the body as well, it happened that, strolling up and down the street listlessly, I saw, looking out at me from passing soldiers, a mild and placid face, so calm and benevolent in its expression that I instinctively drew near to her, asking that for which I sought.

As if satisfied with her examination of me, she said, "I think where you came from, or whom you are, young man, but you look honest, and I am rarely deceived in my speculations. If you are pleased to take up with our accommodations, you are welcome to abide with us as long as you may in town. Therefore, your hingeses this evening, and I will have a room ready for you where you can be alone," and then she took the handle of the door in her hand, and I bowed myself out.

With a light heart I flew away back to the hotel, which but a little while ago had seemed so dull and gloomy to me, and with the decline of day it was evident that my fortune was to be the best for advantages.

It was in the summer when I first became an inmate of her house; and summer it was, not only in the air and in the waving branches and in the chirps of the birds, but in the flowers blooming and singing about the door, but in all our hearts, for a kind and benevolent mistress and friend had rendered a sweet and goodly crop of all the virtues which make life fair and pleasant. And well I remember how early day by day I arose, and how it seemed as though it wars a leaf torn out of the book of friendship well remembered if I slumbered unwed upon me. It was at breakfast time, and I sat late. She came in from some distant friends who had come, perhaps, to inquire after my health, and with the glad flush of joy at once more having at home. (Ah! how much there four words say!)

My hostess, the Lady Bountiful, turned to me and said,

"It is my daughter."

And to this day I never I bowed low.

I am not going to enter into any analysis of that passion which cometh, like the rain from heaven, upon the just and the unjust, by the which we journey you, or any one else, by a rhapsody about sensations which are not to be described, and put down on paper. But I tell you, simply and plainly, that from the time Lady Bountiful said "It is my daughter" I loved her, and since I have loved.

Our daily life passed smoothly and easily on. As for me, when I arose and let pity take its seat, I took out into the west of my life! Did I not stand at the golden gate and look through the ivory one of dreams to the land of the future, and in fancy walk along the meads and by sweet waters, one an indefinable?

I was so taken up with the contemplation of my happiness in prospective, that I altogether omitted to consult Lady Bountiful, who had been a distant town to see us—Ed.

One morning I presented the little parlor with additional flowers; she looped the clean long curtains with fetters of them, and nods garlands to the corners of the ceiling, and I thought fairies had come over all. It must be a feast that was to take place! And, partly, that where we should silence and be merry—was it?

Yes, a party, and but a single party. That was Harvey Boynton's birthday, and preparations for festivities had been all for him; this was his welcome from home after absence.

Oh! my castle; oh! my fabric floating on the clouds, and as airy and unsubstantial as they! Oh! my golden dreams, my sweet visions of rippling in ruins upon my heart. I wonder it did not crush me. Would it not have been better to have more elastic stuff than even I knew of, it had broken when he came!

I sat apart and listened to the echoes, low and sad, that came up out of the ruins of my hopes; and then, when they had come out and were broken, I arose and went again into the room of sacrifice and sat out the night, waiting to see the dawn break over the ruins, and for the last resinue of cloud and sword of flame.

For I laughed long and loud when the thought came to me that Lenah had wished so long grow up in loneliness and the possession of all the virtues, and that Harvey Boynton had a different idea of a wife, as if others were blind to beauties which I saw. When I saw Harvey Boynton I knew that the secret of my heart was locked upon from me; so I meekly closed the door of that cloister which had been opened to me, took leave of Lady Bountiful as a lover, and left me down in peace and quietness.

But then, Harvey Boynton! Something there was in the tone of his voice, in the eye that, to one observant, was not pleasant.

Lady Bountiful adored Harvey Boynton. She even patted him on the cheek when he came (for he was a frequent visitor), and called him a fair cheek, but Harvey), and called him "her boy," and "her son," while I was a stranger under her roof, a guest, and was pleasant.

But when Harvey Boynton! Something there was in his voice, in the look of his eye that, to one observant, was not pleasant.

But what were the twinkling of Harvey Boynton's eye, I watched him as I never watched man before. I studied him, I questioned him of his haunts; I marked his associates; I gave the joke and jest with them; I drank from the glass at their lips; I was as welcome to them as the wine that the garb and outward show of him whom he seeks to be. And when I had thus studied him, and myself acquainted with the habits which made the character of Harvey Boynton—he who would be my enemy—I loved Lenah—and while I watched I found out all.

Harvey Boynton was the companion of dissipaters, of libertines, and the outcasts of the world.

And here he dared bring his rotten heart and peculiar principles to me, and speak of such a thing—into the presence of Lenah and Lady Bountiful! I told a train for Harvey Boynton which should explode when he least looked for it. Much no! had he possessed but the least spark of honor or manly worth, I would have sooner died than have laid a straw in his way; but he, who came with a mask of frankness into the society of our family, who knew little of his character, should never have or held the heart of Lenah.

I have said that Harvey Boynton lived in a distant town, and so he did; and it was not alone to see his betrothed that he came to Wyndon. He had been companions there with whom he rioted, with whom he struck the hand in friendship and became surety for.

It was late one night when Lenah and I were wending our way home from the bedside of her cousin, who lay at the Gate of Eternal Life with a fever. Harvey was making his usual visit to us and had but a few hours since quitted her presence.

With red hearts we took our way home, filled with the thought of the faith and hope expressed by her relative but a moment before, and looking instinctively toward the calm blackness above which was studded with stars, when a man suddenly seemed to let through the glory which smiles always between the stars, then peculiarly unfailing, when from out the "Washington Hotel" there burst, a few yards in advance, a party of roysters, who, as they passed us, sang to the full their noisy, and, prominent above all, there came a voice which I knew, and which I can never forget, saying the refrain,

"At the battle of the Nile,
I was there all the while," etc.

I pitied her from the bottom of my heart, for in an instant she seemed bearing down upon all the others in such tones. She stopped and listened intently. It was he, beyond question; and with a presentiment of sorrow they went on with their stupid and brutal merriment.

Remember, herself, she went steadily on, never turning to one side—never fearing, even in this frightful state, the poor misguided wretches. Close to him she left me with him, and as we passed them, they, hearing footsteps approach, drew to one side to let us by.

Not yet content with his mischief, he came forward, and shouting out, "A participant! a participant!" fell prostrate by the light of the moon her under the gaslight.

Lenah paused, and struggled to get away, but drawing back her veil, said, calmly,

"Let me go, Harvey Boynton!"

Her Harvey Boynton, with the instinct in my heart and the power in my arm to fell him to the earth—Harvey Boynton set pity from me with desolation and blankness which his face shadowed out. Sobered and restored by this unexpected encounter, he stood in the middle of the road perceiving that when he had so deceived, he let go his arm he turned to me, and laying his hand over his eyes, he shook away silently into the shadows of the night. So he had tossed himself, and the dogs of Rotterdam, and the rats of the city, had buried him in the ruins of his own treachery!

Lenah's strength failed all together when that love virtue, that encourage truth and candor, with smiles and good examples, to continue their ordinary course. For her who had never known sorrow, trouble, the wails shake, the chlice totter, and rise whole from the ruins, and go on their way, but again a song of triumph for the brave heart of my dear girl, she steadily bore back against the the fierce waves of sympathy and grief that rose like the broad sea of devastation and utter despair! Lenah, in her resignation, as from the very first she had known no bitterness, she went about her duty as if no shadow had folded its gloomy wings and rested on her path; and Lady Bountiful, thinking that her usual calmness had returned to her, gave her no more anxiety, and was the dear, lovely old mother again.

But the shadow of Harvey Boynton fell strong upon me, and in the midnight of his encampment. I knew too well the principle which filled her breast to suppose that happiness could ever come to me until it was broken. I knew that in her extreme sense of honor and uprightness she would never trust faith with me, and that was worth more than life itself, or recognize him again. So I sat down, as it were, in the midst of my hopes and fears, and waited for the long, dusty road of hope for some courier who should bring me glad tidings. And while I watched and waited, and heard a different account from my employers—that I should go to Washington with Harvey Boynton. Pleased with my diligence and hope of advancement, and glad of relief from thought and hopes that were beginning to oppress me, Harvey took leave of Lady Bountiful and Lenah for a time, and was on my way.

But one thing I had not done. I pursued my way without incident, finished my business, and was returning home again. Chance delayed me a day, and beyond my expectation I found, to patient at being delayed, I sauntered slowly around the city, preferring to while away the time in the open air before departure. Through the windows of a bar-room I saw, to my utter surprise, no less a man than Harvey Boynton, wasting his life and eyes rotted on him than, despite my personal feelings at my heart, I was determined to speak with him. So I went in and sat down, watching him. He was, to be sure, greatly altered, but the change appeared to me evil like but greatly changed the man from his former self. His face was pale and glowing, but with a dark expiration of drinking and the chances of the game. His was well-dressed, and seemed beyond want; but there was in his face, wasting his life and hopes away, without one friendly admonition, even to a look of regret; and I was the more moved to this when I saw him impatiently throw down his "cue" and move sullenly away, when his adversary, perceiving that he was the marker put up the hair for another fool. I touched him on the shoulder, for all this time he had not noticed me.

"Harvey," I said, "how do you do?"

He drew back a little, as though he would avoid me.

There is no issue between you and me, and we may be friends. I have not followed you, nor been dogging you; accident alone has brought us together again. And since I have been witness of your misfortune, for the sake of old remembrances I would use for you sympathy.

I waited when I said "old remembrances." He gave a little snort and a scarcely perceptible lifting of the heavy, dyed mustache that covered his lip.

"Remembrances!" said he. "I have none. Don't speak to me of them—rather of the future, but not of the past. I lead this life—it is one of flights and falls—it is excitement—I am in despair. I drink these red poisons they deal out here—bitter, damn bitter stuff, and yet better than water. I am able, and win or lose, as the luck may be. I am sometimes wearying, sometimes full; but tied to the wheel of chance, I must roll wherever it goes—now up, now down."

He laughed.

"Hark you! My choice is made. I am one going to the gates, what has brought me to this? It is no fault of any one but myself. You can read it in the novels—in any of the tales. Foolish compassion—don't look to drink, what is a man to me mouly—lets hours, work conscience, and the end comes—yet."

"It is not too late, however, to turn back upon the road you go," I said. "Surely, in some distant place, you can retrieve your errors. Be utterly lost."

He waved me out, but with great impatience.

"I have read when at school," said he, "in the Good Book that it is better to meet a bear robbed of her whelps than a fool in his folly." It is not in my way. I have forgotten all my better life, and will not turn back. Leave me to avoid wishes, my principle too. I will not add to-priority to my list of sins. I will not pretend to a goodness I feel can not exist. I am he not a fool who gets a worthless box, and strives by varnish to cover the perishable nature of the case. No, no, I will not go. Hope is dead, and would that I were too!"

He sat down to his bottle, and I bade him farewell, hoping against hope that he would follow me.

Through all our speech he made no mention of gave me of Lenah and Lady Bountiful.

I took the cars again for the ride home to Wyndon. It was a lovely, lovely day in winter, when the clouds hung sullenly over the earth, and seemed anxious to shut out all sight of heaven from it. The train rolled along down to the sea, still, while so steadily a persistence, that it seemed as if it must be hours before the journey was passed, and the hanging clouds struck darkly upon the earth. So rifled was I with a nameless anxiety that I looked out at the first station-house of the engineer to ride with him; hoping, by the quick circulation of the air and the familiar sounds, to awaken something like cheerfulness in my breast. So I got on; and with a screech, and a shock, and a banging of the bell, and a great hurrah puffs, the quick whirling of the wheels where the fire flew from the iron track, we set out again—far, far, over the frozen road—puff, puff, between the rocky cuts in the road, where the quick succession of echoes of the engine seemed to me concussion to our ears. The whistle of the water as it broke from the boiler—for the engine-driver willingly broken—the bright rods eased in ice—the dear old remembered operations—all, all were there; and yet felt as one who looks upon the face of a dear one in the real. So we journeyed on, the engineer always looking forward, and I looking back, and as my eyes looking out of the glass windows in front—I looking over his shoulder from the force of custom. Suddenly I saw the train was on a down grade, and among the alder bushes which lined the road. He waited until I got within two cars' length of him. Great God! it was Harvey Boynton signaling to us! There must be some danger near! Stretch ing out my hand, and just as I was about to grasp the brake; step shot went the throttle—but all too late! Swinging the wheels of his cap and waved it at us; and then, with the quickness of thought, laid his head over the rail, with the pale face and the eyes wide open looking steadfastly forward. All too late!

Instinctively I drew myself up, that I might not feel the "thud" and jolt which must ensue. Crash, crash went the iron wheel remorselessly over the mangled corpse, as it lay in the middle line, palpitating, human flesh!

Quickly we were stopped, but life might not yet be extinct; but alas! he had done his work too well! He never finished when the train approached, and ran over him. There lay by the side of the track, a poor shattered thing!

Dead by his own hands!

Dead and ghastly, with the mute eyes looking appealingly to Heaven, and the entire rain face of the engineer, who had already purified up with a mask of ice; the limbs mangled and torn as rags from the body, the face white and a sacked track—a very emblem of nothing, that was so late a man—and I could no longer look upon what I would have been difficult to say what name to call it.

Into was the brilliant eye which his hand had brought to steady him; here it lay light clotted in the dirt, unrecognizable to a child in life; the lodge and emblem of his destruction, clinging to him even in death.

I hurried forward that he was on his way to Boston to play at his favorite game, but that not having the money for his fare he was put off at the place where we met him. The rest is already told. Despair, working upon a heart cast down by the loss of all that it loved, led me to take my own life in the manner described. . . . . Why do I delay? My story is told. It is over—and now to return to that life he has blessed me far above my hopes and deserts. Respecting the dead as we do for the memory of our dearest, and thankful that Heaven have caused the proper observances to be placed over me.

Lady Bountiful lives with us, and hastened the union which she saw our hearts had already formed. Many summers have gone since the scene narrated, but with each succeeding one the air seems brighter and sweeter. The birds pipe more melodiously, and newer and gayer flowers, with sweeter scents than before, blossom in the shady our hearts should be full to overflowing with the mercy and long-suffering he hath shown—for the blessings He hath showered on us.

CHAPTER XLII.

SYMPTOMS.

As Lawrence Newt sat in his office and looked at the ships and the river there was still the same soft light in his eye, but his mind beheld other images than formerly. The scene was no longer exclusively Eastern, under palm-trees and by a rushing river, with strange snowy mountains beyond, and the magical air of pathetic romance steeping all. It was more familiar now—not banishing the other, but blending it as a dear, distant back-ground over which every day the mists stole more tenderly.

Lawrence Newt had many a wondering conversation with himself. He called himself humorously to account very often. Frequently, as he moved his chair back from his table when his work was done, and he abandoned himself to the stream of his fancies, he smiled and said, inwardly, "Hallo, Lawrence Newt! What, in the name of consistency, is the matter with Sir?"

Then, with a face still half smiling, he lapsed into reverie again, and his eyes grew so tender that it was clear he was thinking of a woman.

He was not afraid of himself. He seemed nothing more than an unreal consistency. He reckoned no feeling of any kind: being very sure that an emotion that could not flourish without fuelling had better not flourish at all. Of course he was often surprised by himself—by the development of his own affections and sympathies, and he laughed at himself as at another person when some delicate and vital change took place.

"After all I can only be myself," thought he, smilingly. "Do what I will I can not by any easily deceive two spectators—my Maker and myself."

For some reason Lawrence Newt was especially friendly with little Miss Ellen Bennet. Ever since the evening at the Bennets' singing which, although constantly engaged in conversation with Gabriel's father and mother, he had contrived to see but little of the child, Waring was with her young cousins, and how, as it were, they hid together among the roses, he had called often at the house, and was no less welcome to Gabriel and his sister than to Mr. and Mrs. Bennet.

Simultaneously with this habit of his, Amy Waring was constantly coming to Lawrence Newt's. She had new books to discuss with Uncle Bennet, and, as he was engaged during business hours with his duties as book-keeper to Mr. Van Boozenberg's bank, it was necessary that she should come to Lawrence Newt's rooms hours as Mr. Bennet—happened in upon the quiet little circle, and then, upon the cheerful invitation arising, during which the sun set, and the evening darkened, and it was really quite late—then it suddenly occurred to Amy that mamma would be anxious—she had no idea it was so late—she was very sorry—however, Gabriel will go home with me.

But Gabriel did not go home with her, for Lawrence Newt always happened to be going that way, and declared that it would be quite as easy for him to take care of Miss Amy as of himself, and certainly much pleasanter. Upon which there was quite an absurd degree of blushing and bowing and little ringing laughter, and general bustling and laughing and chatting, which always ended in the departure of Amy Waring and Lawrence Newt together.

"You see, my dear Miss Amy, it is directly upon my way home, and therefore it is no trouble, even the least trouble."

She knew his eyes were smiling as he said this, although she could not see them, and she always thought of light, airy, humorous replies that might be made, but she never made them; but walked along very peacefully, very contentedly, and said only "Thank you," or "Yes, I know," or offer little somethings that were not very nice nor humorous, but which seemed singularly musical to the heart of Lawrence Newt, and often said—for there was a great family likeness in these little evening promises—

"Suppose it were a trouble, which it is not, I should go home with you all the same."

Amy Waring had the reputation of a very pretty girl, and she was pretty. The young men especially were a little afraid of her, and Lawrence Newt, often at the house of her clever repartees, and expressing the comprehensive opinion that she was "the brightest girl in New York, and so good!"

But Mr. Newt never discovered the wit in his intercourse with her. At first, indeed, she had been very spirited when they met, and now it was always with the same sweet expression in her face, as of blossoms and singing birds. But of late there was more silence and less of excitement, or, rather, as they persisted in stating it to herself, he was so much her senior, so much wiser, so much better that he was the fit and only place to listen to him; and she did listen with a kind of charmed satisfaction that she had never before felt, and her contented repose even lovelier than when it was beaming with the animation of speaking.

Besides, he is born to be a bachelor, thought she, and we ought to be kind to those who will never have any body to love them.

Oh! what colors deepened in her face as she corrected to herself the meaning which she herself had heard, and how she involuntarily bent her head, as she thought—"I mean who will never love any body."

One evening at Mr. Bennet's the conversation gradually shifted about among the topics of fiction, not holding any of them very long, until Ellen, who was reading, suddenly exclaimed, with indignation, "Oh, see me, it's too bad!"

"What is that, Ellen?" asked her mother.

"Why mother, here in Gabriel's book, in the adventures of Lord Ronald, you know, who has married Lady Blanche after all, I wish he had married Lady Blanche after all, I wish people who write books wouldn't tell about it."

"And why shouldn't Lord Ronald marry Lady Blanche, Ellen?" asked Lawrence Newt, with a smile.

"Why, because, you know, he was in love with Lady Mildred."

"Oh! and she had become of Lady Mildred?"

"Oh! she died long ago, you know."

"Then surely Lord Ronald couldn't marry her."

"Yes, I know, but people ought to be true to their first loves."

Ellen went on reading, and a curious silence followed. Mrs. Bennet was knitting, and Amy Waring was working at some kind of purse; Mr. Bennet sat on the sofa, smiling over at his daughter spoke; Lawrence Newt and Gabriel were seated near each other, and had been talking in low tones.

The girl had retired again into the dreamland from which she had emerged so suddenly and indignantly, and she seemed to have carried every body with her. Mr. Newt was politic in his silence. Gabriel—all—Mr. Bennet was half bowing, with dreamy eyes and an aspect of unusual humility. His wife, as she looked from Ellen blushed, and Amy Waring counted her stitches with a pertinacity that showed her mind to be very far away from the thread of her work. Gabriel thought ruefully of Hope Wayne, and it was Gabriel who broke the silence.

"No," said he, "a man never loves but once."

He said this with such a pitiful air, with such a full resolution in his mind of never being comforted for the tragedy of which he represented himself to himself as the victim, that the whole party lifted their eyes and looked at him, and all laughed together as they saw his smooth, candid, boyish face on which the history of life was yet to be written.

Gabriel laughed too, but still ruefully. His remembrance of Hope Wayne was the minor key on which he loved to play his thoughts like melodies, and in his softer hours believe that he should never be happy again.

"Oh, mother, you think we boys feel nothing. But I assure you there was a boy at our school who was in love with a girl who preferred somebody else, and I don't believe he will ever get over it."

Meaning himself, of course. Already a poet, and serving up his own heart as a morsel for the mental appetites of his friends.

"Gabriel," said Lawrence Newt, after looking up from his reading for some time, "when I last came home from India I passed through Europe and stopped at all the famous cities. I saw the great works of all the great men, the painters, the architects, the sculptors. One day I began you will see them, and read them, for they are the best kind of history. Well, one morning in Venice I went in my gondola to the picture gallery there, and in a little corner of an old palace, crumbling and deserted, except by two or three poor retainers of the family, I was shown a picture which the family, reduced to the last straits, were willing to sell. It was called a King of Thrace—nothing else, and was declared to be a master-piece of Giorgione's, one of the world's old Venetian painters—a picture which an ancestor of the family had bought of the painter, and which had never hung any where but in that palace. The King was an old man, with a face as calm and beautiful as the face of Endymion may have been when he was translated. He had a son and daughter on each side, and a look of paternal dignity which was unutterable. It seemed to me a portrait of one of the noblest of human beings, and I bought the picture. It wanted cleaning, and I took it to the cleaner. Now what do you think? The cleaner rubbed and rubbed until the King of Thrace disappeared, and underneath, upon the same canvas, there was a figure of Saint Sebastian pierced with arrows. But it was a sadly inferior work, and I left it behind."

Lawrence Newt stopped, and all the company looked as if they expected to hear something more. Gabriel said only, "Well, Sir."

"Several pictures may be painted upon the same canvas, you see, and the new may be much inferior to the old, yet without destroying it. I am older than you, and I know many a boy who took leave of hope when he left Ellen's age. But Lawrence Newt stopped, and Gabriel looked shocked, as if he suspected him of punning. After a moment Mr. Newt continued: "But the love of a man is not the love of a boy; and the man may remember that earlier love with shame, even while he half regrets it."

The latter part of what he said did not seem to be especially addressed to Gabriel, nor to any one. It sounded only like a general confession of faith. Gabriel replied, and Lawrence Newt continued;

"A school heart is a palimpsest. A new Scripture may supersede the old, and be as much better as it is fresher."

He smiled as he said these last words.

"God knows, much better!" said Mr. Bennet, after a few moments, without examining—this time without smiling, and with his head bowed reverently toward his wife.

Amy Waring was thinking with a close attention that was most edifying. She beat to fur most her work nobody could see her face. She was thinking what a pity it was that a man like Mr. Newt was born to be a bachelor. Solitude and fastidiousness how late it was—and, in fine, Mr. Newt strolled home with her. He looked at his watch and joked, and gossiped, without the remotest allusion to the human heart as a palimpsest, or the telling of new lives while the remembered old. He inquired as to Amy's his theory of the Venus of Milo, concluding by saying:

"That's only my opinion. I believe the critics are against me. But I like to speculate about these things."

So if Amy Waring had been trying to extract any evidence from what he had said that he was speaking from experience, how fruitless her pains were lost. He speculates upon statues, thought she, and upon human hearts and lives, and upon every thing else. It is natural, because he has no warm and neat ties. that while a pity! what a pity!

It did not require any very profound sagacity in Lawrence Newt to know that the general tenor of Amy Waring's thoughts. If he could have heard what he was saying to himself, she would have understood that he did not mean to help any body to like him or to dislike him by any revelation of experience. Experience is always interesting to girls, thought he; it presupposes them in future of a man. No, thank you! If my Giorgiones are to be taken, let it be for their own value, not for the curiosity or interest of some picture underneath. Not that any body wants my Giorgiones. No; and if they did, not that I would sell! Not at all.

He fell off into such an abyss of dreams that he and Amy walked on without another word.

Lawrence Newt had long ago looked upon himself as a man who was not very likely to marry. Life was pleasant to him, as it often is to successful men. He enjoyed the sharp contest of busy merchants—the great family Bey, he said, of which their ships are only the outward image—each one sailing as close to the wind as he can or dares. He smiled too the snowy sails of its East Indiamen not whiter than its souls. Lawrence Newt had more fortunes by his chivalric honesty than he won by his superior intelligence.

"Now, my dear boy, the society that he met after that of business. "We change our clothes all the evening," said he, coming with his father, "I meet old Van Boozenberg in another shirt, and his wife and the neighbors in their wet clothes. They change the clothes, but not the body. Change the name, but not the game. We are not playing draughts any longer, but checkers. It isn't Wall Street, you think. Shut your eyes, and see. How droll it is—if you could want to see in this world, you must shut your eyes! But, Arthur, that is a small part of society." So said the young wife of Hope Wayne—one family like the Bennets—overbears the ill impression of ten thousand hollow hearts and homes. A wise man, it seemed, who takes people as they come, as he does the weather. He is as they may be, we are never barred up. Cold as it may be, most of us are never frozen; and so, however wet, there is never a deluge."

He found gradually that he must call himself to very strict account in regard to his relations with Amy Waring. Good Heavens! if she should be the King of Thrace painted over the Saint Sebastian! In one thing it would differ, thought he; it couldn't be very easily rubbed out.

He was frightened to find himself thinking so; and even now, as he walked by her side, the portrait in the solemn library of Pinewood stole into his memory—those soft dark eyes seemed to look into his—and his own looked tenderly and calmly back again upon both, as if he were gazing through them down into his own soul. Those eyes had no regard for him as he looked, and that frightened him all the more.

"Lawrence Newt," said he to himself, "you don't seem to like it."

He finished the question with a laugh, as if he were entirely unnecessary for him to hear the point of it in order to understand how exquisitely ludicrous it was.

"Why not?" was the grave reply which he heard himself giving to himself, in quite another strain.

"No, no, no! It isn't worth discussing," said he, in the first strain.

Then he laughed a good honest laugh at himself for trying to bamboozle himself.

For it had all grown up unconsciously. When did Friendship—you know—pass into—into—you know? inquired he of himself. How could I, you know?

He answered himself as cunningly: When did the pearl blossom pass into the pearl? How could it, you know? The one a flower, and the other a fruit, you know. It couldn't do any thing else.

He was not unmindful of the difference of age between Amy Waring and himself, and instinctively he did nothing which could show to others that he felt more for her than for a friend. Younger man, who could not help feeling the charm of her presence, never complained of him. He was aware of that inferred old bore, Lawrence Newt," to them. More than one of them in the order of young feeling had confided his passion to Lawrence, who said to him, bravely,

"My dear fellow, I do not wonder you feel so. God speed you—and so will I, all I can."

And he did so. He mentioned the candidates kindly to Miss Waring. He repeated little anecdotes that he had heard to his advantage. Lawrence regarded the pour suitor as a painter does a picture. He took him up in the arms of his charity and moved him round and round. He put him upon his sympathy as upon an easel, and turned on the kindly lights and judicious darkened the opposite.

His generosity was chivalric, but it was unerring. Beautiful flowers arrived from the worshiping youths. They were so lovely, so fragrant! What taste that young Hal Buttlebury has! remarks Lawrence Newt, admiringly, as he smells the flowers and stands at a respectful step upon the centre table. Any Waring smiles, and says that it is Thorburn's taste, of whom Mr. Harper buys the flowers. Lawrence Newt replies that it is at least very thoughtful in him. A young lady can not feel kindly, rarely, toward young men who express their good feeling in the form of flowers. Then he dexterously asks the conversation upon some other channel. He will not harm the cause of poor Mr. Batchbury by persisting in speaking of him and his bouquets, when that persistence will evidently render the subject a little tedious.

Poor Mr. Hal Buttlebury, who, could he only survey the Waring mansion from the lower floor to the roof, would behold his handsomest bouquet that came on Wednesday withering in cold ecstasy upon the parlor-table—passion frozen in his politeness's vase! Any Waring's bedroom drawer would see the little book she received from "her friend Lawrence Newt" crammed like a priceless pearl, with a pressed rose laid upon the leaf where her name and his are written together—a rose which Lawrence Newt playfully stole one evening from one of the centemonious bouquets reposing under the gas-fixture, and said gayly, as he took leave, "Let this keep my memory fragrant till I return."

But it was a superior fact that was one of those bankers without a card, of which we have spoken, arrived at the house, and was left in superb solitary state upon the centre table in the parlor, but bloomed as long as one could coax it in the clear sechision of Mary Waring's own chamber, and then some choicest flower was selected, was pressed and preserved somewhere in the depths of the bureau.

Oh! could the bureau drawers give up their treasures, would not many human being appear to be cold! would any maiden, young or old, appear a virtuous vestal, or any unmarried octogenarian at heart a bachelor?

Lawrence Newt had watched with the warmest sympathy the rapid development of the friendship between Any Waring and Hope Warne. He aided it in every way. He was not in the assistance of Arthur Merlin, who was in some doubt whether his devotion to his art would allow him to desert it for a moment. But as the doubt only lasted while Lawrence Newt was absent from the meeting with Waring and Miss Wayne, Mr. Merlin did not delay his co-operation till Mr. Newt's efforts.

And so they met at Any Waring's house very often and pretended to read, and really did read, several books together and alone. Even more Arthur Merlin saw of Hope Wayne the more delighted he was to think how unconscious it was for him, in view of his profound devotion to his art, to think of beautiful women in any other light than that of picturesque subjects.

"Really, Mr. Newt," Arthur said to him one evening as they were dining together at Delmonico's—it was in the old building in William Street—"if I were to paint a picture of Diana, I would have Miss Wayne—pardon me, Any, by which I intend to point—I should want to ask Miss Wayne to sit for the goddess of the chase. It is really remarkable what a subdued splendor there is about her—Diana blushing, you know, as it were—she delicately half-veiled in cloud. It would be superb, I assure you."

Lawrence Newt smiled—he often smiled—at he wiped his mouth, and asked,

"Who would you ask to sit for Endymion?"

"Well, I don't—" replied Arthur, reflectively, and pondering as if to think who was exactly the man, who was really learned to be his exclusive enthusiasm for his art. "Let me see. How would it do to paint an ideal figure for Endymion?"

"No, no," said Lawrence Newt, laughing. "Art must get its ideal out of life, you know. Command a good, solid, flesh-and-blood Endymion."

"I can't just think of any body," replied Arthur Merlin, musingly, looking upon the floor and thinking so intently of Hope in order to image to himself Any Waring's lover that he was quite forgot to think of the candidates for that figure.

"How would my young friend Hal Buttleburz answer?" asked Lawrence Newt.

"Oh, not at all," replied Arthur, promptly "he's too light, you know."

"Well, let me see," continued the other, "what do you think of that young Southerner, Slego Moultrie, who was at Saratoga? I used to think his face of the finish of a picture that Wayne that Diana wanted to Endymion, and he has the face for a picture."

"Oh, he's not at all the person. He's much too dark, you see," answered Arthur, at once, with remarkable readiness.

"There's Alfred Dinks," said Lawrence Newt, smiling.

"Pish!" said Arthur, conclusively.

"Really, I can not think of any body," returned his companion, with a most grave look. Arthur probably did not perceive. The young artist was evidently very closely occupied with the composition of his picture. He half closed his eyes as if he saw the canvas distinctly, and said,

"I should represent her just lighting upon the hill, you see, with a rich, moist flush upon her face, a cold splendor just melting into passion, half fearing, as she comes, so softly superior, so queenly scornful of all the world but him. Love it would make a splendid picture."

Lawrence Newt looked at his friend as he imagined the condescending Diana. She arched face now as she raised as he spoke, as if he saw some figure descending. It was rapt in the intensity of fancy, and Lawrence Newt perfectly well that he saw Hope Wayne's Endymion before him. But at the same moment his eye fell upon his nephew Abel Newt, with a choice company of gay youths at another table. There was instantly a mischievous twinkle in Lawrence Newt's eye.

"Eureka! I have Endymion."

Arthur looked up in half pang, as if Lawrence Newt had suddenly told him of Miss Wayne's engagement. He even turned quickly out of the cloudy on Latmos where he was dreaming.

"What did you say?" asked he.

"Why, of course, how dull I am; Abel will be Endymion if you can get him."

"Who is Abel?" inquired Arthur.

"Why my nephew, Abel Don Juan Pelham Vere de Crowe Newt, son of Newbold Newt, Son, & Company, Dry Goods on Commission, Esquire," replied Lawrence Newt, with perfect brevity.

Arthur looked at him bewildered.

"Don't you know my nephew, Abel Newt?"

"No, not personally. I've heard of him, of course."

"Well, he's a very handsome young man, and though he be dark he may also be Endymion. Why, Arthur, you're a genius, you know. 'Tis the one just raising the glass to his lips."

Lawrence Newt let his head fall back as Arthur, ward the gay revelers who sat, half a dozen in number, and the oldest not more than twenty-five, all dressed in men of pleasure, and were boring table spread with a profuse and costly feast. Among the latter, and the most prominent Arthur Merlin and Lawrence Newt turned to look he was telling some anecdote to which they all listened with delight. He had raised the red wine of France, poured carefully from a bottle lying upon its side in a cradle of wicker-work, to the gated skirt. Abel, with his glass in his hand and the glittering smile in his eye, told the story with that mingling of ease and grace more amused with the listeners' eagerness than with the anecdote itself. The extreme gayety of his life was already rubbing the bloom away from his face, but it developed his peculiar beauty more strikingly than ever. It was a dangerous innocence which belongs to every boyish countenance.

As he looked at him, Arthur Merlin was exceedingly impressed by the air of reckless grace in his whole manner of reclining and listening as entirely with his face. Lawrence Newt watched his friend as the latter gazed at Abel. Lawrence Newt saw a great deal in Lawrence he looked say where. Perhaps he perceived the secret dissatisfaction with his profession always which, without any apparent reason, Arthur felt as he looked at Abel.

For with every philosopher he good enough to explain why, when a young artist is so devoted to his profession as he is supposed to be, he can never allow his affections to stray from it for a moment, and, pending the composition of a picture of Diana and Endymion, the searching for a proper model of the figure of the lover, and suddenly to meet in a common place encounter upon a face so handsome and a figure so graceful that they are evidently just the thing, will any philosopher explain why the young artist should experience a very disagreeable and indescribable pang?

But the longer Arthur Merlin looked at Abel the more curiously perplexed he was. The feeling which, if he had not been so desperate to utterly devoted to his profession that all distractions were impossible, would have called a nascent jealousy, was gradually merged in a half-consciousness that he had somewhere seen Abel before. Arthur could not, under what circumstance, he could not possibly remember. His mind was in a sudden, puzzling himself to recall that face.

Suddenly he slapped his hand upon the table. Lawrence Newt, who was looking at him, saw the perplexity of his expression smooth itself away; saw the dark flush, and Arthur's air of surprise, satisfaction, and alarm, exclaimed—and his color changed.

"Abel Newt is Manfred in the Coliseum!"

Lawrence Newt was confounded. Was Arthur, then, not deceived in anything? Did he really take an interest in all these people only as a painter, and think of them only as subjects for his pictures?

Lawrence Newt was troubled. He had seen in Arthur only delight with the most unconscious beginnings of affection for Hope Wayne. He had pleased himself in bringing them together—of course Any was only the present too, that any tête-à-tête which éross might take place between them had deemed the most agreeable dreams. He knew Hope—he knew Arthur—was evidently the hand of Hearen. He had even mentioned it confidentially to Any Waring, who was profoundly interested, and who charitably did the same offices for Arthur with Hope Wayne that Lawrence Newt did for the young candidates with Any.

The conversation about the picture of Diana had only confirmed Lawrence Newt in the conviction that Arthur Merlin really loved Hope Wayne, whether he himself knew it or not.

And now he was all wrong, after all! Ridiculous! How could he be?

He tried to persuade himself that he was not. He tried to forget how persistently Arthur had spoken of Hope only as a fine Diana, and how, after evidently being struck with Abel Newt, he had merely exclaimed, with a kind of suppressed excitement, as if he saw what a striking picture he would make, "Manfred in the Coliseum!"

Lawrence Newt took a glass of wine, hastily drank it. Then he smiled inwardly.

"It is not the first time I have been mistaken," thought he, "and it may be to take Any Waring's advice about it."

As he and his friend passed the other table, on their way out, Abel nodded to his uncle, and Arthur Merlin made himself very sure that he saw the gentle smile with which he once assembled that of Manfred's in the picture he had given Hope Wayne.

"I am right," thought Lawrence Newt, as they passed out into the street.

"Abel Newt, then, is Hope Wayne's somebody," thought Arthur Merlin, as he took his friend's arm.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A GOOD ARGUMENT.—In a time of much religious excitement and consequent discussion, an honest Dutch farmer in the Mohawk was overheard arguing with a denomination of Christians were on the right way to heaven. "Why, dan," said he, "you vos not more nor half as Albany, some say this road is the best, and some say dat is de best; but it make much differences which road we take, for we go git dere day never ask us which way we come." This was a very sensible conclusion for the good fellow.

A year or two since Captain Hackstaff, of Middletown, well known in New York as commander, at one time, of the line of "Burden" boats on the Delaware and Raritan canal, was on a visit to that city, and in a conversation with a friend upon the prevailing incidents of the day, remarked, said that he never heard of but one man who had a good excuse for getting drunk. On being asked what that man was? the Captain replied, "Noah! for," said he, "it the first thing he did was to get drunk." He would have been wrecked."

A SECRET DIFFERENCE.—An empty-headed exquisite was present when a young lady was singing a song in which the following lines occur:

"By that fair brow where innocence repose.
Like moonlight resting on the pulseless snow."

Looking at him intently, she divided the words in the first line in a manner not particularly complimentary, thus:

"By that fair brow where-in no sense repose.
Like moonlight resting on the pulseless snow."

A NEW DEFINITION.—"Now, papa, what is humbug?" "It is," replied papa, "when a man pretends to be very fond of me, and puts no buttons on my shirts."

A PATENT COMPANION.—Love without money has been compared to a pair of shiny leather boots without laces.

SUGGESTIONS FOR THE STUPID.—Never think of saying a thing to a goose. Say less to the gander—talk to the goose.

One American at Magenta!

BY JULIA CAREY BRENNAN.

"A young American Surgeon, who had taken services with the army, pressed into the thickest of the fight; and if he can judge wounds as well as he does guns, he will be a valuable acquisition."—Correspondent London Times.

In the forest of the fray,
On Magenta's bloody field,
When before the Zouave bayonets
Austria's chosen squadrons reeled;
When bursting through the legions
Of the Hapsburgh's Italian hate,
The genius of the Bonapartes
Hid rage and horror into might;
In the thickest of the combat,
Dashing loudly on the van,
One rider pressed with bloody spur,
And sword of brilliant fire.

His wore no Emperor's uniform,
But fighting with the French,
He was the first to rein the charge,
The last to check the wrench;
And our young Americanism,
A child of freedom, ho!
And richer truth garments
Than uniform could be;
For, as he passed, and cut his way
By dint of pluck and pith,
I saw the garments which he wore,
And they were made by SMITH!

SOMETHING NEW.—B. T. BABBITT'S BEST MEDICINAL SALERATUS.

AND | AND
70 | 70

Is manufactured from cocoanut salt, and is prepared entirely different from other saleratus. All the deleterious matter extracted in such a manner as to produce a fresh, flavorful, and all kinds of CAKE, without containing a particle of Saleratus when the flour and cake is baked; thereby producing wholesome results. Every particle of which is turned to oxygen, and passes through the blood so that the system receives the benefit of taking cocoanut oil instead of salt, water, and flour. You will readily perceive by the taste of the Saleratus that it is entirely different from other Saleratus.

AND | AND
70 | 70

It is packed in one pound papers, each wrapper branded, "B. T. Babbitt's Best Medicinal Saleratus," and has directions, also a leaf of bread, with a glass of effervescing water on the leaf. The Great Novel.

The Recollections of Geoffry Hamlyn.

By HENRY KINGSLEY.

One volume, 12mo, pp. 505. Cloth elegant, Price $1.25.

The first edition of this book was exhausted immediately upon its publication, and the second is now selling very rapidly.

"Men will like it because it is full of adventure, with the light and shades of pastoral, and women because it will like the book on this account, and also because it contains more love-stories than in ten ordinary novels experience we ever met with between two covers. The 'Recollections' are at once natural and improbable, but if they recorded real events. Perhaps they do, for life is a wonderful story unlike life in novels. Altogether the book, in which does not occur any page which the reader will wish to skip, is a most delightful one."—London Examiner.

"It is capital summer reading for one who would be amused and entertained without being wearied, not who would be instructed. Mr. Kingsley has created a few characters in order to the maintenance of his interest in this book. * * * Such pictures of strength, hardihood, intrepidity, of courage, vivacity, and an abounding mirth and physical vigor, are characteristic of English."—The Spectator. "Mr. Kingsley's English," it they make hearty and invigorating books, and it will be long before we see their equals in the field of romance."—N. Y. Independent.

HEALTH OF AMERICAN WOMEN.

Under this head the Graefenberg Company, of No. 32 PARK ROW, NEW YORK, have published a series of articles upon the diseases peculiarly affecting women, and which are met with in nine tenths of all women in the country; upon Consumption, the great scourge of the American Continent; and upon all the diseases incident to the country and climate.

In these articles the Graefenberg Company have proved their eminent position as a Chartered Medical Institution, and have based their claim to confidence upon the fact that they have studied the laws of nature rather than the laws of Galen and Hippocrates, and have applied common sense principles to the plainly-required symptoms exhibited by symptoms of local or general derangement.

The proof of their successful treatment is found in testimony from leading physicians of all schools, from public and private individuals who have tested the remedies, from clergymen who have witnessed their immense value upon the health of their churches, and from notices given in the leading journals of the day.

[FROM THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE.]

The GRAEFENBERG FAMILY REMEDIES are almost valuable. To the universal and distressing diseases of women, the remedies are gentle, judicious, and surely effective.

[FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES.]

The GRAEFENBERG COMPANY have refitted their rooms, so that every accommodation is afforded those who desire the personal advice of the consulting physician. All invalids, and strangers visiting the city, who require professional advice, had better call upon Mr. Dr. Bridge is a regular physician, of fine attainments, and of great judgment and discrimination in the treatment of disease. THE GRAEFENBERG MARSHALL'S UTERINE CATHOLICON.

Is offered as a certain cure in cases accompanied with any of the following symptoms:

Irregularities—Weakness—Faintness—
Deranged Appetite—Sallow Complexion—
Pain in the Back and Kidneys—Chills—
Cold Hands and Feet—Headache—Feverishness—
Neuralgia—Palpitation of the Heart—
Dizziness—Nervousness—Headache—Restlessness—
Disturbed Sleep—Flushes of Heat—General Pale—
Crawling and Pain in the Spine and between the Shoulders—
Acid Stomach—Nausea—Indigestion—
Difficult Passing of Urine with Heat or Smarting—
Itching—Burning or Irritation to the Uterine Organs—
Nightmare—Despair—Hysterics—Anxiety—
Bad face—Nervous Twitching—Starting—Contraction
—Irritable Temper—Sadness—Depraved Appetite—
Flatulence—Bloated and Irregular Bowels—
Unpleasant Dreams—Pains in the Uterine Organs—
Numbness and Pains in the Limbs—
Loss of Memory—Bewilderment—Soreness in the Feet—Pain in the Back.

All suppressions in young girls, and the cough and disease so commonly attending them in the young, are relieved quickly and surely by the Catholicon.

In this connection Miss BECCHER, sister of the Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER, in "Letters to the People," page 199, says: "I have seen nine sisters and sisters-in-law, and fourteen female cousins, all married, and all delicate and ailing. Amid the immense circle of my friends and acquaintances I can not recall ten married ladies, now in this century and country, who are perfectly healthy." In cases, however, where the GRAEFENBERG CATHOLICON has been used, we must say that health has rapidly taken the place of disease, and ladies have become robust, strong, vigorous, and healthy.

THE GRANDMOTHER'S APOLOGY.

BY ALFRED TENNYSON.

WITH AN ILLUSTRATION BY MILLAIS.

AND Willy, my eldest born, is gone, you say, little Anne?
Ruddy and white, and strong on his legs, he looks like a man.!
And Willy's wife has written: she never was overwise,
Never the wife for Willy: he wouldn't take my advice.

For, Annie, you see, her father was not the man to save,
Hadn't a head to manage, and drank himself into his grave.
Pretty enough, very pretty! but I was against it for one.
Eh!—but he wouldn't hear me—and Willy, you say, is gone.

Willy, my beauty, my eldest boy, the flower of the flock,
Never a man could fling him: for Willy stood like a rock.
"Here's a leg for a babe of a week!" says doctor; and he would be bound,
There was not his like that year in twenty parishes round.

Strong of his hands, and strong on his legs, but still of his tongue!
I ought to have gone before him: I wonder he went so young.
I can not cry for him, Annie: I have not long to stay;
Perhaps I shall see him the sooner, for he lived far away.

Why do you look at me, Annie? you think I am hard and cold;
But all my children have gone before me, I am so old:
I can not weep for Willy, nor can I weep for the rest;
Only at your age, Annie, I could have wept with the best.

For I remember a quarrel I had with your father, my dear,
All for a slanderous story, that cost me many a tear.
I mean your grandfather, Annie: it cost me a world of woe,
Seventy years ago, my darling, seventy years ago.

For Jenny, my cousin, had come to the place, and I knew right well
That Jenny had tripp'd in her time: I knew, but I would not tell.
And she to be coming and slandering me, the base little liar!
But the tongue is a fire as you know, my dear, the tongue is a fire.

And the parson made it his text that week, and he said likewise,
That a lie which is half a truth is ever the blackest of lies,
That a lie which is all a lie may be met and fought with outright,
But a lie which is part a truth is a harder matter to fight.

And Willy had not been down to the farm for a week and a day;
And all things look'd half-dead, though it was the middle of May.
Jenny, to slander me, who knew what Jenny had been!
But soiling another, Annie, will never make one's self clean.

And I cried myself well-nigh blind, and all of an evening late
I climb'd to the top of the garth, and stood by the road at the gate.
The moon like a rick on fire was rising over the dale,
And whit, whit, whit, in the bush beside me chirrup'd the nightingale.

All of a sudden he stopp'd; there pass'd by the gate of the farm,
Willy—he didn't see me—and Jenny hung on his arm.
Out into the road I started, and spoke I scarce knew how;
Ah, there's no fool like the old one—it makes me angry now.

Willy stood up like a man, and look'd the thing that he meant;
Jenny, the viper, made me a mocking courtesy and went.
And I said, "Let us part: in a hundred years it'll all be the same,
You can not love me at all, if you love not my good name."

And he turn'd, and I saw his eyes all wet, in the sweet moonshine:
"Sweet-heart, I love you so well that your good name is mine,
And what do I care for Jane, let her speak of you well or ill;
But marry me out of hand: we two shall be happy still."

"Marry you, Willy!" said I, "but I needs must speak my mind,
I fear you will listen to tales, be jealous and hard and unkind."
But he turn'd and clasp'd me in his arms, and answer'd, "No, love, no;"
Seventy years ago, my darling, seventy years ago.

So Willy and I were wedded: I wore a lilac gown;
And the ringers rang with a will, and he gave the ringers a crown.
But the first that ever I bore was dead before he was born,
Shadow and shine is life, little Annie, flower and thorn.

That was the first time, too, that ever I thought of death.
There lay the sweet little body that never had drawn a breath.
I had not wept, little Anne, not since I had been a wife;
But I wept like a child that day, for the babe had fought for his life.

His dear little face was troubled, as if with anger or pain:
I look'd at the still little body—his trouble had all been in vain.
For Willy I can not weep, I shall see him another morn:
But I wept like a child for the child that was dead before he was born.

But he cheer'd me, my good man, for he seldom said me nay:
Kind, like a man, was he; like a man, too, would have his way:
Never jealous—not he: we had many a happy year;
And he died, and I could not weep—my own time seem'd so near.

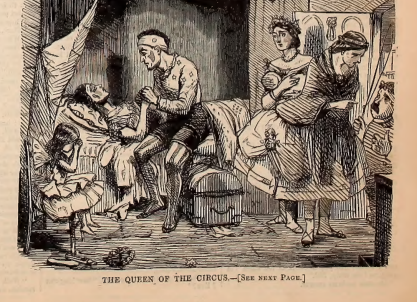
But I wish'd it had been God's will that I, too, then could have died:
I began to be tired a little, and fain had slept at his side.
And that was ten years back, or more, if I don't forget:
But as to the children, Annie, they're all about me yet.

Pattering over the boards, my Annie who left me at two,
Patter she goes, my own little Annie, an Annie like you;
Pattering over the boards, she comes and goes at her will,
While Harry is in the five-acre and Charley plowing the hill.

And Harry and Charlie, I hear them too—they sing to their team:
Often they come to the door in a pleasant kind of a dream.
They come and sit by my chair, they hover about my bed—
I am not always certain if they be alive or dead.

And yet I know for a truth, there's none of them left alive;
For Harry went at sixty, your father at sixty-five:
And Willy, my eldest born, at nigh threescore and ten;
I know them all as babies, and now they're elderly men.

For mine is a time of peace, it is not often I grieve;
I am oftener sitting at home in my father's farm at eve:
And the neighbors come and laugh and gossip, and so do I;
I find myself often laughing at things that have long gone by.



THE QUEEN OF THE CIRCUS.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

To be sure the preacher says, our sins should make us sad:
But mine is a time of peace, and there is Grace to be had;
And God, not man, is the Judge of us all when life shall cease;
And in this Book, little Annie, the Message is one of Peace.

And age is a time of Peace, so it be free from pain,
And happy has been my life; but I would not live it again.
I seem to be tired a little, that's all, and long for rest;
Only at your age, dearie, we're glad we were with the best.

So Willy has gone, my beauty, my eldest-born, my flower;
But how can I weep for Willy, he has but gone for an hour—
Gone for a minute, my son, from this room into that next;
I, too, shall go a minute. What time have I to be vex'd?

And Willy's wife has written, she never was overwise.
Get me my glasses, Annie: thank God that I keep my eyes.
There is but a trifle left you, when I shall have passed away
But stay with the old woman now: you can not have long to stay.

THE QUEEN OF THE CIRCUS.

IT was a strange scene. The wagon was close to the circus—formed, indeed, part of it—the poor woman was lying on the low shelf, called the bed, of the traveling caravans, two or three of the wives of the men attached to the exhibition were round her, endeavoring by their exertions to relieve momentarily increasing pain, and helping her to bear it patiently by their sympathy.

He ought to have been here half an hour ago," said one of the women. "Jim started for him on the piebald two hours since."

"Did he take the piebald?" said another.

"Why, I thought he was in the Italian Lovers?"

"No, he wouldn't run with the spotted mare, so they've put him in the harness with her, and took the piebald in the quadrille for Dick Gravel to take bottom couple with."

The explanation seemed satisfactory, for silence ensued.

Presently a roar of such laughter as is only heard in a circus at a country village—fresh, genuine, hearty—shook the sides of the frail vehicle.

"What's that?" said the apparently dying woman.

"Only your Billi's Quaker story," said one.

"Oh, then he'll soon be here, won't he?" asked she.

"Yes, he's only got three more points, and then he'll come; he don't go in in the Sylph scene."

Three faster peals of laughter told that the three points had, but not as well as the Quaker story; and then he came in.

"Well," said he, "how is she now?" in a voice whose anxiety contrasted most strangely with his merry dress, that of tumbling clown at a traveling circus. "How is she now?"

"I'm better, Billi," said the woman. "Can you stop a little?"

"Yes; I don't go in next, it's Chapman's turn; and so saying, the man seated himself by the side of the woman.

She was still young, and, as far as the dim light shining from the roof could enable a judge to be formed, good-looking: the cork-grimed eyebrows, cracked lips, and dyed cheeks, told that she too has appeared before the public for its amusement; indeed the traces of rouge were still on parts of the face, and told too that she had held that cheek but a short time—only since the last evening's performance: Chapman, during one of her jumps through the hoop, a mode of performance she has mastered the horse, and so caused a false step, which brought her heavily to the ground. The experienced ring-master saw she could scarcely stand, and hinder her; raising her hand in the usual style; and few, if any, of the spectators knew that when rapturously applauding the most unparalleled feat—for feats they were, the Annie's through the hoop & the ground—their applause was unheard by their troubled object. She had followed immediately on reaching the dressing-room, and with encore carried to the moving chamber where she now lay.

But to return. She took his hand in hers, say-ing: "Billi, I don't think I shall go round any more."

"Don't say so, Jass; it'll be all right when the doctor comes."

"No, Billi; I feel better, but something tells me I've got on the togs for the last time."

"No, Jass, no!" was all the utterance he could find.

"Don't say so!"

After a pause, she said: "Billi, you recollect that London chap with the French name that came down to the Doncaster races?"

"Oh, yes, I know," said the man, half angrily, as if wishing to avoid the subject.

"Well, you know you said that time that you thought there was something between me and him."

"Well, I know it," said the man, "but don't think of that now; don't trouble about that now."

"But I must, Billi, I think I'm dying; Billi, dear, and I should like you to think of me when I'm gone, as I am truly, Billi."

The man made no answer.

"Billi," said the woman, with increasing vehemence of manner, "do you believe I'd tell you a lie now?"

No answer still.

"Billi! Do you think I'd tell you a lie now?" said she, as though her life depended on his answer.

"No, no, Jass," said he at last, "I don't think you'd tell a lie any time—but now—" and he hesitated.

"Where's Jenny?" interrupted the woman.

"Here," said one of the youngest women, standing up, so that she might be seen. "What do you want?"

"Jenny, you'll find the key of the green trunk in the china mug with 'Nelly' on it. I wish you'll look in the box, and get me my old Bible and—"

The girl found the key, and asked where the box was?

"Oh dear, I forgot, it's under me," said the woman.

"There, never mind," said he, "I don't want any fuss about it."

"Oh, yes, dear, I wish you'd lift me up a little, and pull it out. You can put the broken chair under to keep me up then."

"No, never mind," said he, "it'll pain you so."

"Oh, Billi, dear, I don't mind, I wish you would."

He did it at last; and, after some trouble, and a few suppressed groans, the box was pulled out to the middle of the floor, opened, and Billi, raising her up in paper and neatly hid, was the Bible; the paper greasy, from contact with dinner-time breakfasts, pork-pies, bands, and other miscellaneous riches of the dress of Queen of the Circus. They began it to the woman, who soon asked, "Where's Mary?"

"Oh, she is here now," said one of the women, and a girl about five came running in: she had only been performing the part of a little fairy in the juvenile scene: her wand was still in her hand, and the gauze wings on her shoulders; she took them off, laid down the silvered stick, and came to the bed.

"Mary, dear, are you there?"

"Yes, mamma," and she came, and the people clapped so when Julia took me on her shoulder."

"Put her on the box, she can't see her," suggested some one, as it was pushed to where the child stood, and then the mother said:

"Mary, I'm going away."

"Oh, mother, where to?"

"But before I go, I want you to see me and be-fore friends and—dead!" The child started with wonder; but the woman, not heeding her, continued: "Mary, I'm going to die, and you must be Billi's child. Will, open it at the New Testament."

"Here one of you women find it. Jenny, will you?" said one again.

Jenny did it, and gave it back.

"Now, Billi, raise me up a little."

"Oh, never mind," said he, "I know you'll get hurt."

She only looked a repetition of her request; and then taking the open book from his hands, said: "Billi, dear, you know I've always told you every thing wrong between that London chap and me. I told you at the time there was not, and you didn't believe me, though you didn't say so; and you don't believe it now," she said, with increased energy, as Billi hear me now—you know it is. I believe I'm a dying woman, there was nothing between us, and this child's your own, as much as Mary's. Mary. She kissed the baby, and said: "Do you believe me now?"

"Yes, Jass," said the man, "I do, I do!" as though some spell over him had broken. "I do Nell, I do! Oh, Nell, what a fool I've been, and what a coward to leave you for so long! Oh, Nell! forgive me, forgive me, I've done you wrong!"

The woman raised herself by a great effort, to reach his hand, and kissing it said: "I do, Billi. I know you'll be justice now and ever."

"Oh, Nell, it's not too late—not too late! You'll get better, and we'll be as happy as we were before this."

The woman only drew his head to her, and said: "Billi, dear, I'm going to die; I feel it and again. "Yes do believe me, don't you now?"

"Oh, forgive me, Nell! Oh, forgive me!" were the only words he could find in the rush of his new and awful grief.

"Billi's wanted!" shouted some one at the door. "Billi, Billi's wanted in the ring!"

"Here's the white, Billi," said Jenny, "you want touching;" and she brought it and stood with the hand-mirror in it, and no one saw the eyes, growing on his cheeks in front of a broken looking-glass.

"I can't do it, Billi; go on, go on, you'll have him in here, and she won't like that."

Billi went out, and the doctor arrived a few minutes after-ward. He was a sharp, stout, good-humored looking man, with a brisk way of speaking, but at once assumed him gentleness.

"Now, then," said he, "what's amiss? I could make nothing of that fellow you sent after me. Billi" added he, turning his nose at his eyes, growing used to the light, took in the woman's face on the bed.

"What do they call you?" turning to the youngest of the assembled women.

"Jenny, Sir."

"Will you step? All the rest go."

The proceedings were promptly obeyed, and he stooped down to examine his patient.

"When did this happen, Jenny?"

"Last night, Sir."

"Why didn't you send before?"

"We did send to our here in the village, but he wouldn't come because she belonged to the circus. He sent her this," handing him a paper.

"Umph! The World and its Amusements on the Broad Way.' Just like that sanctimonious humbug. Beside the woman a trust, and lets her suffer all day long."

"Doctor," said the sick woman, "how long can I live?"

"Live, woman! why, you're good for another forty years yet."

"No, doctor, I'm not—I feel I'm not long for this world."

"Oh! all nonsense" said he, "you'll soon get over this." And with like comforting assurances he sought to raise her from her depressed condition. In about ten minutes he went to the door and said, "Come in here, one of you, while I go to the gig." He soon came back, and the woman commenced her story.

In a little while the Clown came up to the group of women outside the door, and hinting in all attitudes against the sides and steps of the wagon.

"Well, has he come?"

"Yes, he has been in this quarter of an hour."

"What does he say?"

"Oh! she'll do," he says, didn't he?" said one of them, turning to another for confirmation.

He ceased, and his voice was heard shouting some old witticism of the ring, as though there was no sort of expectation, no discomfort and pre-mature delivery had caused here.

Yes! There she lay; the hollow, sunken eyes—made unnaturally large by the dark rings under and upon her cheeks—the jaw fallen. Death was evidently there, and had set its seal. She with whom he had hoped to share all the cares and joys of life; now that the only difference they had ever had was forever made up, was dead! The men uncovered, stunned. A strange pair they looked—he, in the motley and paint of his calling—she, dead!

"Boo-hoo, Billi," said Jenny, approaching him with the child: "it's a boy, Billi; and she wanted it to be called after you."

The man seemed not to hear, but walking up to the bed, and taking one of the dead hands in his, kneel-ing down, he thought about the past and future, and then, as though his loss had just been realized, muttered, "Dead! dead!" and laying down his face close to hers, kissing the fast cooling lips with frantic earnestness.

"Dead—dead!" still came between his choking sobs. To him the women, moving to and fro in silence, the children, were as things of no use-less was the doctor's farewell. "Dead—dead —dead!" and the heaving chest and bursting eyeballs found relief in tears.

"There, don't take on so, Billi!" said one, trying to raise him. "Don't take on so for Jass."

She might as well have spoken to the box on which he half-sat, half-leaned, as he hung over his dead wife. And then tried to get to close the staring eyes, but a bolt which appalled them shook their nerves and took away that of a second trial. A noise outside now attracted them to the door.

"What's the matter now?"

"Matter enough!" said a harsh, grating voice. "Here' Chapman so drunk he can't go in, and Billi's disappeared from his wife's arm. I never never was a fellow in the ring worse treated than I am."

He is dead, Whips," said one, pointing with her thumb back to the wagon.

"Dead!" said the man.

"Yes; and he's there too."

"Well, if that ain't too bad," said he; "here's the last straw before the quadrille, and I'm done —it'll ruin the circus. The second night, too; her last night being but Friday. Here's the two acts standing room—and they've been calling for her all the evening. Dead!" said he, again, as though his loss were only just now apparent. "Who'd have thought it? What's to be done?"

"Can't you get Chapman up?"

"No, he's a fool any time to Billi, and now he's drunk he's no use at all. What's to be done? I don't know."

Here he was obliged to leave, for the uproar in the circus was becoming loud. "Down! Down!" was the only cry they would make. In vain did Whips drive the horses faster and faster, till the "Corsican Brothers" were nearly in a heap, and worse off with their speed; nothing would appease the now excited people.

Whips came out again. "Where's Billi?" he said.

"Here, Billi," said Jenny, "Whips wants you."

Who wants me?" said the man.

"Here, Billi, I do," said the voice at the door.

Jenny gave the child to one of the women, took him by the hand, and led him to the door.

"Billi," said Whips, "here's Chapman as drunk as a fool as ever, and they're crying out for you like mad. Can't you go?"

"Go! I can't be planting to the body. "How can I go? No, I can't go."

"Well, Billi, you must. It's only the second night: don't throw away your luck."

"Well, there's only the Indian Warrior to go in," said Billi.

"Well, I know that; but what's the good of him without somebody to give him his things? What's the use of my giving him his club and bow, or the paddle either? No, Billi, you must go; it won't be so bad in any one else now they'd pull the place down."

Here another and louder cry reached them.

"Hear them, Billi! Whips, "that's it; there's the 'Corsican Brothers' has been agoing round this quarter of an hour, till they're sick of it, and the gig'll be as tame to-morrow she won't suit a pig. It's no use, Billi; you must go."

"I can't, Whips; it'll be no use if I do."

"Oh yes, you will; you must go, or I'll have to throw up the agreement, and you know you've overdrawn your money this last week."

"Well, I know it," said the man, evidently irresolute now at this threat.

"Well, then, go in if it's only five minutes. Here, take a drink of this, it will give you heart. The man took the proffered flask, and drank deeply.

"Well," said Whips, "you'll go, Billi, won't you?"

"Oh yes, I'll go," said the man, "go on."

They left the wagon, and the repeated rounds of applause showed that the public was satisfied. The clown was never more witty, never more agile. Mermaids after mermaids left the water, Jack was taken with a recklessness that nothing could equal again and the success of the whole ballet, and the graves of the vulgar, spurred his exertions. The last it ended, and the quadrille came on. The clown left the ring, with the plaudits ringing in his ears, and came to the wagon to find—Alas! What?

At the conclusion of the quadrille those in the wagon heard a cry.

"Billi, Billi!" said the man, now in his old position, close to the body, with her hand locked in his, and his eyes fixed on her face. "What's that?"

"They're calling for her," said Jenny, pointing to the inclosed box.

There was a lull, and then a long thunder of clapping hands and stamping feet, rose and died away.

"What's that last?" asked the woman, holding the child of a previous husband.

"Oh! they called for the queen, and old Whips made a speech, and said she was dreadful ill, and could not appear, but would most likely be better to-morrow, when she would again perform the inclosed feat of leaping through the hoop to the ground."

"Well, my dears," said the Doctor, at the next per-table to his children, "How did you like it?"

"Oh! we didn't see much of it, papa."

"No?"

"Then, not at all; the man in the ring said it was not well, but would be there to-morrow, as the clown was so good, father, in the scene with the savages."

"Was he, my dear. Do you know why you didn't see the queen?"

"No."

"Well, then, I'll tell you. Because she was dead! Dead, my dears, as you will be one day. I'll tin kissing her dead lips, and I dare say he is there now. It's a strange world this! Such a sight as that I never saw before, and hope never to ag again."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 6, 1859.

PEACE IN EUROPE.

EIGHTY days since war broke out between Napoleon and the Emperor of Austria; peace is now made. The two Emperors had a chat at an inn on the morning on the 11th, in a little cottage at Villafranca, and the result of that chat was an end to the war and a restoration of peace. The news came as a surprise as an event so unexpected, so startling, so utterly at variance with all established precedent and rule?

When the last number of this journal went to press we expected hourly to hear of a new battle and a line of fire—for it was then known that the French were within the historic quadrangle; that the Austrians were demoralized and their spirits broken by defeat; that Italy, though weakened by a series of bloody conflicts, were flushed with victory, and strong in the conviction that the cause of right and freedom would end the war, and render the entire liberation of Italy from foreign rule a mere question of weeks. Revolving in our minds the probable result of human beings is to every one, it must be confessed that people at large rather desired to hear of the capture by the French and allies of the Italian quadrion forever, and to put an end to the outrageous career of Austrian tyranny. We dread of the loss of life, of the carnage, and on the heels of the armistice a peace.

Well, we must wait for details before expressing an opinion as to the policy or to denounce Napoleon for betraying Italy, as the liberal organs in England have done; nor must we forget the part played by Prussian mediation behind with force, as some of his own organs delight to do. Every thing depends on the details of the arrangement which was made at Villafranca.

It is possible to conceive an Italian Confederation composed of the same as the old Confederation of Germany, and calculated to yield very satisfactory results. In a former article we endeavored to point out the difficulties in the way of the political reorganization of Italy. There was the Pope, in the first place, whose temporal power is a monstrous anomaly, and a crying shame—admitted to be such as freely by Catholic as by Protestant Powers. Then there were the rivalries between the various States into which Italy is divided; rivalries so bitter that Venice, in 1848, preferred to be subject to Austria rather than become an integral part of the free dominion of the King of Sardinia; no union over that not even Parma or Lucca would exchange independent slavery for associated freedom. Then the varieties of government prevailing in Italy opposed very formidable barriers to a general fusion: Tuscany was semiconstitutional, Naples was a despotic monarchy, Lombardy and Venetia were a preconsulate, Piedmont a limited monarchy, the Papal States an absolute hierarchy, San Marino a democratic republic, etc., etc.; how were all these various elements to be fused into a homogeneous whole? To be evident, as a principle, was not the same thing as to be practicable. Even if the various States could be formed into a nation was by means of a Confederacy which, like our own, should leave to each State the control of its local affairs, and merely intrust the associate body with the administration of foreign affairs, and such local or specific concerns as pertain to the quality of a nation.

Thus far, therefore, there is no room for complaining of what Napoleon has done. But it remains to be seen whether this confederacy of his has been organized on a stable basis, and whether the evils which rendered the war necessary have in reality been cured.

The first question is, Have the Austrians been driven out of Italy? The answer to this is by no means certain. It is true that the Emperor of Austria still holds the fortresses of Venetia. If, in his quality of King, he is entitled to use his Austrian armies for the intimidation of the Italian confederacy, and for the suppression of subjacent Italian States, then the work undertaken by Napoleon has not been performed, and a new war will at once and inevitably become necessary. If, on the contrary, Venetia has been severed from the Austrian empire, and precautions have been taken against its falling under the power of Austrian soldiers therein; if, in a word, the Francis-Joseph title to Venetia, which he is clearly disconnected from the Francis-Joseph who is Emperor of Austria, then the new confederation of the Austrian provinces to the Italian Confederacy does not seem to be essentially dangerous.

In like manner, if the Pope has been appointed President of the Italian Confederacy without prejudice to his existing administration in the Papal States, and if he retains the new régime the disgraceful mismanagement of the Cardinals is to continue, then the Italian knot remains to be unravelled, and the last attempt to untie it will be worse than the first. But if, on the other hand, the elevation of Pius IX. to the honorary Presidency of the Confederacy is merely an empty honor granted him in lieu of the substantial authority he now wields over the Papal States, then the work is done, and all is my work well. If instead of the corrupt, inefficient, and brutal misgovernment of the Cardinals, a sound administration can be established on the basis of the Napoleonic system, it can not be doubted but Italy will be a gainer by the change.

Every thing depends on the details; until we have them, no judgment that is worth listening to can be pronounced. Le roi est mort, vive le roi! In a few days we shall have them, and shall then know whether Napoleon is a mean, selfish traitor, or the greatest statesman of modern times.

THE LOUNGER.

THE PEACE—A COLLOQUY.

CHARLES. "Nobody has a right to be disappointed in my friend Napoleon again."

ENO. "I don't agree with you at all. You remember he said—"

CHARLES. "Oh, yes; I remember a great many things he said, which you have perhaps forgotten. On the 27th September, 1858, he took his seat in the French Assembly, and said, 'I advocate democratic institutions.' A few months after he was a candidate for the Presidency, and he said, 'I am not an ambitious man who dreams of the empire and war . . . . . I am a republican, and my ambition is pledged that, at the end of four years, I have in no way accepted the power unconstitutionally and with liberty intact.' When he was elected President he took the oath, and said, 'I swear to remain faithful to the democratic republic one and indivisible;' and in his speech he said, 'My desire is to re-establish peace and to maintain our democratic institutions.' Three years after he said, 'The Assembly is conspiring against the President. My ministers have ceased to be sent to the Tuileries, he swept the streets with type, he called the most honorable citizens conspirators, he unloosed the press, he surrounded the most secret and the strongest police. He has undone Republican liberty for ever, and not one great civilian has been developed by his reign. Philo Senna is the style as head of the Roman Censors. Will you tell me why you speed what he says? If you have read 'Pelham,' you remember Mr. Abednego, the money-lender, the middle-aged gentleman, who wore green spectacles. These green spectacles were morality itself. Only Mr. Jenkinson was a horse-jockey, and cheated dreadfully. Whenever Louis Napoleon says any thing in a fine proclamation, he says he only putting on his green spectacles, and look out for your pockets. I repeat, nobody has a right to be disappointed by his peace. He went to Italy to help himself, not to help the Italians; and he must be the judge when he has succeeded."

ENO. "Didn't he say that he was going to free Italy?"

CHARLES. "No. It is no matter if he has'; but this is what he did say on the 24 of May, upon leaving Paris: 'The object of this war, then, is to restore Italy to herself; not to impose upon her a change of masters' . . . . . 'or to disturb the power of the Holy Father, whom we have replaced upon the throne.' Of course that last is what is irreverently called 'gag,' but it is all gagging. On the 12th of May, in Genoa, he said to his army, 'We are about to march upon the Alps, to the cry of conciliating their independence, and to rescue them from foreign oppression.' Upon the 8th of June, in Milan, he said to the Italians, 'I come not here with a prearranged plan to dispense sovereigns or to impose on you my will. My principle is to fight your enemies and keep internal order. No obstacle shall be raised by me to the formation of your legitimate wishes.'

ENO. "But that is the genuine Italian liberty."

CHANG. "Louis Napoleon means to have the credit of that meaning. But without saying that under cover of that meaning he intended to say at a moment, when he had gained his own ends, what he chose. He says he did mean to restore Italy to herself, how has he left her? A Bourbon in Naples, The Pope in Rome, An Austrian Archduke in Venice. An Austrian Duke in Tuscany. A Duke in Modena. The citadel of Northern Italy in the hands of the Austrians; and, on the other hand, against all this artificial system, all the plains of Lombardy. 'No obstacle,' says the Emperor, 'shall be raised by me to the free expression of your legitimate wishes.' At Perugia, for instance? Or at Venice under the Austrian Archduke? Duc Toscany? Duc Modene? Do the wretched Roman States want Austrians with his papal nose of wax? Austrians like a bucket of water at a confederation of Austrian Archdukes presided over by the Pope of Rome?"

ENO. "But, surely, you do not expect the course of history to be turned in a day. You do not suppose that, even in the most auspicious of times, especially, Italy restored to a place among sovereign powers, and all this without a movement on the part of Europe?"

CHANG. "Certainly not because Louis Napoleon said so, or wrote so. But he has thought, and think, that Italian freedom is his interest. He says on the 12th July to the army at Valeggio: 'Italy, beneforth mistress of her destinies.' That would seem to imply that the object of the war is accomplished, by common consent among men, as we have only stopped because the contest was about to assume gigantic proportions, like breaking with the interests that France had in this foreign affair. Except for that, then, he would have gone on. 'Italy, mistress of her destinies.' What, then, would he have done, farther?"

ENO. "What has he done?"

CHANG. "He has given himself the right to interfere in Italy, in company with Austria, to suppress any popular movement; and by giving Lombardy to Sardinia, without an appeal to the people of Lombardy, he has given himself the right to dictate to Sardinia. He is by far the ablest monarch in the world, and he has accomplished by a pen; and he conquers generals by his sword. He has made himself master of Italy. He has played a splendid game, however every thing has been."

ENO. "There seems to be but one side to this conversation."

CHANG. "My dear Eno, there is only one side to the subject."

AFTER THE BATTLE.

THE details of Mr. Raymond's letters from the seat of war irresistibly suggest the question, how long would our countrymen endure if every thing were obliged to remain after a battle until it had buried all its dead and cared for its wounded?

The battle-field, the music, the sun-beams, the glitter, the dream of glory, the excitement of adventure, the novelty, the variety, all these make the departure of an army so splendid that the thought of disaster, of pain, of gory death, floats only dimly in the imaginations of the light-hearted crowd.

So in battle itself, the wild alarm, the doubt, the momentary panic, the rush of desperate savage passions—all these conceal the real suffering.

But when the bright cloud has rolled on, when every wound is dressed, and every soldier filled with excitement march rapidly away to new fields, then is the time for reflection. Then is the policy of war to remove every victim as fast as possible, so that the soldier really does not understand to what he is exposed. Could the dead army have remained bivouacked upon the field—could each shallow hole in every trench have been covered over with the thousands of his wounded fellows, the word glory would have become gore in his mouth—he would have turned pale, and felt a sinking at his heart and a lingering step.

It is fortunate that the real generals fighting for glory that they leave their battle-fields behind them.

A SHORT SERMON.

MR. BUCKLE insists that the laws of average will prevail in spite of every thing, and that a certain number of people will leap from the monument, a certain number commit suicide, a certain number murder those somebody else. And certainly the crimes continue, although when we read of a great outrage, or of a fearful catastrophe, we hope that somehow this is the last. But at the end of every year the inexorable philosopher collects his instances, files them away, and after twenty years shows us the old average.

Mr. Buckle says that Sir Mary Ing in one of his brilliant lectures calls the "Laws of Disorder," and is one of the most striking and solemn of the things that we can call upon the daily course of life. The sudden gust of passion, the crime that springs from a frenzied whim, they are all regulated by a law as fixed as that of gravity. It is a startling illustration of the ubiquity of perfect order. It is like other side of the beautiful illustration of Christ that not one sparrow falleth to the ground without our Father.

But it does not follow that because nothing happens except in obedience to law, that therefore every man is to be equally honored as the executor of the divine will. We can not sound the infinite mystery of divine universal law, but we know something of our own consciousness. A man commits a crime. The moralist coolly quotes Pope: "Whatever is, is right." This crime, then, was right, and the doer was the servant of the divine will and permission. Or to put the position in another way: Nothing can be done without the divine permission. A crime is committed. But how do you punish the criminal who is merely an agent?

Many a man is confused by this sophistry. Many of the blackest and most fiendish of human acts are said to be legitimated upon this ground that they are within God's providence. But the instinct which in every moral consideration of crime is just as profound as the conviction of the divine supremacy. If it is a law of God that a man shall commit a crime, it is equally a law that his offense shall be detected and punished. If a murder is done, it is a law of God that the murderer shall expiate his offense by his own death. Society is merely an equality ingenuity one in protecting my family and property.

The confusion of these apparently diametrically opposite laws is beyond our sight and knowledge. But the practical issues of every day are also of the divine consistency of his government whether we understand it or not.

Thus, for instance, whenever a man says that God has permitted a crime, he may be answered by saying that God has forbidden us to condemn the crime and punish the criminal.

THE PILGRIM MONUMENT.

IN the year 1608 a few English farmers with their families left their old home at Scrooby in Nottinghamshire, and, crossing the ocean to the Texel, the romantic traditions of Sherwood forest the soft horizon of familiar uplands, blooming hedges, and green meadows, and, pitching their lowly English landscape and the dear English land, and went through dangers and difficulties to Amsterdam.

A few months later they removed to Leyden. There they lived for twelve years, and were more than three hundred men and women, honest, peaceful, and industrious. Their pastor, John Robinson, was only a handful of English farmers who loved an idea more than native land, more than all sweet associations, home and kindred, more than life itself.

But they were English still, and loved England. Was there no way in which they could serve their idea and still serve England? At last they could see it. Commercial and political and ecclesiastical action, after many arrangements and doubts and fears, failed. Then they resolved upon a measure left "that goodly and pleasant city," they left the clean, wide streets of thrifty Leyden, the quiet canals, the pleasant windmills which the children know, the venerable shade of the old University—they sorrowed to leave, fourteen years after upon the River Meuse. There they knelt upon the shore, and wept and prayed. There they sang hymns, and solemnly as the pastor, who told them that he was "very confident the Lord had more truth and light yet to break forth out of His Holy Word; and that it was" not possible the Christian world should come so lately out of such thick antichristian darkness and full perfection of knowledge should break forth at once;" and so they left the shore and sailed away, and left also all the wise words of their teacher thrilling their hearts, on the 234 of July, 1620—which, with the difference of style, is the 15th of August, the 15th is the feast of this year—they sailed in the little Speedwell, and in the Mayflower, of which, we are told, "Christopher Jones was master," and they were pilgrims.

Their descendants meet this week to lay the corner-stone of a monument commemorating the beginning of their history and the brave lives of their forefathers. And, indeed, without a monument they are not likely to be forgotten. The scene of the Pilgrims are fond of reminding the rest of the world that it is all in a way wonder. When their ever a colony planted upon a foreign shore under circumstance so sublime? No Greek or Roman, no English or English settlement had a brighter subject than conquest, discovery, greater facility of trade, or better chance of wealth. But for trade, the pilgrims hoped to make a living; for ease, they embraced discomfort and death; for conquest, a handful encountered a boundless forest; for discovery, the land was already known.

They do well to build a monument. They do well to meet, year by year, and repeat that story old story. They do well in every way to cast themselves back upon the past, and remember that yet how justly may it not be said to every son and daughter of the Pilgrims, as Longfellow says of Michael Angelo in St. Peter's, as to Wren in St Paul's, "Si monumentum quæris, circumspice!"

THE NEW GOLD DISCOVERIES ON THE ISTHMUS OF PANAMA.

BY F. M. OTIS, M.D.,

SURGEON OF THE STEAMSHIP "MOSES TAYLOR."

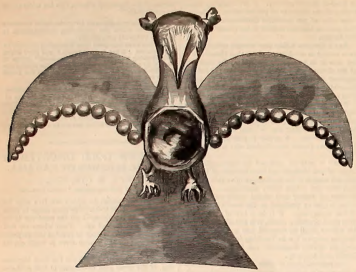
TWENTY days period in which we live may be counted the Age of Gold. The time seems to have arrived when the riches of all the earth are to be disclosed and yielded up. Turn where we will the golden mountain woos us to delve into its fragrant bowels, or the golden river to wash out its golden sands.

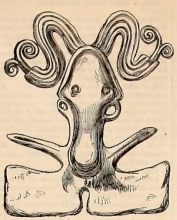
The last, though perhaps not the least interesting, of the great gold discoveries of this golden century, is that of a vast country on the Isthmus of Panama. On a day in the latter part of June last I arrived in Panama—a town in the district of Boquerón, in the province of Chiriqui (New Granada), which is situated among the forests in the vicinity of his estate, constructed a house which had been prostrated by a recent tempest, and undertook to have it repaired over with a small earthen jar. Upon examination this proved to be composed of a material resembling no less than seventy-five pounds' weight of those leaves.* Not exactly confident, however, of the quality and richness of the metal, he decided that the weight born his discovery; and in less than a fortnight after a thousand dollars' worth of gold, having a dug up "more than nine arrobas" (25 pounds' weight) of images, most of which proved to be of pure metal. This is the beginning of the information, in regard to the discovery of these antiquities, brought to the City of Panama by the natives of Boquilla, who substantiated their statements by bringing also with them, in their canoes, seventy-five pounds' weight of golden images for sale. They also reported that there had been a great excitement among the natives for many miles around the beacon, that towns and flourishing estates were wholly deserted; and that, in consequence of so great and unexpected an influx into that region, there had already come to be a great dearth of provisions, and that considerable suffering had been the consequence.

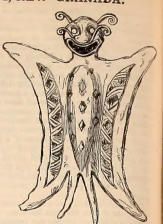
The reports of the natives were confirmed by many letters received by parties in Panama from the City of David, the capital of the province of Chiriquí, which all concurred about their riches from Bugalita, and two leagues distant from the Pacific Ocean. Among these was one to the Governor of Panama from the Governor of Chiriquí, in which he stated that considerably more than 4500 (60 pounds' weight) had been taken up; that over four thousand graves had been rifled; and that as there were innumerable graves in the vicinity still unbroken, that a very little delving by the innocent wealth would be eventually realized therefrom. A small portion of this treasure had been received at Panama consisted of small images of gold, which had evidently been cast in clay moulds, and afterwards highly ornamented in the regalia of amonthness. The workmanship of many exhibited no little mechanical ingenuity and skill. Quite a large proportion were of virgin gold, while others varied in purity from eighteen to twenty carats fine, owing undoubtedly to the artificers being ignorant of the art of separating the baser metals from the gold in a pure state. The most of these were found wax of copper. In size these images varied from three pennyweights to six pennyweights. Animals, bird, fish, reptiles, and semi-human monsters hideous to the last degree; in very many, but all these figures were found of plates of gold, from three to twelve inches in diameter. Each plate was found to have a hole in the centre. The accompanying sketches were drawn with care from the originals in the possession of Messrs. Aspinwall & Co., agents here at the City of Panama, who courteously offered every convenience and facility for their execution. But little possible information could be gathered as to the condition in which the graves and their contents were found, except that they had left hand side of every grave, looking toward the East, were the jars containing the gold were deposited. The Lounger received for some intelligent visitor to the interesting world to observe and communicate to the extending world any data which may tend to throw light upon the probable antiquity of these sepulchral remains. That they date back to a very early period there seems but little doubt, not only from the fact that the present Indian tribes of Central America have no knowledge of these insects which abound throughout the whole country, nor of the art of working in gold, which was found buried, but in the "History of New Granada," by Colonel Joseph

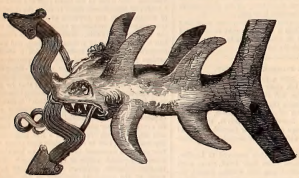
* A large number of these images are on exhibition at Messrs. Bell, Black, & Co.'s, corner Broadway and Murray Street.

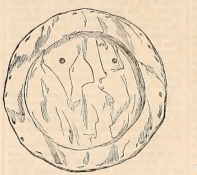
GOLDEN IMAGES FOUND IN INDIAN GRAVES IN THE PROVINCE OF CHIRIQUI, NEW GRANADA.

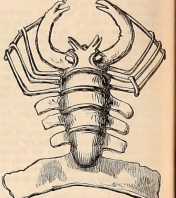


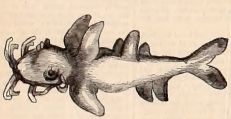


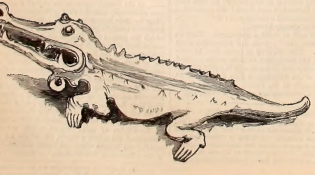












chim Acosta, mention is made of a discovery by the Spaniards as far back as the fifteenth century of similar treasures at Zenu, in the Province of Antiochia, New Granada. After speaking of the discovery of the riches in the Indian burial-grounds at Zenu, the historian proceeds with the following description: "The cemetery of Zenu was composed of an indefinite number of mounds of earth, some of a conical form and others more or less square. When an Indian died it was the custom to dig a hole capable of containing his arms and jewels, which were placed on the left hand side of his grave, looking toward the east, and around these were placed earthen vases containing chicki and other fermented drinks; also Indian corn and stones to pound the same; also his wives and slaves (if he was a principal man), which last thoroughly intoxicated themselves previously to their interment; and then the whole was covered over with a species of red earth brought from a distance. Then the mourning commenced, which lasted as long as there remained any thing to drink, and in the mean while the mourners continued to throw earth upon the grave; thus it was elevated according to the ability of the individual or family to provide a greater or less quantity of liquor. . . . Jewels of gold in large or small quantities were found in all the tombs. In some were golden figures representing every class of animals from man to the ant, and sometimes in amount to the value of ten, twenty, and even thirty thousand dollars." It appears not improbable from the above extract that the mode of Indian burial at the time of the Conquest was almost if not quite identical with that of those recently discovered; so that these relics may not date more than four or five hundred years anterior to the present day. Its appearance, however, they are sufficiently antique to have been the handiwork of old Tubal Cain himself. The immense quantity of golden ornaments in the possession of the people whose sepulchres are now being so unceremoniously ransacked would lead us to believe in the existence of rich mines of the precious metal in this vicinity. It is said that the Spaniards formerly worked several exceedingly rich gold mines near the ancient city of Cartago in the adjoining province, but that the hostility of the Indians compelled them to abandon both the mines and the city; and notwithstanding that many efforts have since been made to discover the site of the city and its mines, they are still unknown. These recent discoveries of gold will undoubtedly induce fresh exploration, and may soon lead to the discovery of auriferous deposits of great value.

The district of Boqueron, in which the bones now being opened are situated, is between 82° and 83° west longitude, and 8° and 9° north latitude, and about 180 miles southwest of the city of Panama.

AUNT DAGON RAKING THE ROOM.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER XLIII.

MRS. DUNHAM BRICKLE AT HOME: On dancing.

SECRETLY quoted its eyes and actually stared when it beheld Miss Hope Wayne entering the drawing-room of Mrs. Dunham Brickle. Mrs. Brickle herself, all stars and artificial flowers and Mechlin lace, received Mrs. Dinks and Miss Wayne with a smirking obeisance of welcome to virtuous.

"Really, Miss Wayne, I am delighted," said Mrs. Brickle, with a smile that might have been made at the same shop with the flowers that dangled over it, and those that maintained perennial spring upon the bosom of the matron already far advanced in the Indian summer of life.

Mrs. Dunham Brickle's friendship for Miss Wayne and her delightful aunt from Boston consisted in two pieces of pasteboard on which was painted in German text, "Mrs. Dunham Brickle, St. John's Square," and which she had left during the winter; and her delight at seeing her was genuine—not that she regretted they would solace each other's souls with friendly intercourse, but that she knew Hope to be a famous beauty who had lately retired from active war at the very end of the season, when she appeared, for the first time, at her ball.

This reflection secured an unusually ardent reception for Mrs. Dagon, who followed Mrs. Dinks's party, and who, having made her salutation to the hostess, said to Mr. Boniface Newt, her nephew, who accompanied her,

"Now I'll go and stand by the pier-glass, so that I can rake the rooms. And, Boniface, mind, I depend upon your getting me a nice dinner sauce, at supper, with plenty of dressing—mind, now, plenty of dressing."

Perched like a contemplative vulture by the pier, Mrs. Dagon declined chairs and sofas, but put her eye-glass to her eyes to spy out the land. She had arrived upon the scene of action early. She always did.

"I want to see every body come in. There's a great deal in watching how people speak to each other. I've found out a great many things in that way, my dear, which were not suspected," said she to Mrs. Nancy Newt, who vainly suspected any thing until it was found out.

Presently a glass at the other end of the room that was bobbing up and down said about it every body and thing—at the ceiling, at the wall, and the carpet—discovered the prosperous open cheeks whose ruddy freshness charmed into perceptive eyes—reducing the prettiest face in the smallest surface to subordinate proportions, detecting bare cotton with one fell glance, and the part of the old dress ingeniously furbished up to do duty as new—this philosophic and critical glass presently encountered Mrs. Dagon's in full-dress. The two ladies behind this glass exchanged at each other for a moment, then bowed and nodded, like two Chinese idols set up on end at each extremity of the room.

"Good-evening, dear, good Mrs. Winslow Grey," said the smiling eyes of Mrs. Dagon to that lady. "How doubly scraggy you look in that worn-out old sea-green satin!" said the smiling old lady to herself.

"How do, darling Mrs. Dagon?" said the responsive glance of Mrs. Grey, with the most precious effulgence of aspect, as she glared across the room—inwardly thanking "What a silly old hag to lug that cotton lace cape all over town!"

People poured in. The rooms began to swarm. There was a warm odor of kid gloves, sweat-bags, and heliotrope.—There was a constant fluttering of fans and bobbing of heads. One hundred gentlemen said,

"How warm it is!" One hundred ladies of the highest fashion answered, "Yes, dear."—Fifty young men, who all wore coats, collars, and waistcoats that seemed to have been made in the lump, and at the same agony term, stood speechless about the rooms, wondering at whatever heaven to do with their hands. Fifty older married men, who had solved this problem, folded their hands behind their backs, and looked vaguely about, nodding their heads occasionally when recognized any other head, and saying, "Good - evening, and then, after a little more nodding, "How are you?" Waiters pushed about with trays covered with little glasses of lemonade and port-sangaree, which offered favorable opening to the unemployed young gentlemen to the married gentlemen, who crowded along with a glass in each hand, frightening all the ladies and beginning every body's pardon.

All the Knickerbocker jewels glittered about the room. Mrs. Bleecker Van Rensselaer carried not less than eight thousand dollars' worth of diamonds upon her person—at least that was Mrs. Grey's deliberate estimate, after a careful estimate. Mrs. Dagon, when she heard what Mrs. Grey said, muttered, "Awful trifle! Ainstantis Orry can tell the price of jewelering a yard because Mr. Dagon's father was a jeweler, but she knows as much of diamonds as an elephant of good manners."

Notwithstanding these rich ornaments, Mrs. Bleecker Van Kraut moved among the throng with a face of such unmitigated dissatisfaction and complacency that no expression could have remained upon it for a moment, any more than water upon a polished marble slab. Her face was a superb brocade. It was unexceptionably made—just low enough in the neck to show enough, in the opinion of the most fastidious, and not so low as to be indecent. It was not high enough to be execrably high—so nearly the arm. They were as white as if they had been constantly covered, and as free from sunburn as if they had been rubbed with pumice-stone. Mrs. Bleecker Van Kraut's neck and arms, then, were perfectly expressionless surface. Corbear Van Boozenberg, Abel Newt, Herbert Ocean, and other young gentlemen of fashion, who contemplated it from behind, and decided that it resembled a great deal Cheval-de-frise—"but quite without the steel."

"Suppose you taste it," said Herbert Octoyne, laughing.

The young men passed on smiling, making low bows, suggestive of extraordinary respect, as they passed Mrs. Van Kraut.

That lady's eyes were large and round—they were just a month and sometimes longer in the neck and arms. Her hair was brown and carefully curled. It had evidently undergone the same polishing process that imparted that peculiar air of impeccable smoothness to her whole appearance. She was leaning on the arm of a gentleman in a black coat and trousers, with a white waistcoat and cravat, and a plaid shirt. He might have been thirty—he might have been fifty years old. He had been at all parties for the last twenty years, and was probably continue to go for twenty more. He looked very grave and mild, and was as much like a gentleman as possibly dressed—not as a dandy, and not behind the fashion. He expressed no opinion—for he had none. He was one of those shut mulled politely at the efforts of others. There was not a safer man in the room than Corbear Wilkottie. He was universally considered "such a gentleman," and devoted himself with exclusively to married ladies. He knew all the number of dinner parties and small family gatherings at which he was present as a matter of courtesies. He knew every body and every thing in the world of society. The unmarried girls were afraid of him in the least. They gave up timidity and blushing when he approached, and called him Corbear Wilkottie. They said, taking a freedom with his Christian name.

Of course he was careful to associate with the right sort of people, and was therefore always to be seen attending Mrs. Bleecker Van Kraut whenever she appeared, for of all the right sort of people she was chief. The Bleecker Van Kraut property could hardly have been less than a million and a half, and that immense fortune had actually condescended to marry her. She was merely Lucy Slamb before that transfiguration. The Van Kraut property had been growing and growing about the drawing-rooms of New York for a year or two, watched with palpitating hearts and longing eyes. Until that was disposed of, nothing else could win a glance. There were several single hundreds of them, scarcely quite walking about the same rooms, but while they were received very politely, they were made to feel that a million and a half was in presence and unappropriated, and they fell humbly back.

Madame de Feuille had polished Lucy Slamb until the young lady was finished to such a degree of smoothness that she actually slipped out of the machine.

"Of course," every body said, "a girl who can speak French, and play the piano, and dance, and draw in water-colors, and conduct a charity with such perfect breeding as that, may look for any thing."

Miss Lucy Slamb being thus completely polished, rolled about society like a billiard ball under the eye of a master. Every thing was laid smoothly and slow rolling. When there was a collision there was no crash, only a gentle click. Presently the Van Kraut property put her in its pocket. She was entirely merged in it. In her own house, in the street, in her carriage, at church, in a ball, at the baptism of her children, at the death-bed of her parents, she was a woman of polish and hard smoothness—a sign on which was printed in silk, satin, diamonds, gold cameos, and mosaics, "Entrance to the Van Kraut property."

She always wore the appropriate dress for occasions, and every detail of her household was managed with punctilious care. Her mansion was a miracle of order and propriety. In the library the books, in gilt crimsoned uniform, were locked and never handled. In the drawing-rooms the chairs and sofas and tables seemed to be a company of old bachelors and old maids, so precise were their angles and so rigidly preserved their places in the symmetry of the room. Nothing was all on its good behavior. Every thing seemed to say, "We belong to the great Van Kraut property." The same thing was echoed along the clean corridors, and whispered up and down the stairs. The silver plate murmured it to the cut glass, and the glass glittered the proud truth to the china. No nose —no sneeze—no vulgar talking—no singing—except with a master. You would have thought at least that Monsieur de Feuille must have built the house, and Madame.

So-ci-e-ty knew all this. It gazed with half envy upon the wealth which so perfectly typified Mrs. Bleekie's rooms. But it made way for her. It bowed gallantly. It trod on the toes of mere mortals who had not got clues, and then glittered the proud truth to the chine. No nose —no sneeze—no vulgar talking—no singing—except with a master. You would have thought at least that Monsieur de Feuille must have built the house, and Madame.

So-ci-e-ty knew all this. It gazed with half envy upon the wealth which so perfectly typified Mrs. Bleekie's rooms. But it made way for her. It bowed gallantly. It trod on the toes of mere mortals who had not got clues, and then glittered ruthlessly back. As for salaries, they were mocked and contemptuously left on the wall as Mrs. Bleecker Van Kraut moved on, supported by the arm of Mr. Louis Wilkottie. They did not speak to each other, but they bowed and bowed to be attending her. She was content to know and be known by the fact that she was Mrs. Van Bleecker Van Kraut.

The Chinese idols stopped wagging their heads in the drawing-room with which they were set the progress of Mrs. Van Kraut; but they could not be so free as Mrs. Dagon the moment they chose to think that she could not even suspect, with any air of possibility, an improper intimacy between Mrs. Van Kraut and Louis Wilkottie. She even laughed at herself in the midst of her own malice for merely thinking such a solecism possible.

Fanny Newt's eyes were also in the field early. Fanny, who was not quite in society, had contemplated the capture of the Van Kraut property; but the very moment in which she considered the campaign had frightened the poor gentleman who was the present member for that property, Miss Lucy Slamb had shivered and withdrawn on the dizzy verge of a declaration; and when he recovered and reconvened the lollard ball he was immediately charmed by the very gentle voice which said, "Will you?" and knew as a perfectly polished click of assent in reply.

Heaven save me from a smart woman! Mrs. Bleecker Van Kraut; and Heaven heard and kindly granted the prayer.

So Fanny had boiled again, and had now fairly looked her in the face. She had not yet drawn him to a head. Byron was an old mother fish in the water, who knew the mystery of hooks and baits—of inspect worming and fishing with the current, and sparkling flies sporting on the stream. Beware, my darling Fanny! my darling spawn!

Presently, while she had been went on, and laces, silks, satins, breeches and ties, and broadcloth intermingled and changed places, so that Arthur Merlin, whom Lauretta Newt had brought, appeared in the ball looked like a shot silk, or a salmon's belly — upon over-to demur and insinuate and bridle and declare how strange it was, and how gossipy people were, and finally to retreat from a direct reply under cover of a pretty shower of oh! and ah! and indeeds! and that policy had been uniformly successful. Everybody said, "Of course Alfred Dinks and his cousin are engaged, and Mrs. Dinks likes to have the conversation play with the fact—although there are reasons why it must be not openly acknowledged." As Field Marshal Mrs. Dinks suggested Everybody. But the gallant young private, Miss Fanny Newt, was resolved to win her epaulets.

As Mrs. Dinks made no reply, and assumed the appearance of a lady who, for her own private and unarticulate reasons, had concluded to forego the prerogative of speech forevermore, while she turned herself calmly, and very slowly Fanny with a kind of truculent calmness that seemed to say, "What are you waiting for about that last triumphant move of mine?" Fanny proceeded in a strain of continuous sweetness that fairly rivaled the nightingale in the neck, and the eyes, and the arms of Mrs. Bleecker Van Knox.

"I suppose there can be nothing very disagreeable to Miss Wayne's friends in knowing that she is engaged to Mr. Alfred Dinks?"

Alas! Mrs. Dinks, who knew Hope, knew that the time for dexterous subterfuge and misleadings had passed. She resolved that people, when they discovered what they inevitably soon must discover, should not suppose that she had been deceived. So, looking straight into Fanny Newt's eyes without blinking, and somehow it was not a look of profound affection —she said,

"I was not aware of any such engagement."

"Indeed," replied the undaunted Fanny. "I have heard that love is blind, but I did not know that it was true of maternal love. Mr. Dinks's mother is not his confidante, then, I presume?"

The bad passions of Mr. Dinks's mother's heart were like the bonfires, and furiously raged together at this remark. She continued the fencing, and said, with a sickly smile,

"Mrs. Dinks, you can contradict at once the report of any such engagement."

That was generalship. Fanny was mistress of the position. If Mrs. Dinks were willing to say this, she became the very personified lie that it never would be true. She had evidently discovered something. How much had she discovered? Just what she was to see.

As these reflections flashed through the mind of Miss Fanny Newt, and her cruel black eye shone with a stony glitter, she was conscious that the time for some decisive action upon her part had arrived. To be or not to be, as Mr. Alfred Dinks was now the question; and even as the thought of it she felt what seemed to be a touch. She did not depreciate the ability of Mrs. Dinks, and she feared her influence upon Alfred. Poor Mr. Dinks he sat there absorbed in smoking a cigar upon the forward deck of the Chancellor Livingston steamer, that plied between New York and Providence. Mr. Bowdoin Bencon sat by his side.

"She's a real good girl, and pretty, and rich, though she is my cousin, Bowdoin. So why don't you?"

Mr. Beacon, a member of the upper sex, said gravely, "Well, perhaps."

At the instant also, in Mrs. Brickle's swarming drawing-rooms, looking on at the dancers and listening to the music, stood Hope Wayne, Lawrence Newt, Amy Waring, and Arthur Merlin. They were chatting together pleasantly. Lawrence Newt smiled upon them, and Hope Wayne bending her beautiful head and listening and looking at him in a way to make any man eloquent. Our friend the painter had been watching for Mr. Abel Newt's appearance, and, as he saw him, turned to notice the effect produced upon Miss Wayne by seeing him.

But Abel, who saw as much in his way as Mr. Dagon in hers, but without the glasses, had carefully kept in the other part of the rooms. He had planted himself before the Mrs. Bleecker Van Knox, having resolved to taste her, as Herbert Octoyne had advised, and withstanding that she had no flavor, as Abel himself had averred.

But who can merely for the flavor of the food?

Mrs. Van Knox clicked in the smoothest manner as Abel, metaphorically speaking, touched her. Anna Wilkette slipped away from her as he could not tell how: he merely knew that Abel Newt was an attractive, vivacious, intelligent, disposed. So Wilkette floated about the room upon limp pinions for some time, wondering where to settle, but finally lighted upon Hope flying.

"Oh! Mr. Wilkette, you are just the man. Mr. Whitloe, Laura Magot, and I were just talking about Batrachian reptiles. Which are the best toads, do you know?"

"Or does it depend upon the warming?" asked Mr. Whitloe.

"Or the quantity of jewelry in the head?" said Laura Magot.

Mr. Wilkette smiled, bowed, and passed on.

If they had called him an ass—being the right sort of people—he would have bowed, smiled, and passed on.

"An amiable fellow," said Fanny, as he disappeared; "but quite a remarkable fool."

Mr. Zephyr Wetherley, still struggling with the hand problem, approached Miss Fanny, and remarked that it was very warm.

"You're cool enough in all conscience, Mr. Wetherley," said she.

"My dear Miss Newt, 'pon honor," replied Zephyr, beginning to be very red, and wiping his moist brow.

"I call any man cool who would have told St. Lawrence upon the gridiron that he was frying," interrupted Fanny.

"Oh!—ah!—yes!—on the gridiron! Yes, very good! Ha! ha! Quite on the gridiron myself, very much so! 'Tis very hot here. Don't you think so? It's quite confusing, like—sort of bewildering. Don't you think so, Miss Newt?"

Fanny was leveling her black eyes at him for a reply, but Mr. Wetherley, trying to regulate his hands, said, hastily,

"Yes, quite on the gridiron—very!" and rapidly moved off by himself.

"Good-evenin', Mrs. Newt," said a voice in the rear, and Fanny turned to see Mrs. Boozenberg.

"Good-evening, Mrs. Boozenberg. I was just saying to Mr. Wetherley that it was very warm. I see to me, Now me, see I, you'd better go to Mrs. Brickle's ball. Law, ye, see she, I reckon 'twill be so warm in the house, see she, that I'd better stay to home, see she. So she said, 'Ah, ha!' 'Oh, ha!' 'Oh, ha!' 'Oh, ha!' I'm all in a muck. As I was a-puttin' on my coat, I see, Now, ma, see I, I hate to wear that coat, see I. It looks shabby, and so many wearin' in a great, thick coat, see I? Whew! I'm all sticky."

And Mr. Van Boozenberg worked himself in his garments and stretched his arms to refresh himself.

Mrs. Boniface Newt, to whom he made this oration, had been subject by her acquaintance to Mr. Van Boozenberg was an ass—but an ass whose bravings were to be listened to with the utmost patience and respect. Mrs. Newt, like my dear, but what can we do? When I am with you can you not always do it?

On the other hand, Jacob Van Boozenberg had his little theory of Boniface Newt, which, within their respective limits was correct. He did not impart to his ma and the partner of his business, but kept to his own heart of hearts and breast. Mr. Van B. gloried in being what he called a self-made man. He was proud of his broad tramp and his want of education and its amenities and decencies of speech. He regarded them as unnecessary to a successful man. He even affected them in the company of those who were peculiarly elegant, and was secretly suspicious of all those gentlemanly men of all who were unusually neat in their appearance, and with whom plain Mr. Van Boozenberg could not be. The partner of his bosom was the constant audience of his self-glorification.

A little while before, her lord had returned one day to dinner, and said, with a tone of triumph,

"Well, ma, Gerald Bennet & Co. have busted up. Smashed all to pieces. Always knew they would. I suppose you'll say that all men times—don't you remember?—Now, ma, see I, let's take it, let's take it, see I, because I'm talkin grammar, and all that; but what's the use? What's the use of talkin' grammar? Don't know, see I. A man has to be a muck of a up when he's here to college. But, ma, see I, he's a self-made man, and he knows he knows pretty well that twice two's four. A self-made man ain't no time for grammar, see I. He's got to be on to his biz, see I, and he don't let it be too fine. This is the second time Bennet's busted, [shook his head as over such moral goods, see I. You remember—hey, ma?

When, a little while afterward, Mr. Bennet applied for terms as factor in the general merchant bank of which Mr. Van Boozenberg was president, Mr. Van Boozenberg looked and quavered the English language, as it were, before the very eyes of Mr. Bennet, to show him how he declined to lend his money into any but the great trust that he, Jacob Van Boozenberg, a self-made man, had no time to speak correctly, nor to be comely or clean, was the millionaire before whom Wall Street trembled—while he, Mr. Gerald Bennet, with all his grammar, his polish, and care, and scrupulous neatness and politeness, was a mere shabby, shiftless vagabond; and what good had grammar ever brought? The ruined gentleman stood before the president, and was seized in the throat by the grizzly the bank—holding his hat uncertainly, the nervous fingers twitching at his cravat, his tongue upon his pale, anxious face, in which his eyes shone with that singular, soft light of dreams.

"Now, Mr. Bennet, I see as this very mornin'—see I, 'Ma, I's'pose Mr. Bennet 'll be wantin' a partner in his biz.' If he hadn't been so very fine,' see I, 'he might have one.' He talks be-youtiful grammar, ma,'" said the worthy Croesus, scowling at the unhappy wretch as it were; "'that grammar ain't good to eat,' see I. 'He ain't a self-made man, as some folks is,' see I; 'but I suppose I'll have to stick him in somewhere,' see I—that's all of it."

Gerald Bennet, fortunately, therefore mustn't be choosers, said he, feebly, in his sad heart, and he thankfully took the proffered victuals Jacob Van Boozenberg threw him. But he married Gabriel, as we saw, to try Lawrence Newt.

Mrs. Newt agreed with Mr. Van Boozenberg that it was very warm.

"I heard you went to Saratogy, last summer, Mrs. Newt; but you ain't been to see ma since; you come home so." Ma,' see I,' why don't Mrs. Newt call on us?' 'Why, see I,' said she, 'Mrs. Newt can't call and see such folks as we are.' 'Why, see I,' 'we ain't fine enough for Mrs. Newt,'" said the great man of Wall Street, and he laughed aloud at the excellent joke.

"Mr. Van Boozenberg, if you will not mistaken," replied Mrs. Newt, anxiously. "I am afraid she did not get my card. I am very sorry. But I hope you will call here."

The great Jacob knew perfectly well that Mrs. Newt had called, but he liked to show himself how vast his power was. He liked to see fine ladies in splendid dressing-rooms bowing down before his ungrammatical throne and metaphorically kissing his knobby red hand.

"Your son, Abel, secure to enjoy himself very well, Mrs. Newt," said Mr. Van Boozenberg, as he used that youth, in company array, talking devotedly to Mrs. Bleecker Van Knox.

"Oh dear, yes," replied Mrs. Newt. "But you know what young sons are, Mr. Van Boozenberg."

The conversation was setting precisely as that gentleman wished, and as he had intended to direct it.

Mercy, yes, Mrs. Newt. Ma see to me, I'm, while I is busy, see I, 'how be you for money?' And I see to ma, 'Ma, be she,' 'No, see I.' 'Tis full I have to pay my own bills. I's'pose, now, your Abel don't ivy up no money —but ha!"

Mr. Van Boozenberg laughed again, and Mrs. Newt joined, but in a low and rather distressed way, as if it were necessary to laugh, although nothing funny had been said.

"It's positively dreadful the way he spends money," replied she. "I don't know what he will end."

"Oh he! it's the way with all young men, marm. I always see to ma she needn't fret her gizzard. Young men will sow their wild oats. Why, tain't natural for Mr. Abel Newt to be well. Every man do."

His wife said Mrs. Newt's expression as he spoke. She answered,

"I don't know about that; but Mr. Newt shakes his head sometimes, and he's really grown old."

An attentive ear to these words Mrs. Newt had and the fate of a large offering for discount made that very day by Boniface Newt, Son, & Co.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

MURDER IN BROADWAY.

ONE of the most audacious and deliberate attempts at murder ever known in this city occurred on the forenoon of Saturday afternoon, in Canal Street, near Broadway. The victim was a man named Thomas Bloodie, a Scotchman who, until lately, has resided in Mobile as the mistress of a boarding-house. The name of the assassin is Thomas Jones, a colored free paramour, whom intemperate and violent habits had rendered the terror of the house. Bloodie had provided for this man in the capacity of servant of her, and arrived here a few days since from Mobile, in company with Jones. Since their arrival here he has given himself up to the greatest excesses. In this state he was discharged from the Tombs police court on Saturday, and after vainly endeavoring to induce her to leave with him for Mobile, Jones left her, and went away from him he drew a revolver and shot her. The ball entered the left breast, and it is said that the wound is to be mortal. The woman was removed to the City Hospital, and the murderer escaped in the confusion.

MRS. BLANDINA DUDLEY'S PROPERTY.

THE Surrogate on Saturday gave a very gratifying piece of what purports to be a will made by this lady, in favor of Bishop Potter and Mr. Bleecker Van Rensselaer, purports to be acknowledged at Ulica, instead of Albany, as previously stated. The will is dated the 10th of August, and bears date on the 29th inst., at the Clerk's Office in Albany. The witnesses to the will are Mr. Rensselaer and whose name the trust is executed in the suit of the subscribing witness, Mr. Rensselaer. The will is dated and that also affected it in her signature, supposing it to be a will. Subsequently, however, she executed another will, the estate giving out of the Dudley Observatory controversy.

Immediately upon the death of Mrs. Dudley, she is her business agent, and to whom Mrs. Dudley has ever shown the utmost confidence, has executed a power of attorney to Mr. Rensselaer until it turned up at the Clerk's Office.

The will made in 1857 was executed in the presence of in March last because it clash her own executor, antedating her decision and giving to Potter and Van Rensselaer named in the will immediate possession of the property.

The estate is estimated at between three and four millions of the estate. As the bulk of the remainder was to be expended in charity, if the deed now executed is subsequently should be declared valid, there will be no property left for the heirs at law. The will has received provision of the forms of law.

The deed of trust conveys to Rutger B. Miller one half of the Dudley Observatory property, upon the express condition that he will assume the name of her father, to be known as Rutger B. Miller Jones, and upon compliance with the limitations and conditions therein contained. In consideration of this deed of trust Mr. Miller is to pay annual debts to the amount of $27,000 are provided for, and two years' salary is given to Mr. Miller. In case of the non-payment of Alabony, to be applied to purposes therein named, the deed of trust is to be void and of no effect.

Inasmuch as the instrument was not acknowledged before the Surrogate, it was necessary for Mrs. Dudley to make her will witness to another city, and as her legal advisor had drawn the deed of trust, and was also one of the witnesses to the will, a demand was made upon Mr. Miller for a copy, it would seem that the deed of trust is void, and all just contemplates such a disposition of her property.

CARD-PLAYING IN A GRAVE-YARD.

The Wheeling (Virginia) Intelligencer says: "The grave-yard in Martinsville, Virginia, is now the daily resort of persons who visit the graves of their departed friends. In some instances young men have been observed reclining upon the graves, and even carrying across them cards, bottles, glasses, &c., of persons. When some get to playing old sledge, for cigars, and the noise of their revelry is heard by the passers-by, we think it about time for the appearance of a ministerial force to drive away the unholy visitors from the grave-yard."

Domestic happiness must be 'rizin' in Martinsville; pretty soon there will be none, seems to us, based, inquiring as some if they had seen his wife."

THE CHARLESTON EXCURSIONISTS.

We print the following from the Petersburg (Virginia) Express of July 30:

Garibaldi is a descendant of Mr. John Jordan, Jones and Mr. Jordan's daughter was published about the year 1767. It is a fact that a beautiful young lady, a daughter of Mrs. Jordan eloped from Petersburg about the year 1793, with an Italian light-opera dancer named Garibaldi, who, having assumed the name of Jordan on the death of the latter's death; and letter subsequently sent over by the distinguished Italian. It is a singular coincidence the fact that the warrior Garibaldi now in Italy is a direct descendant of the Jones by the will and testament of Mrs. Jordan, established during the first half of the past century.

The Petersburg Intelligencer: "Circulars was originally the name of a Parisian modiste—see Madame Crinoline, who kept a sort of dress-making rooms in the Rue de la Paix. It eventually came into use to denote the article now in repute as her establishment. She it was who, by the invention of horse-hair woven into a sort of cloth and manufactured into petticoats, realized the fair sex to dispense with that clumsy abomination which always placed them, as it were, in a standing hoop, even when sitting down. The name of the petticoat was given from that of the inventor, and was consequently known as the Crinoline petticoat, was derived from Crinoline, the dress-maker."

M. Bloodie has decided to cross the Genesee River at Rochester, with a view to avoid the toll which is exacted expressly for the purpose. He has succeeded in getting across Niagara again, for the last time, on the 1st of August.

The Charleston papers announce the death of Captain John David Ure, in his seventy-seventh year. The Mercury says that Colonel Ure's father was one of Marion's men, and a wealthy planter. He was born in 1782, and in 1803 was graduated at Yale College, where he was a classmate of Mr. Calhoun began. Choosing the law for a profession, he was early elected to the Legislature of the state, and served in the House of Representatives, and afterwards in the Federalists. In 1811 he entered the army and was made a captain in the Second Regiment of Artillery.

In the battle, says the Charleston Tribune, that the celebrated Indian chief, Tecumseh, was killed, Colonel Ure was in command of the Kentucky troops, which, on Monday evening, the 5th of October, 1813, defeated the British and Indian forces, commanded by Colonel Proctor, on the River Thames. Tecumseh was killed by his position and influence among the Indians, and by his fall the power of the confederacy was broken. Colonel Ure was also in command of the troops that captured the camp of the celebrated Indian chief, Black Hawk, and news which they so hastily agreed upon, are in many cases unintelligible.

The Nord says, the proclamation issued by Omar Pasha, the Ottoman generalissimo at Villafranca, will be delivered from the Capitol, and will then be officially made known to the Courts of Europe, the selection of the Capitol being indispensable to the dignity and to the Christian traditions which form part of the public law of Europe.

The English Journals continued to ridicule the terms of peace which the London Post, Lord Palmerston's organ, had so suddenly commenced an attack upon the preliminaries of Villafranca.

NAPOLEON'S REASONS FOR MAKING PEACE.

Napoleon, in his proclamation, frankly states the reason why he has made peace—namely, that it was not safe to risk pursuing the war further, and that he was not sure of the support even of entirely consistent with the views of France:

"Gentlemen—The bases of peace have been arranged with the Emperor of Austria; the preliminaries are to be signed at once. Italy is about to become for the first time a nation. A confederation will preside over it, under the honorary presidency of the Holy Father. The sacred interests which I have come to defend, Venetia, it is true, remains under the scepter of Austria. It will, nevertheless, be independent, constituting a part of the confederation.

"The cries of Lombardy and Italy cannot create for us on this side of the Alps a powerful ally, who will come to help Independence. Every one must consequently, with this movement, on either side, strengthen the necessity and to labor for the means to strengthen the security of military reforms. A general congress will regulate the questions of fact of civil discord. Italy, henceforth possessed of her destinies, will have to blame herself only if she does not regularly progress in order and liberty.

"I will not conceal from you. The grand cause, you will welcome with transport those soldiers who have given up to the glory of our arms. Marshals Vaillant, Niel, Forey, Tartigi, Magenta, Mezzogiorno, and Solferino, who, in one month, have crowned the French standard with victory, and only paused because the struggle was about to assume proportions unconnected with the object in view. France in connection with this formidable war, has displayed a spirit of sacrifice and devotion beyond of the results obtained, proud, above all, of the blood which she has shed for a cause with which all ever continue a great nation, as long as it shall remain faithful to its traditions, its glory and men like yourselves to defend them.

"Long live Imperial Head-quarters of Valeggio. 17th July, 1859. NAPOLEON."

WHY THE EMPEROR OF AUSTRIA MADE PEACE.

The Emperor of Austria left Verona for Milan on the morning of the 14th. His order of the day, published at Verona on the 12th, says that he undertook the present war for the maintenance of her sacred treaties, relying on the disinterestedness of Europe, on the justice of her arms, and on her national allies. Now, however, that Austria yields to unfavorable circumstances, and that the Emperor cordially thanks the people as well as the army, who have again shown the valor of sovereign race, he suddenly robs us of their cheerfulness if any new struggle should arise.

HOW THE ARMISTICE WAS CONCLUDED.

We read in the Valeggio correspondence of the Daily Press: "Every thing has changed here, and in place of war we now look for peace. The Emperor, having at that took place the day before yesterday: General Fleury and his aid-de-camp, Count Zichy, proceeded to the outposts and proceeded to Verona. At the sight of the flag of truce which was carried by the latter, the gates were opened, and the General and his aid-de-camp were led into the city, their being bandaged; all that was required was that the latter should remain on the spot where he was. The French had observed a similar courtesy towards the men of Austria. Count Zichy, on his arrival, immediately introduced into the presence of the Emperor of Austria, who received him in full uniform, and invited him and his aid-de-camp to his table. Yesterday morning, between two and three o'clock, General Fleury returned to the French head-quarters, and at about two o'clock an Austrian officer of high rank arrived himself at the gates of Valeggio. He was a captain, and his duty was to forward the letter of the Emperor Francis Joseph to the Emperor Napoleon. The contents of the message which he had brought to the Emperor, are not invited to be known to the head-quarters."

About eight in the morning, the Emperor was in his saddle, and rode off. He was a young man of very elegant appearance, and he was followed by a brilliant staff through-lord horse. His hat was surmounted by a large plume of green feathers, and he was dressed in the blue ribbon of some Austrian order. He was preceded by two French bussars, and was followed by a number of red and two Austrian soldiers of a cavalry regiment; two or three other French dragoons accompanied him, and he passed through the crowd in silence, returning the salutes of the French officers who stood in his way. He then a council of war had assembled at the head-quarters of the Emperor Napoleon, at the village of Sardinia, before Pozzolo, and the Austrian officer was led into the room where the Emperor, Prince Napoleon, Marshal Vaillant, and Count de Martimprey, Major-General of the army, were assembled. The Austrian officer presented the letter to the Emperor, with all their insignias and decorations, preceded by Hungarian life-guards, and followed by a squadron of chasseurs of the Guard. They returned soon after to the city of Valeggio, and had a meeting with his Majesty, but we know nothing exactly of the result of the conference, except that the preliminaries of the peace of an armistice are perfectly well founded."

VICTOR EMANUEL TO THE ITALIAN ARMY.

The King of Sardinia has issued the following proclamation to the people of Lombardy:

"Warriors has blessed us with the powerful aid of your magnanimous and valiant sovereign. Thanks to your efforts, the valley of the Po, after victory upon victory, after the most glorious battles, is delivered from the enemy who, in the last year, had thrown his greatest power upon it. Milan, the ancient, the illustrious, the capital of Lombardy, assures the people of Lombardy of their independence. Soon, in your country, many times consecrated with its henceforth form, with an ancient State, one single and free family. I am proud to command in the future, and hope to find in you that constructive which will be the seal of a State capable of living by its own institutions. I tell you, people of Lombardy, to trust in your King. Confidently rely on your brothers. Soon will you be happiness for a new country which Heaven has intended to be free and great."

NAPOLEON'S SCHEME FOR REORGANIZING ITALY.

In Napoleon's settlement, the principle on which the ruling scheme is proposed, which deserves attention at the present time:

The difficulties and necessities of the Italian settlement, as regards Rome, are these:

1. To reconcile the system of government of the Church with a system and regular political relations of the world to the Roman States.

2. To render the Pope independent of questions of nationality, war armaments, internal and external debts.

3. To establish a native army, and national guarantees for the permanent defense, defensive and real protection of the Italian force.

The means for securing these objects according to the Napoleonic ideas are to be found in the proposition submitted by France to Austria in June, 1857. These are:

1. Secularization of the temporal power in the Papal States, by the formation of a key Council of State, with a system of voting, and discussing the laws.

2. Separation from all the interests of the country in the Papal States, elected directly by the provincial councils, or at least, chosen by the Pope out of lists of candidates submitted by the provincial councils, and intended to be left the laws and to vote the budget.

3. Effective control of local expenditure by provincial councils, reserving their authority by delegation from electors municipal councils.

4. Judiciary reform, by the promulgation of a code of civil laws on the model of the Code Napoleon, or the Leopardo-Venetian, or Neapolitan Code.

5. A regular plan on the collection of the public revenue, on the model of that of France.

6. Amnesty.

WHY THE EMPERORS MADE PEACE.

The following dramatic view of the Emperor's overture for peace is worthy of attention:

"The Emperor was profoundly affected at the sight of the destruction of human life at the battles of Magenta and Solferino. There is in his mind a fund of serious philosophical ideas, which inspired his first letters, which are often expressed in his acts and words, and which exercise a powerful influence on his policy. It was the effects of the heat, which kills the wounded, more than the balls, which struck them, that must have been for him a painful subject of reflection. He was led on to a war which had such terrible consequences, and which promised to be more terrible still. He saw that no permit results were assured, must also have influenced him. On the other hand, he could not have failed to see that from the situation of the Austrian army a proposition for an armistice or a peace would be made, and that his manner could not fail to be received with great solicitude.

"The Emperor Napoleon knew these things. He left the battle of Solferino in a state of great agitation. He was in a state of profound sadness on seeing the army defeated, in spite of its heroism, by the excessive heat, fatigue and sorrow, as he was for several days afflicted with serious fever. Under the influence of these impressions, action it occupied, had been promised victory, was not only administered to defeat but demonstrated. He reconsidered the discouragement which the result of the battle would cause in Germany, and even in his own ranks. He knew that his finances were exhausted, that Austria was unable to replace her losses, and that she possessed in military discipline and the valiant resistance of which could not be shaken. He knew that the Germanic Confederation was about to take dangerous measures, and that Prussia was only waiting for the moment when he could have control over his forces to declare herself openly in favor of Austria. The Emperor Napoleon knew these things; and perhaps, full of regret for the unnecessary shedding of his young country, and of not weakening him beyond what was useful to Italy, the Emperor Napoleon hesitated before his pleasure. He knew, besides, that the Emperor Francis Joseph was a man of honor, and he hoped for, saw them with grief ready to unite with his enemies to crush him in the moment of defeat.

DISCONTENT IN ITALY.

Strong indications of discontent at the terms of the peace were visible in some parts of Italy. At Florence great agitation prevailed. The proclamation of amnesty met had issued a proclamation which describes the terms of Villafranca as nothing but a truce, and which says that the Tuscan Government participated in the declaration of war against Austria, and declares that Grand Duke Tuscany will not be replaced under the yoke and humiliation of foreign domination. It adds:

According to the Nord, a French corps d'armée of 30,000 men would remain in the Papal States for the defense of the country according to the tenor of the peace of Villafranca.

The Florentine correspondent of the London Daily News says that fresh Piedmontese troops are going to Bologna, and that the Austrians are to withdraw from it and take from the Pope all hope of recovering it by the aid of the Holy Alliance.

The most important towns of the Roman States have also declared themselves:

Modena and Parma are said to be in a state of revolt.

The Emperor Napoleon has published the official dispatch which had reached Paris, announcing the whole of the terms of peace, and which was read in the Senate and Corps Législatif on Saturday. It is as follows:

SECESSION IN PIEDMONT.

The London Times correspondent at Turin says that press has produced the greatest exasperation and dejection. The Piedmontese Government is accused of the crime of being a traitor to Italy, and his patriots have been compromised by the proclamations which they have put forth broken. Two hundred French policemen were at the railway station to receive the Emperor. The reception toward the Emperor was cold, and there were no vivas to the Emperor of the French. The Florentine correspondent of the London Daily News the Piedmontese are deserting the cause. The Piedmontese are in consternation of the peace, which leaves Sardinia without a single ally. The Minister of War and the Minister of Foreign Affairs is General Dabormida, and the Minister of Finance is Count Cavour.

ADVENTURES OF A PEACE ENVOY.

It was Captain Corbin, of the staff, who, after the battle of Solferino, was sent by the Emperor of the French with a flag of truce to the head-quarters of the Emperor of Austria, and it was to Count Paar that Francis Joseph greets had been killed. Captain Corbin, who was wounded in the battle, was received with great civility, and even when he arrived at the Austrian outposts, where his eyes were bandaged, and his horse led by the bridle, he was treated with the greatest courtesy. He was not allowed to speak, but he only accepted a glass of kirsky. His eyes were then unbandaged, and he was conducted to the French advanced posts.

FATE OF KOSSUTH AND KLAPKA.

The London correspondent of the London Star—not a very reliable authority, however—says:

"Kossuth and Klapka, who have been in private letters from Turin, have both been detained at that place under the surveillance of the police. Kossuth left Turin for Genoa almost no doubt taught that if a treaty was made he was to be sent to the fortress of Genoa, and that he was to be sent to the fortress of Genoa, and that he was to be sent to the fortress of Genoa, and that

A DAY IN THE COUNTRY—THE PICNIC.

A DAY IN THE COUNTRY—AT THE SEA-SIDE.

THREE NIGHTS BY ASH-POOL.

"Mary's late i' coming home, mother."

"So she is, Alice; just put thy apron over thy head and run down t' garden to look if she's i' sight: she sold ha' been home long afore this. 'T' clock's upo' t' stroke o' ten."

When Alice opened the house-door her mother heard the low moaning of the mid-summer wind in the full trees, and, dropping her sewing, followed into the porch. It was a deep, shady porch, garlanded about with roses and honeysuckle in a fashion the sparch should be, and with a narrow path edged with golden St. John's-wort straight down to the gate. There was no grass-plot or garden in front, for the hedges were high and the shrubs thick, but once at the gate, you could look for a mile or two down the fields, and trace for nearly a mile across them the foot-path leading to Heckerdyke. The Mardy was a long cottage standing by the hills, with a stone-flanked hill rising close behind, and the corn lands and pasture lands stretching in front. It was cool to sit watch the cut of a neighbor's smoke for company at any time without mounting up through the wood, but these two did rather a long Heckerdyke. In the hollow two miles distant, and the haze of other smoke hanging in the valley further still to it was now a moonlight night, very clear, soft, warm, and beautiful, and the melancholy whooping in the trees only seemed to deepen the stillness. When Alice had stood for some minutes peering steadfastly at the white road to the left, "I can't make her out, mother; let us walk a bit o' t' way to meet her."

"I don't mind if we do; only let me put on my bonnet."

Alice passed through the gate, and stood leaning against the post until her mother joined her, when they went straight forward along the path, and then down the hill, Alice keeping in the middle of the road, and her mother on each side between them. Not meeting Mary, perhaps they walked further than they intended, for when they came to an inn-house and beside a great pond, called in the country-side Ash-pool, from the trees that overhung it, Mrs. Ward stopped, and said she did not see the use of proceeding. "She can't be long now, so we might as well wait here. It's a bit darker, Alice, but it's nigh tired myself." So they rested on the plank put through the low fence of split rails, and Alice and her mother, and both with their faces set toward Heckerdyke. Ash-pool lived the long meadow grass almost to the water feet, and was the only bay of the boggis permitted it, the broken moonlight shone upon it, on the water with a pleasant brightness. It was a lovely spot! The moonlight and the ripple, the quivering leaves and the dipping reeds filled the hollow with music, and she stared at them until the fancies she saw something white moving out of the bushes on the opposite bank.

"La, mother, I'm glad I didn't come by myself to-night!" cried she, shuddering all through, as I have heard unfortunate folks say who have seen any body is walking over the place where we are to be buried.

Mrs. Ward was looking straight along the path to Heckerdyke, but at this exclamation she turned her face toward her child, and replied, "I was thinking hearing tell when I was a lass how that it was haunted; but I've passed it myself at all hours, and all weathers, and never saw or heard any thing. There's nought if this world worse than ourselves, you've you need to be afeard. Alice."

Notwithstanding this encouragement, Alice's gaze lingered on the water with a kind of fascination. The six boughs swayed apart under a stronger gust, and showed her the thickest and deepest of the pool, where the moss stuck over the old barren roof, and the bank was steep and jagged as if desperate hands had clutched and broken it in a struggling fall.

"Ay, mother, but it's a dismal, dreary place! Let's get on a bit further, or else go back." And she, springing suddenly from her seat. "It gives me such a fod you can't tell."

"I didn't know I'd such a fond lass to take flights an' fancies for she don't know what," responded her mother; "but come this minute! If Mary was overpersuaded to stay supper at thy uncle's, she'll be thinking but she was come in by night; or if she doesn't, Jock'll come with her part o' her road."

Alice sat down on the path at a pace which soon left her mother behind; at the next stile, however, she waited until she overtook her. Then Mrs. Ward said, rather testily, "What ails thee to-night, Alice? One would think thee was daft."

Alice only laughed, and said she was all right again, now she had left Ash-pool.

"Such stuff! She's taking o' being feared on it. It's none so long sin' thee would paddle in after marsh-mallows, with thy skirts and clothing and all if they fod. Don's run, baire, who does that thinks's after thee?"

Alice at this remonstrance moderated her pace, and they regained their home side by side. Mrs. Ward struck a light in the homely kitchen, and soon as Alice turned off the garment which she had worn over her head during the walk, she stood before her mother to have the prettiest face in Heckerdale. Mrs. Ward was very fond of her two children, and very proud of them. The mother was well brought up, and were esteemed as well conducted as girls could be. Alice was tenacious, and was engaged to be married to Farmer Goodhugh, of Rookwood End; but Mary was eatly seventeen, and had no avowed suitor. Alice had a healthy pale face, dark hair, and a figure that was almost perfect in its build and development; but Mary was ruddy and graceful movements allowed. Cultivation could not have improved her much; Nature had given her the form and proportions of an antique model, and also some of the strong passions that moved antique women. Living all her life in that lone house among the woods and fields; taught by her mother, and having no companion but her young sister, she had grown up pure, reserved, and good by habit as well as instinct. Reading her Bible, the Pilgrim's Progress from this world to a better, and a few old-fashioned volumes of spiritual instruction besides, was the highest of her mental efforts; but she was a clever dairy-woman on her mother's little farm, and had quaint stores of practical knowledge about herbs, roots, bees, and flowers; she was handsome, wise, too, and could tell by the sign in the sky whether the morrow would be foul in Heckerdyke by day. Her sister Mary was learning the dressmaking with Miss Timble, at Heckerdyke, but she had always had a great deal of her mother, the liveliest of her holiday excursions being a weekly visit to the village schoolmistress, when the young women of the parish met to make clothes for the poor, under the superintendence of the worthy lady. Dorcas, Mary's wife, paid visits after which, for three years past, Mark Goodhugh had always contrived to go to Heckerdyke on the same days home. Mrs. Ward considered Alice very happy in her prospect of a good husband and a good home, and thought the young people there was an attachment warm, strong, and true. Alice was a woman of very few feelings; but deep feelings for mother, and especially for little Mary, partook of the passionateness of her temperament.

"Well, I'm sure I've got to-night, mother," said she, looking dreamily at the candle standing on the table between them. "I'm sure I'm glad to get from Ash-pool I want to go back."

"I'll hear none o' such ill events," replied Mrs. Ward, and she locked the house-door and put the key in her pocket resolutely. "Mary'll be come home to-night; she's asked and got leave at Miss Timble's got a prom o' work an' has kept her."

Alice did not seem satisfied. "It's very queer, mother, the longing I have to go back and seek Mary; she's always with me, and I've left her. I never felt like this."

"What's come over thee, baire! longings an' feelings, such a fash! What can ail thee?"

"That's just what I don't know, mother."

"For nothin' nowt comes, as the owd lass bod, and she'll not forget all about it."

Alice felt how unreasonable, but very uncomfortable, as she obeyed her mother's mandate, and went up the narrow cottage stairs to the room which she and her sister occupied together. The little latticed window looked out upon the garden, losing Mary herself and the white road stretching away to Ash-pool. She stood gazing on them without any design, until her mother's prayers were all finished, and then ceased, and then putting a plaid shawl over her head, she went down stairs, unbarred the house door, and was away across the first field before the simpleness of this new journey struck her. Then she laughed at herself, and said, "I'll only run as far as Ash-pool to do with Mary, or Mary to do with me, I suppose! I have got the fidgets, I'm sure." And reasoning with herself thus, she quickened her pace, and in a quarter of an hour had reached the wide water and the six boughs overhanging it.

All was just as still, just as beautiful, just as awfully mysterious as when she left it. The moon dimpling in the moonlight, and the great ash boughs swaying slowly to and fro. She stood looking for some minutes, and then, instead of turning to go home, but presently sat down, exactly as if she had come out in the deliberate intention of waiting for somebody. Alice was not a fanciful person, but certainly over her mind vivid recollections of certain things she had read in the Bible, and especially of Christian towing to the shores of the waters of Death, and then taking leave of wife and children more easily and cheerfully than others. Somehow she was startled from her dreams by the sight of a figure rushing down the hill from the same corner pathway, straight toward Ash-pool. In an instant she knew that it was little Mary, and springing forward, called out to her. Mary made no struggle enough; the younger sister was slight and weak in comparison with Alice, but she had the frenzied strength of the despair that is covetous of death.

"Let me go—let me go, Alice," she panted, and twisted herself, and struck with all her little might, but Alice, with a sudden turn, had seized the body, and trailed her by main force along the hedge-side, out of sight of the water; then she suddenly dropped on the ground, and began to struggle and scream now worth loving and living for, and the shame was not greater than she could bear.

She had sat thus with her eyes hidden for some time, when a hand was laid on her shoulder, and a well-remembered voice said, in the pleasant old accents, "Mary, Mary!" She sprang up; she never recognized him; all was forgotten in the opening of the woman who loved. For a moment only—they had been guilty together—both very young, passionate, happy, heedless of consequences ...but the heavy sense of sin was between them, and its living evidence in Mary's arms. After the first impulses both were silent. Frank was the first to speak:

"They were all in church—I felt that I must see you once more, Mary—just once before I go, to speak of matters?"

"Yes—I can't bid you send no more, but my mother does not like it. She would be grieved to know you were here now, Frank. Perhaps it would have been better for me if we had never met!"

"I will marry you before I leave England, if you will, Mary—"

"It is too late, Frank—it's too late; you shall not waste your life for me. I know it would be your pride to marry me, and I could not think of it. We shall stay with my mother—go give us one kiss, and then go—"

"But when I come home again, Mary—"

"You must not see me any more." Her voice trembled with fear for Mrs. Marbell and all, and Frank declared that he should not obey her. "It is foolish to please me, Frank, to see you're fond of me so very, just it does, but it is not a bad heart," said Mary, looking up at him, tearfully, "that what I said from my right—we mustn't see one another any more."

Perhaps we never shall—Who knows whether I may live to come back?"

"Oh, Frank, Frank!" And then the sad tears came.

These two had had no method or design in their fall—young and beautiful, they had loved "not coarsely, but well." Of course the world would be paid by both on one shape or another—nay, perhaps the bitterness of that debt was necessary for their sin. Frank offered to marry Mary, but she knew, and he knew, that it could never be, and that the moment that reparation was possible, it ceased it as forever. We need not try to portion out the relative shares of blame. Human nature is not weak, we know on which descends the heavier punishment.

They had but met but now since her disgrace became public, but neither made any allusion to it; they said nothing of that. Mary was still the confessed and driven her to the verge of self-destruction—of that terrible hour she never thought without fear and trembling. Frank had been much moved. At home he had heard his mother speak with a severe compassion of Mary, and he was not quite unreasonable that she kept herself in seclusion, not appearing even at church. And he had brought him upon that. She and her mother had had but kept his share of her secret faithfully, and she had borne all the contempt in which the mere mention of the mere mention of his name would with many have gone far to mitigate the blackness of her sin. He could not thank her for that, and was disappointed and cold, and she would none of his excuses. They stood on the high ground—on the one hand and the gilded trees, and speaking little; but there was the aching pang of remorse in both their hearts. In the after-taste of guilt is a sort of sweet.

Presently there was a sound of distant children's voices, and Mary knew that the people were coming out of church.

"Now, Frank dear," said she, turning her sorrowful pale face up to his,

"Must I go, Mary?"

There was a few tears mingled, scalding tears such as may your eyes and mine never have to shed! Heart-drops that could not heal the heart-wound, love set on the air, but could not cure.

The little one was asleep in Mary's arms all the time, then prepared to her bosom. Frank kissed the rosy, dimpled face, and kissed the mother's. Mary, I was very cruel to you—very selfish," he said.

"Never mind, love, that is all over. I will like to remember, when—when I don't see you any more, that you loved me. Oh, Frank, Frank!"

And thus they parted; and Mary ran home, crying, crying. You pity her and you love her, even on whom sorrow falls; have a little pity, too, for those whose passion lies under the ban of shame and separation. For neither should be blamed more, save for that guilt which society immoculate never condones. Scourge the sin as savagely as you will, but remember the sinners' humanity, and let by the lash on them tightly: perhaps, as Mrs. Ward said to her erring daughter, you will have less temptation from the flesh and the devil than your weak brothers and sisters around you.

III

Once night, rather more than two years after this parting, Mary Ward sang her little boy up to the stile by Ash-pool. Her little lad was now old enough to toddle beside her, clinging to her gown, to run on before and then return with laughing and crowing, to hide his face against her knees. He was a very beautiful child, with golden hair-like eyes, and brown hair curling in rings all over his head, and every day, to Mary's mingled joy and dread, he grew more like his father, who was far away with the army in the East.

All the long morning there had been the ringing of Breckenlyke church bells for a great victory. Mary had heard the sound over the hills, and had paused in her work often to listen, and think where was Frank all the time that the sun was shining and the bells were ringing through loomy Elvindale? Was he lying dead, face upward, on the crimson battle-field, or was he writhing, in wounded misery, in a hospital tent? Or he was among the happy saved and victorious? She was in a fever-vexish haste, for Alice was to meet her at the stile, with any news she could get from the rectory; whither she could never go, and once or twice she would have carried the boy, that they might get on the faster; but he was full of spirits and mischief, and would use his own little legs to run in among the wheat, to gather the poppies and the corn-flowers, and kept her waiting again and again. But when she reached the stile, she was all too soon—as Alice was there, nor in sight upon the path; so she went further and further, until she came to the edge of the hill, which overlooked full upon the village. A little way off was the church, with the rectory and rectory-garden, and, leaning over the low wall, and gazing, as he evidently was, she tried to school herself to watch and wait. Here it did not matter, but the nurse-maid must have gone round from the south side of the house, or the blinds were down and the lower shutters half closed. She could not see the rector's head and hand about the place; the door into the flowery porch was shut, and the little gate at the bottom had its evening stroll of inspection among his roses. The joy-bells had ceased five hours ago, and though the day's work was over, there was no noise of cricket-players on the village-green, or of quoit-players on the road.

She knew that Alice would go to the back-door at the rectory, and she kept her eyes on that, distinguishing presently a white figure coming, with the sunshine slanting round a corner at the west. She listen ever so long, and she could hear a young woman who was coming from a little dairy-farm that she had passed a few hundred yards behind, whistle as she walked, and sing a verse or two of a song that she had heard. She had a jug of milk in her hand, and, when she came to the gate, she held it for her until she had got over, and then she recognized an old school-companion who had gone into service at the rectory.

"I can't stop, Mary, but I'm glad to see you looking so well. Alice is coming to Ash-pool by and by said she. "There's trouble at home—you've heard perhaps. They stopped the bells directly."

"No, I've heard nothing."

"Poor Master Frank's dead—yes, he's dead—and missis is terrible bad with it. Alice came for t' milk for our teas. I knew you'd be sorry—he was a very fine young man. Ay, true it is, t' best ships goes t' bottom."

Mary never spoke, but just turned round, and walking up the hill, sat down under the hedge, and tottered back to Ash-pool. Afterward she told Alice, that when her old companion said, "Master Frank's dead—he's dead," something more struck her heart like a death-blow. Her sister found her sinking there in the water, like a statue, dumb and tearless, and white as a corpse.

"You have heard, Mary?" she said, kneeling beside her, "Frank is dead—he died from his wounds very sad. They say he was riding into the battle, and cheering his men, when a shot struck him, waved waving over his head, when a shot struck him in the breast, and he died. Oh, love, love! I wish I'd had a right to be sorry for him—but it is like a judgment on him for his wickedness to you."

"Then it is true—he is dead, and I have hated him, as much to blame as he," replied Mary, still clear enough to defend her lover.

"I don't believe it before, but I have hated him, Mary—oh! I have hated him! I believe I was glad when I heard it—I was glad."

"Don't, Alice, don't!" And poor Mary shuddered with a blind, blank look of misery in her pretty eyes.

They were in no haste to go home either of them, and they sat down by the side of the water there. The child fell fast asleep in Mary's arms, but her anguish only seemed to deepen in watching the innocent, unconscious face. Mary had wished she would give way and cry, but of any such outlet for her misery she was not at present capable. Her heart swelled, and her throat ached, but the tears would not come. And while there two women sat silently by the water, the heroic widow was coming slowly toward them, his head bent down, his spirit within him quite dropped upon his feet, his only son—his only child. There was little sign in his subdued presence of the magisterial pride with which he had met Mary and her mother—the flood of sorrow had come over him and swept him down to the depths of suffering below vanity. He had come to the fields by Ash-pool to be alone with God in his anguish, for Frank had been the joy of his life, his tender comfort, and he had died as became a brave soldier but little mitigate the fact. And so it happened that he came to the first time that he was an innocent merry girl, resting to still, broken-hearted, with his child upon her lap. Self-absorbed as he was, he could not but read aright the utter woe-prostration and the terrible agony of remorse betrayed, and with his frightened face cast at him as she moved to let him pass, a sudden suspicion came into his mind.

"Mary, you know what trouble has come to us. You are in great sorrow again. Are our griefs the same, Mary?"

"Oh! Sir, Sir!" That piteous exclamation confessed all, and with a quick gesture she uncovered the child's face, and held it toward him.

The rector could not speak—than all anger, then all disgust, then all scorn reproduction, love is stronger. Mary's love for the son he had lost overcame his strong prejudice, and he recovered his voice, and said, with a gesture toward the home where the bereaved mother was weeping, "I think, Mary, is your comfort for the present, and the know—"

My sketch is done. While there is death in the world, and sorrow and parting, and sin, let love, and Christian charity, and forgiveness triumph as they triumphed here. Mary Ward's life was short—she died within two months of the night by Ash-pool, where she heard the tidings of her lover's death. The child was taken to the rectory, and is being brought up by the rector and his wife—all the world knows now that Mary Ward's son—also the son of Frank Lascelles. There is a gray slab in an out-of-the-way corner of Heckerdyke church with this epitaph—"Mary Ward Lascelles, aged 23. Mary Ward, aged 19. Who art thou that condemnest? Let him that is without sin among you cast the first stone." Which monument has been spoken of as in bad taste. I think it is in a good taste, and that the pathetic pleadings which are so much commoner on church walls.

ROUGHING IT.

MR. MARBELL had a theory—a theory that, by night and by day, he propounded to his friends, and to the world at large, as occasion served to convert Mrs. Marbell. But the good woman was not to be converted. Her nature seemed opposed to Mr. Marbell's logic; her tenderness replied to his first proposition; her motherly instincts resisted his second proposition; her undigested indignation put down his third proposition. Mr. Marbell was a cold man; Mrs. Marbell was a child father. Mr. Marbell was a brute—more, Mr. Marbell preached what he never practiced, what he would never have the courage to put in practice. Mrs. Marbell was as fond as any body of her warm slippers by the fireside, her pleasant bed with warming, his hot shaving water, and his cider-down quilt.

Then why should dear little Augustus rough it? Mrs. Marbell wanted to know this—was, indeed, according to her husband, Mrs. Marbell wanted to know many things. It was the belief of Mr. Marbell that to argue with a woman was to exhibit weakness almost unpardonable; this, when Mr. Marbell was in the mood for argument, which is popularly described as being in a corner.

Mr. Marbell, then, however, the better-half, could extricate himself from his corner by the use of his natural authority. If he could not subdue and conquer Mrs. Marbell's reason, he could command her obedience. Augustus should rough it.

The occasion, as people say, provided for Master Augustus; the hardest bed; a nursery without a fire. Augustus must keep himself warm by exercise; exercise would make him healthy. To-morrow would carefully cover him with warm clothing; would prepare him a breakfast of cold bath, cold his mottled legs with gaiters, protect his little dimpled hands with gloves; but the father would unlingeringly resist the feeble opposition against the cold, and send the boy forth to the east wind armed only by the strength given by solitary confinement; a whimper produced a premature dispatch to bed. No sweetmeats; no fruit; no pastry; nothing to lull the stomach to the pantomime; no nursing upon the parental knee. Winter and summer, coldness or no coldness, the water bathe without mercy. Augustus is to be brought up to fight the world manfully. His flesh is to be made hard by penance; he is to be made stern with naked bosom; to be content with the coarsest fare and the hardest bed.

But his mind is to be under iron rule also. His nature is to be as hard as his flesh. With tearful eyes he is compelled to look, to learn, to task, and pouts her warm mouth to meet his. She would throw her arms about his neck, would lay his little head upon her shoulder, examine fondly, finger by finger, his infant hands—hands that, according to Mr. Marbell, were shameless hands, and, easily as a pattern duke handles the ribbons, to guide the destinies. Alas! for Mrs. Marbell, the child had but in all this wealth of love she would have extended to her child, to soften the adamantine love of her father, who was a lived. The second day in Guesy's life was that on which his mother's fee in the hand to stop her head for the last time, and drew his fresh mouth to her own poor, blood-less lips. The boy was left alone in the world, to be reared after the fashion of a father with a theory.

Most veracious is the history of young Guesy. He saw the world through a mist of tears, and a roughing it. On bleak November mornings, when the leaden clouds swept past close to the earth, and the rain fell in almost horizontal sheets over our road; on days of broiling heat, when the milk in which the children dropped upon the table curdled, and went angrily away in vapor; on frosty days, when the triad of tripping girls upon the ice-bound path passed musically on their sloppy days of dreary thaw, when the snow had fallen to the depth sickness of eight-year-old—on every day down to all who ventured upon it. Marbell had become ferocious in his theory. There was no Mrs. Marbell to soften and to check tender sentiment, or to put a comforter about Guesy's throat. Guesy was a very loose one to him land and foot. Unfortunately for the boy there were no foxes in the neighborhood of Camberwell, or one had been stuffed under the skin of Guesy, that his parent might see whether the boy could let the animal take just care to his at the end of a long chase.

"It is a hard world," said Mr. Marbell, ever his port, speaking with a friend, "and men should harden their children to meet it, as we harden steel, that, with a spring, it may bear any weight. Now, I have resolved to make my boy water-steel like my heart. He shall be able to live where others would die—to flourish where others would fail. His constitution shall be proof against the sin-tap or the valley—to an Arctic expedition, or a secretaryship under Lord Palmerston."

"But you said (note one) Rachel, the maid, who had just appeared, bearing to Mr. Marbell his shaving water, and his cider-down.

"The boy is not a clever boy; he is even dull. The better reason, I say, for hardening him. For such moderate men as I, only to recommend him to the world, how can he make his standing good if he be not prepared to support inconstant buffeting. His wants must be so humble that he may be able to save—ay, part of a crust. A mountain plant, Sir, he must flourish upon the dry rock. I, Sir (and Mr. Marbell glanced through his glass at the dancing heavenly), am the architect of my own fortune. I once swept the office of which I am now the principal. I met men on their own ground as I met my father-in-law's, and found a friend that I had need of all my strength to conquer. My boy shall have a tougher skin, a firmer muscle, than I had. He shall learn to rough it."

Mr. Marbell emptied his glass, and with two delicate fingers dropped his first cool olive into his mouth. The oracle had spoken.

An east wind was curling the autumn leaves, and compelling cabmen to draw their hare-clothes tightly about their legs, on the evening when the oracle held forth from his cozy topple, with a beechwood fire mingled with sea-coal upon its shine.

Master Guesy was up stairs. He was in bed. Sir's clock was his bed-time. In a corner of an empty room with a hard seat—a room used as a naked ground; two rugs covered it—sufficient, in the opinion of Mr. Marbell (how, pray, eating his olives), for the covering of a boy destined to rough it. There the little Spartan lies, sleeping with on the grass of the play ground: his arms under, his mouth parted, and his white teeth glancing through; his cheeks, around the dimples of his cheeks; around, the flesh is milky white. We glance about. There are his coarse blue clothes thrown to his little canvas bed, bottleless at the throat. But we look in vain for socks or shoes.

"Master Guesy," chimes Rachel, "Master Guesy doesn't wear none, please, Sir."

On these brief days—through this frigid mist of our London roads—under these wintry skies—footing this sharp sleet of ours—to go instead!

"I know that he's to be a Sparting; but it's a belief they'll kill him—so there, I've said it."

Rachel assumed a daring attitude, as though she had chased Mr. Marbell's retreating form to Victoria window—and more, had fully intended it for the ears of the master within.

"Then the child has breakfasts as no dog what respected himself would as much as look at; and for his dinners—why, they make my heart bleed to see his poor little teeth a tussling with 'em."

Mr. Marbell looked up from his paper, how, drew the coarse rugs (saying, "Here's things to cover a child") from his limbs, and kissed him.

Surely Guesy's mother is looking down upon you, gentle, uncouth Rachel—looking down, and with pleasure to see her, and to see it still, again and again, kiss Guesy for her. Slave at ten pounds per annum, we believe that, as you say, you would die for your master's son. Mr. Marbell's roof if it were not for Guesy. But thenthe boy is a boy and full of life, and pleasure is of an evening to come into the empty room, and know that as you watch his little sleeper, and cover his treasure with hardened fist, somewhere above this garret is watching you and thanking you for it. Mr. Marbell has gone down to the reward; but there must be comfort in the faith that you are doing well by the hero in your humble way—to Guesy, and to Guesy's mother. "Was you good, Rachel, though you saw us not, when those legs, and the hands of yours, are a tender-ness of heart that made them light as any lady's? Guesy's mother says Guesy is good. But there will be thorns in them again to-morrow, and again the day after, till the flesh has hardened, and can resist the thorns, and Guesy's soul is as hard as Guesy's muscles are to harden.

We will leave the mind years after we glanced into his dreary bedroom; after Rachel had been discharged for giving a slice of bread and sugar to a hungry beggar-boy, and had departed, still to wish Mr. Marbell lived rung with shouts of indignation against Guesy's father.

Mr. Marbell had retired from business, at length, in order to devote all his energies to the hardening of Guesy—that he might superintend in the early lessons of his nursery, the sternness of his bed-covering, the inflexibility of his diet, the isolation from other boys. Day after day Guesy breakfasted, without bat or cap, his throat open, and his head cropped close as his skull, passed out gate, wall-ing, or rather ambling, behind his father. We fail to call to mind a single word spoken by one father and son exchange a syllable. Mr. Marbell, with a solemn expression, to which the brandish-ing of the cane added confusion, and a quickness of an unpleasantly suggestive kind, walked rapidly ahead of Guesy; and Guesy, with his head hanging, and crestfallen, and never removing his eyes from them, strolled, as we have written, after him. The three miles were done in silence, and with the same pace and as a carnation. Old women turned upon Mr. Marbell as he passed, young women looked upon Mr. Marbell as he passed, and spoke passionately—the nature of their womanhood overbearing their sense of propriety—at the fierceness of manner in respect were showered upon Guesy's father. He was a child-killer; he was a fiend incarnate. Then successively, the name of every remarkable murderer known to the streets-folk about his neighborhood, Mr. Marbell was linked, hooted, and pursued with a gymnastic arrangement of little boys' fingers in the thumb and nose as a flourish against the little boys' noses. But both Mr. Marbell and Guesy passed through the fusillade without glancing to the right or left.

We were standing at our gate one day, on a glowing summer morning, Guesy's pale face and film over the deep blue sky. The best struck us under the chin from the burning earth. We felt that we could not live in the atmosphere for five minutes. Lazily, heat-oppressed, we were about to turn from the dusty prospect without, when Mr. Marbell walked past, at his usual pace, and Guesy was behind him—still ambling—he eye still fixed upon the ground, and cool-table. The face was scorching Guesy's uncovered head, we were certain, his lips were black with dust. Living as he was, we passed through there one red spots upon his cheeks. We were tempted to dash through the gate and seize Mr. Marbell by the collar, and take his hat and coats off, and drag him to a further to have his head shaved. But (how grateful we become at five-and-thirty!) we turned downward, and left Guesy to be scorched by the sun, and still, with starting eyes, to follow the coat-tails of his father.

On the following day a sweet little friend of ours, whose voice makes us twenty again, whom there are "few to praise," and whom there shall be, if we have our way, very few indeed to praise — the little friend came tripping along to the gravel-walk from the gate to the house, and trying to look over the mignonette-box at our open window (at which we were preying, by statistics, that the ruin of Manchester was only a question of years, unless we built our houses flat for the future, and ranged cotton crops, under glass, upon them), called to us. We dropped all our figures within to look upon the neatest and most convincing little figure without.

Mr. Marshall had just passed, walking as fast as ever, but little Gussy was not with him. To work went the brains of both us. We called in mind, looking very seriously indeed at each other, the dry lips and the hectic flush of yesterday. The little figure had a very grave head upon it now. We watched anxiously on the morrow; on the third day were extremely still. On the fourth day Mr. Marshall passed, walking slower than usual. There was some heavy, bulging object in his coat-tail pocket—the very coat-tail upon which Gussy's eyes had been fixed so long. We jumped to the right conclusion—the bulging objects were bottles of physic for little Gussy.

Upon that straw pallisses in the empty room lay Mr. Marshall's little Spartan. Doctors' gloves, in fierce wars shaken over the thin limbs, and watched the wasted hollows of the boy's eyes. He was hardened—hardened against all the iron trials Mr. Marshall had provided for him in after-days. Those little shoulders would never overtask a strong back. The soul lying here, still in bondage, was not, we know, steeled yet. The outstretched hand of an invisible, dead mother were over this straw pallisse, and were about to clasp little Gussy—little Gussy, who raises not, when classy eyes fall lively upon the rude parent whose brutal theory has cast him upon a child's darkened bed, the rude parent who, within his memory, never kissed him.

We shall never forget little Gussy's funeral. It is well the police were there, or Mr. Marshall had not been alive now to tell my friend the story as he is to take a glass of wine with him how his theory of making children "rough it" failed in Gussy's instance.

The baby's place is upon its mother's knee; the child's place is between its father's knee, where it may look up into his eyes, and see itself in their kind glances. There are theories which contemplate developing elaborate systems of juvenile culture. There are gentlemen in white neckcloths we know of who believe that model men may be built up like any engineering models, by strict rule, by hours of study exactly measured, by the reading of ponderous moral treatises. So Mr. Marshall believed Gussy might be made a hard, successful man (and a successful man was Mr. Marshall's bewildered of humanity) by rough usage, a legengara captaincy, and a steady outlook over accounts. But we own, as it is our pleasure to believe many will own with us, that we are rather with Mrs. Marshall, and with Rachel also. Our theory is that of making ourselves the familiar friends and most tender companions of children. The world will harden them soon enough; but the less the better, in our humble opinion.

CHAPTER XV.

KNITTING.

THERE had been earlier drinking than usual in the wine shop of Monsieur Defarge. As early as six o'clock in the morning sallow faces, peering through its barred windows, had been seen to ed other faces within bending over measures of wine. Monsieur Defarge sold a very thin wine at the best of times; but it would seem to have been an unusually thin wine that he sold at this time. A sour wine, moreover, or a souring, for its influence on the mood of those who drank it was to make them gloomy. No vivacious Beaujolais blume leaped out of the pressed grape of Monsieur Defarge; but a smouldering fire that burned in the dark, lay hidden in the dregs of it.

This had been the third morning in succession on which there had been early drinking at the wine-shop of Monsieur Defarge. It had begun on Monday, and here was Wednesday come. There had been more of early brooding than drinking; for many men had listened and whispered, and the whisperers about there from the time of the opening of the door who could not have had a piece of money on the counter to save their souls. These were to the full as interested in the place, however, as if they could have commanded whole barrels of wine; and they glided from seat to seat, and from corner to corner, swallowing talk in lieu of drink with greedy looks.

Notwithstanding an unusual flow of company, the master of the wine-shop was not visible. He was not missed; for nobody who crossed the threshold looked for him, nobody asked for him, nobody wondered to see only Madame Defarge in his seat, presiding over the distribution of wine, with a bowl of battered small coins before her, as much defaced and beaten out of their original impress as the small modicum of humanity from whose ragged pockets they had come.

A suspended interest, and a prevalent absence of mind, were perhaps observed by the spies who looked in at the wine-shop, as they looked in at every place, high and low, from the king's palace to the criminal's jail. Games at cards languished, players at dominoes musingly built towers with them, drinkers drew figures on the tables with spilled drops of wine, Madame Defarge herself picked out the pattern on her sleeve with her toothpick, and saw and heard something inaudible and invisible a long way off.

Thus, Saint Antoine in this vinous feature of it, until after dark. It was almost midnight when two dusty men passed through his streets and under his lamps, as dusty as the mire upon Monsieur Defarge, the other a mender of roads in a blue cap. All adust and athirst the two entered the wine-shop. Assuredly the thirst lighted a kind of fire in the breast of Saint Antoine, that speedily caught fire to quench it, when two dusty men passed and were handed something inaudible and invisible a long way off.

Two, Saint Antoine in this vinous feature of it, until after dark. It was almost midnight when two dusty men passed through his streets and under his lamps, as dusty as the mire upon Monsieur Defarge, the other a mender of roads in a blue cap. All adust and athirst the two entered the wine-shop. Assuredly the thirst lighted a kind of fire in the breast of Saint Antoine, that speedily caught fire to quench it, when two dusty men passed and were handed something inaudible and invisible a long way off.

Monsieur Defarge himself sold wine at his counter-part of the day, and plied his trade with such a rapid dexterity that he scarcely seemed to know what he was doing. Yet he knew all that was going on, and quite as much as he knew of the place and the people, and both were far more than they suspected. He was a bold man, set apart from his fellows by the mystery of himself in which he lived. Silent, troubled, and remote, he stood behind his counter, as the tide rose and fell around him, and always when spoken to, answered. When nothing was said to him, he said nothing.

"Good-day, gentlemen!" said Monsieur Defarge.

It may have been a signal for loosening the general tongue. It elicited an answering chorus of "Good-day."

"It is bad weather, gentlemen," said Defarge, shaking his head.

Upon which, every man looked at his neighbor, and then all cast down their eyes and sat silent. Except one man, who got up and went out.

"My wife," said Defarge, aloud, addressing Madame Defarge, "I have travelled certain leagues with this good mender of roads, called Jacques. I met him—by accident—a few kilometres, at a half's journey out of Paris. He is a good child, this mender of roads called Jacques. Give him to drink, my wife!"

A second man got up and went out. Madame Defarge set wine before the mender of roads called Jacques, who doffed his blue cap to the company and drank. In the breast of his blouse he carried some coarse bread; of that he ate of the between whiles, and sat munching and drinking near Madame Defarge's counter. A third man got up and went out.

Defarge refreshed himself with a draught of wine—like the first, he took none with the countryman, and the third man entered. The three had conversed together when they were solitary, but now they were quite silent. Standing at the door, after serving the third man, he looked casually but closely at the faces of those who were within sight, and then stepped across the road to where another wine-shop was kept. A few customers were scattered about this wine-shop, but the master was sitting in front of it on a bench, and he and all his customers were observing the place they had just left and its doorways and windows.

After observing these things, he strolled across to that wine-shop himself, and entered it. Monsieur Defarge had left it empty. He was alone when a fourth man walked in.

The time was seven o'clock, and high time for the three men who were there to dine or to sup. Consequently, the place would have been empty, but that Madame Defarge was always there to conduct it. She accordingly conducted it now, as she had conducted it all day, and made no offer to anticipate the arrival of customers.

Defarge closed the door carefully, and spoke in a subdued voice:

"Jacques One, Jacques Two, Jacques Three! This is the witness encountered by appointment, by me, Jacques Four. He will tell you all. Speak, Jacques Five!"

The mender of roads, blue cap in hand, wiped his swarthy forehead with it, and said, "Where shall I commence, monsieur?"

"Commence," was Monsieur Defarge's not unreasonable reply, "at the commencement."

"I saw him then, messieurs," began the mender of roads, "a year ago this running summer, underneath the carriage of the Marquis, hanging by the chain. Behind the master of it. I leaving my work on the road, the sun going to bed, the carriage of the Marquis slowly ascending the hill, he hanging by the chain—behold!

Again the mender of roads went through the pantomime, in which he ought to have been perfect by that time, seeing that it had been the infallible resources and indispensable entertainment of his village during a whole year.

Jacques One struck in, and asked if he had ever seen the man before?

"Never," answered the mender of roads, recovering his perpendicular.

Jacques Three demanded how he afterward recognized him then?

"By his tall figure," said the mender of roads, softly, and with his finger at his nose. "When Monsieur the Marquis demands, that evening, 'Say, what is he like?' I make response, 'Tall as a spectre.'"

"You should have said short as a dwarf," returned Jacques Two.

"But what did I know? The deed was not then accomplished, neither did he confide in me. Observe! Under those circumstances even I do not offer my testimony. Monsieur the Marquis indicates me with his finger, standing near our fountain, and says, 'To me! Bring that rascal!' My faith, messieurs, I offer nothing."

"His right there, Jacques," murmured Defarge to him who had interrupted, "Go on!"

"Good!" said the mender of roads, with an air of mystery. "The tall man is lost, and he is sought—how many months? Nine, ten, eleven?"

"No matter the number," said Defarge. "He is well hidden, but at last he is unluckily found. Go on!"

"I am again at work upon the hill-side, and the sun is again about to go to bed. I am collecting my tools to descend to my cottage down in the village below, where it is already dark, when I raise my eyes and see, coming over the hill, six soldiers. In the midst of them is a tall man with his arms bound—tied to his sides, like this."

With the aid of his indispensable cap he represented a man with his elbows bound fast at his hips with cords that were knotted behind him.

"I stand aside, messieurs, by my heap of stones, to see the soldiers and their prisoner pass (for it is a solitary road that, where any spectacle is well worth looking at), and at first, as they approach, I see no more than that they are six soldiers with a tall man bound, and that they are almost black to my sight—except on the side of the sun going to bed, where they have a red edge, messieurs. Also, I see that their long shadows are on the hollow ridge on the opposite side of the road, and are on the hill above it, and are like the shadows of giants. Also, I see that they are covered with dust, and that the dust moves with them as they come, tramp, tramp! But when they advance quite near to me, I recognize the tall man, and he recognizes me. Ah, but he would be well content to precipitate himself over the hill-side once again, as on the evening when he and I first encountered, close to the same spot!"

He described it as if he were there, and it was evident that he saw it vividly; perhaps he had not seen much in his life.

"I do not show the soldiers that I recognize the tall man; he does not show the soldiers that he recognizes me; we do it, and we know it, with our eyes. 'Come on!' says the chief of that company, pointing to the village, 'bring him fast to his end!' and they bring him faster. I follow. His arms are twisted behind me of being bound so tight, his wooden shoes are large and clumsy, and he is lame. Because he is lame, and consequently slow, they drive him with their guns—like this!"

He imitated the action of a man's being impelled forward by the butt-ends of muskets.

As they descend the hill like madmen running a race, he falls. They laugh, and pick him up again. His face is bleeding and covered with dust, but he can not touch it; then, upon they laugh again. They bring him into the village; all the village runs to look; they take him past the mill and up to the prison; all the village sees the prison-gate open in the darkness of the night, and swallow him—like this!"

He opened his mouth as wide as he could, and shut it with a sounding snap of his teeth. Observant of his unwillingness to mar the effect by opening it again, Defarge said, "Go on, Jacques!"

"All the village," pursued the mender of roads, on tiptoe, and in a low voice, "withdraws; all the village whispers by the fountain; all the village sleeps; all the village dreams of that unhappy one within the locks and bars of the prison on the crag, and never to come out of it except to perish. In the morning, with my tools upon my shoulder, eating my morsel of black bread as I go, I mount to the prison by the way of many to my work. There I see him, high up, behind the bars of a lofty iron cage, bloody and dusty as last night, looking through. He has no hand free to wave to me. I dare not call to him; he regards me like a dead man."

Defarge and the three glanced darkly at one another. The looks of all of them were dark, repressed, and revengeful, as they listened to the countryman's story; the manner of all of them, while it was secret, was authoritative too. They had the air of a rough tribunal; Jacques One and Two, sitting on the old packed-cask, each with his chin resting on his hand, and his eye intent on the road-mender; Jacques Three, equally intent, on one knee behind them, with his agitated hand always gliding over the network of fine nerves about his mouth and nose; Defarge standing between them and the narrator, whom he had stationed in the light of the window, by turns looking from him to them, and from them to him.

"Go on, Jacques," said Defarge.

"He remains up there in his iron cage some days. The village looks at him by stealth, for it is afraid. But it always looks up, from distance, at the prison on the crag; and in the evening, when the work of the day is achieved and it assembles to gossip at the fountain, all faces are turned towards the prison. Formerly they were turned toward the posting-house; now they are turned toward the prison. They whisper at the fountain, that although confirmed to death, he will not be executed; they say that petitions have been presented in his favor, showing that he was enraged and made mad by the death of his child; they say that a petition has been presented to the King himself. What do I know? It is possible. Perhaps yes, perhaps no."

"Listen then, Jacques," Number One of that name sternly interposed. "Know that a petition was presented to the King and Queen. All here, yourself excepted, saw the King take it in his carriage in the street, coming beside the Queen. It is Defarge whom you see here, who, at the hazard of his life, darted out before the horses, with the petition in his hand."

"And once again listen, Jacques!" said the kneeling Number Three: his fingers ever wandering over and over these fine nerves, with a strikingly greedy air, as if he hungered for something—that was notable found nor denied. "The guard, horse and foot, surrounded the petitioner, and struck him blows. You have?"

"I hear, messieurs."

"Go on, then," said Defarge.

"Again; on the other hand, they whisper at the fountain," resumed the countryman, "that he is brought down into our country to be executed on the spot, and that he will very certainly be executed. They even whisper that because his slain Monseigneur, and because Monseigneur was the father of his tenants—yes—what you will—he will be executed as a parricide. One old man says at the fountain, that his right hand, armed with the knife, will be burned off before his face; that, into wounds which will be made in his arms, his breast, and his legs, there will be poured boiling oil, melted lead, hot resin, wax, and sulphur; finally, that he will be torn limb from limb by four strong horses. That old man says, all this was actually done to a prisoner who made an attempt on the life of the late King, Louis Fifteen. But how do I know if he lies? I was not there."

"Listen once again then, Jacques!" said the man with the restless hand and the craving air. "The name of that prisoner was Damiens, and it was all done in open day, in the open streets of this city of Paris; and nothing was more remarked in the vast concourse that saw it done, than the crowd of ladies of quality and fashion, who were full of eager anxiety to see the end to the last, Jacques, prolonged until nightfall, when he had lost two legs and an arm, and was not yet dead."

"And it was done—why, how old are you?"

"Thirty-five," said the mender of roads, who looked sixty.

"It was done when you were more than ten years old; you might have seen it."

"Enough!" said Defarge, with grim impatience. "Long live the Devil! Go on."

"Well! Some whisper this, some whisper that; they speak of nothing else; even the fountain appears to fall to that tune. At length, on Sunday night when all the village is asleep, come soldiers, winding down from the château, and their guns ring on the stones of the little street. Workmen dig, workmen hammer, soldiers labour and sing; in the morning, by the fountain, there is raised a gallows forty feet high, poisoning the water."

The mender of roads looked through rather than at the low ceiling, and pointed as if he saw the gallows somewhere in the sky.

"All work is stopped, all assemble there, nobody leads the cows out, the cows are there with the rest. At mid-day the roll of drums. Soldiers have marched into the prison in the night, and he is in the midst of many soldiers. He is bound as before, and in his mouth there is a gag tied up, with a tight string, making him look almost as if he laughed. He suggested it, by creasing his face with his two cheeks, from the eyes nearest of his mouth to his ears. "On the top of the gallows is fixed the knife, blade upward, with its point in the air. Below, is the great forty feet high—and is left hanging, poisoning the water."

They looked at one another, as he used his claw to trace in the air, on which the perpetration had entered afresh while he related the spectacle.

"It is frightful, messieurs. How can the women and the children draw water! Who can gossip of an evening under that shadow? Under it, have lived I don't know how many years, Monday evening as the sun was going to bed, and looked back from the hill, the shadow struck across the church, across the mill, across the prison—seemed to strike across the earth, messieurs, to where the sky rests upon it."

The hungry man gnawed one of his fingers as he looked at the other three, and his fingers covered with the craving that was on him.

"That's all, messieurs. I left at sunset (as I had been warned to do), and saw nothing more all night and half next day, until I met (as I was warned I should) this excellent husband coming from on, now riding and now walking, through the rest of yesterday and through last night. And here you see me."

After a gloomy silence, the first Jacques said, "Good! You have acted and recounted faithfully. Will you wait for us a little outside the door?"

"Very willingly," said the mender of roads. When Defarge escorted to the top of the stairs, and, leaving seated below, rejoined his wife.

The three had risen, and their heads were together when he came back to the gurret.

"How say you, Jacques?" said Madame Defarge. "Is to be registered?"

"To be registered as doomed to destruction," returned Defarge.

"Magnificent!" croaked the man with the craving.

"The chateau and all the race?" inquired the first.

"The chateau and all the race," returned Defarge. "Extermination."

The hungry man applauded in a rapturous croak. "Magnificent!" and began gnawing another finger.

"Are you sure," asked Jacques Two, of Defarge, "that no embarrassment can arise from our manner of keeping—the register? Because, doubt it is safe, for no one beyond ourselves can decipher it, but also it may always be able to decipher it—or, I ought to say, will she?"

"Jacques," returned Defarge, drawing himself up, "if madame my wife undertook to keep the register in her memory alone, she would not lose a word of it—not a syllable of it. Knitted in her own stitches and her own symbols, it will always be as plain to her as the sun. Confide in Madame Defarge. It would be easier for the weakest politician that lives to erase himself from existence than for anything done or said by any one or crimes from the knitted register of Madame Defarge."

There was a murmur of confidence and approval, and then the man who hungered asked:

"Is this rustic to be sent back soon? I hope so. He is very simple; is he not a little dangerous?"

"He knows nothing," said Defarge; "at least nothing more than would easily elevate himself to a gallows of the same height. I charge myself with him; let him remain with me. I will take care of him, and set him on his road. He wishes to see the fine world—the King, the Queen, and Court; let him see them on Sunday."

"What?" exclaimed the hungry man, starting. It is a good sign that he wishes to see Royalty and Nobility."

"My friend," said Defarge, judiciously shoving a cat milk if you wish her to thirst for it. Judiciously show a thirst for it, you may prey if you wish him to bring it down one day."

Nothing more was said, and the mender of roads, being found already half asleep in the topmost stair, was advised to lay himself down on the pallet-bed and take some rest. He took the advice, and presently, to the sound of subdued voices and the rustling of straw, slept deeply.

Worse quarters than Defarge's wine-shop could easily have been found in Paris for a provincial slave of that degree. Saving for a mysterious door at the back, before which was customarily hanged his wife was very new and agreeable. But madame sat all day at her counter, so expressively repressing her own individuality, particularly determined not to perceive that his being there had any connection with herself, that he felt the surface that he trembled in his wooden shoes whenever his eye lighted on her. For he instinctively felt that if he should grow bold enough to foresee what that lady might pretend next; and he felt that whatever she might do, she would put into her brightly ornamented head to pretend that she had seen him do a murder and often. Yet, that lady was imposed on to that degree that through with it until the play was played out.

Therefore, when Madame Defarge the mender of roads was not enchanted (though he said he was) to find that madame was to accompany monsieur and himself to Versailles. It was additionally discouraging to have madame knitting all the way there, in a public conveyance; it was additionally disconcerting yet, to have madame in the crowd in the afternoon, still with her knitting in her hands as the mender of roads to see the carriages of the King and Queen.

"You work hard, madame," said a man near her.

"Yes," answered Madame Defarge; "I have a good deal to do."

"What do you make, madame?"

"Many things."

"For instance—"

"For instance," returned Madame Defarge, composedly, "shrouds."

The man moved a little further away, as soon as he could, and the mender of roads found himself with his blue cap: feeling it mightily close and oppressive. If it needed a King and Queen to restore him, he was thankful for soon the large-faced King and the fair-faced Queen came in their gold coach, attended by the shining Bull's Eye of their Court, a glittering multitude of laughing ladies and fine lords; and in jewels and silks and powder and splendour and elegantly spurning figures and handsomely disdainful faces of both sexes, the mender of roads bathed himself, so much to his temporary intoxication, that he cried Long live the King, Long live the Queen, Long live everybody and everything! as if he had never heard of shirts, standing Jacques in his midst. Then the show back when it was over, like a patron; "you are a good boy!"

The mender of roads was now coming to himself, and was mistrustful of having made a mistake in his late demonstrations; but no.

"You are the fellow we want," said Defarge, in his ear; "you make these fools believe that it is for them you cry. Then they are deceived, and it is the wearer cheated."

Hey? repeated the mender of roads, reflectively; "that's true."

"These fools know nothing. While they do spare your throat, they would stop it forever and ever, in you or in a hundred like you rather than in one of their own horses or dogs; they only know what your breath tells them. Let it deceive them, then, a little longer; it can not deceive them long."

Madame Defarge looked superciliously at the client, and made no demonstration.

"As to you," said she, "you would shout and shed tears for any thing, if it made a show and a noise. Listen then! Be silent!"

"Truly, madame, I think so. For the moment."

"If you were shown a great heap of dolls, and were set upon them to pluck them to pieces and destroy them that you might see how they were made, would you not pluck and destroy with pleasure?"

"Truly yes, madame."

"Yes. And if you were shown a flock of birds unable to fly, and were set upon them to strip them of their feathers for your own advantage, you would set upon the birds of the finest feathers; would you not?"

"Undoubtedly, madame."

"You have seen both dolls and birds to-day," said Madame Defarge, with a wave of her hand towards the place where they had last been apparent; "now, go home!"

A Good Fight.

CHAPTER IV.

The seneschal led Gerard through several passages to the door of a pavilion, where some young noblemen, accoutred and feathered, sat smirking, gnawing the hair-apparent, and playing cards in the red light that enters their servants hold. A whisper from the seneschal, and one of them rose reluctantly, stared at Gerard with haughty surprise, and entered the pavilion. He presently returned, and, beckoning the pair, led them through a passage or two, and landed them in an ante chamber, where sat three more young gentlemen, feathered, furred, and embroidered like pieces of tapestry, and quite deep in that instructive and edifying branch of learning, dice.

"You can't see the Princess—it is late," said one.

Another followed suit.

"She would think we but now with her nurse. She is gone to bed, doll and all—dence-no again!" Gerard prepared to retire. The seneschal, with an incredulous smile, replied:

"The young man is here by the Countess's order; he is not to present him to her ladies."

On this a superb Adonis rose, with an injured look, and left them across a room where six or four loquet eleven ladies, chattering like magpies. Two, more industrious than the rest, were playing cards—five with fingers, one with nimble as their tongues. At the sight of a stranger all the tongues stopped like so many clocks, and the fingers, twenty, and all the eyes turned on Gerard, as if the same string that checked the tongues had turned the eyes. Two or three let all at once before, but this battery of eyes discountenanced him, and down went the eyes on the cards again. Then the cowards Losing, like the hare who ran by the pond and the frogs scuttled into the water, Gerard was a creature they could frighten, giggled and enjoyed their prowess. Then a damsel said, severely, "Mesdames!" and they were abashed at one woman. This woman took Gerard, and marched before him in solemn silence. The young man's heart sank, and he had half a mind to turn and run out of the place.

"What could princes be," he thought, "when their courtiers are so formal?" Of course they take their breeding from him they serve." These reflections were interrupted by the duenna suddenly introducing him into a room where three ladies sat working, and a pretty little girl tuning a lute. She was very richly but not showily dressed, and the duenna went up to the one who was hemming a handkerchief, and said a few words in a low tone. This lady then turned toward Gerard, with a smile, and beckoned him to come near her. She did not rise, but she laid aside her work, and her manner of turning toward him, slight as the movement was, was full of grace and ease and courtesy. She began a conversation at once.

"Margaret Van Eyck is an old friend of mine, Sir, and I am right glad to have a letter from her hand, and thankful to you, Sir, for bringing it to me safely."

"Marie, my love, this is the young gentleman who brought you that pretty present."

"Sir, I thank you a thousand times," said the young lady.

"I am glad you feel obliged to him, sweet-heart, for your kind wishes to do him a little service in return."

"I will do any thing on earth for him," replied the young lady, with enthusiasm.

"Any thing on earth is nothing in the world," said the Countess, smiling slightly.

"Well, then, I will— What would you have me to do, Sir?"

Gerard had just found out what high society he was in. "My sovereign demoiselle," said he, gently and a little tremulously, "where there is no need no pains there needs no reward."

"But we must obey manners. All the world must obey manners."

"That is true. Then, our demoiselle, reward me, pray, with the knowledge that the slave you were going to sing and I interrupted it."

"Sir, you have been to Spain?"

"I adore it."

The little Princes looked inquiringly at her mother, and exchanged a smile of surprise. She then took her lute and sang a romaunt of the day. Although not twelve years old, she was a well-trained and painstaking musician. Her little clear sweet the chords with coverage and precision, and struck out the notes of her simple and distinct, though bright like twinkling stars; but the main charm was her voice. It was not mighty, but it was sound, rich, soft, and ringing like a bell. She sang with a certain modest eloquence, though she knew none of the tricks of feeling. She was too young to be theatrical, or even sentimental, so nothing was forced—all gushed. Her little mouth seemed the mouth of Nature. The ditty, too, was as pure as its utterance. As there were none of those false divisions—those whining slurs, which are now sold so dear by Italian songsters, though ever's jackal in India delivers them gratis to his employer all night, and sometimes gets shot for "so, and always deserves it—so there were no cadences and flourish; the trite, turgid, and feeble expletives of song, the skim-milk with which mindless musicians and mindless writers quench fire, wash out color, and drown melody and meaning dead.

While the pure and tender strain was flowing from the pure young throat, Gerard's eyes filled with tears. The Countess watched him with interest, for it was usual to applaud the Princes loudly, but not with tears and sighs. So when the voice ceased, and the glasses left off ringing, she asked, demurely, "Was he satisfied?"

Gerard gave a little start; the spoken voice broke a charm, and brought him back to earth.

"O, madam!" he cried, "surely it is that which cherubs and seraphs sing and charm the saints in heaven."

"I am somewhat of your opinion, my young friend," said the Countess, with emotion; and she bent a look of love and gratitude on the singer, with a heavenly look, such as, they say, is given to the eye of the short-lived resting on the short-lived.

The Princess resumed:

"My old friend requests me to be serviceable to you. It is the first favor I have asked of you as honor of asking us, and the request is sacred. You are in holy orders, Sir?"

Gerard replied:

"I fear you are not a priest, you look too young."

"Oh no, madam! I am not even a sub-deacon. I am only a lector; but next month I shall be an acolyte, and soon after I shall be a subdeacon."

"Well, Monsieur Gerard, with your accomplishments you can soon pass through the inferior orders. And let me beg you to do so. For the day after you have said your first mass I shall have the pleasure of appointing you to a benefice."

"Oh, madam!"

"Marie, remember I make this promise in your name as well as my own."

"Your not, mamma; I will not forget. But if he will take my advice, what he will be is Bishop of Liège. The Bishop of Liège is a beautiful bishop. What! don't you remember him mamma, that day we were at Liège? he was braver than grandpapa himself. He had on a crown—a high crown, and it was cut in the middle, and it was full one, and it was of such beautiful jewels; and his gown stiff with gold; and his mantle, too; and it had a broad border, all jewels, and, above all, his gloves; you have no such gloves, mamma. They were embroidered and covered with jewels, and scented with such lovely scent; I smelled them all the time he was giving me his blessing on my head with his glove. I shall not! I don't say he will, mamma—most old people do—and then, Sir, you can be bishop, you know, and—and—"

Gently, Marie, gently; bishoprics are for old gentlemen; and this is a young gentleman."

"Mamma! he is not so very young."

"Not compared with you, Marie, eh?"

"He is a good bigger, dear mamma; and I am sure he is good enough for a bishop."

"Also, mademoiselle! you are mistaken."

"I don't know that, Monsieur Gerard; but I am a little puzzled to know on what grounds mademoiselle there pronounced your character so favorably."

"Alas, mamma!" said the Princess, "you have not looked at his hands!" and she raised her eyebrows at her mother's simplicity.

"I beg your pardon," said the Countess, "I have. Well, Sir, if I can not go quite so fast as my daughter, attribute it to the natural fears of a mother for her child's future welfare. A benefice will do most old persons; but you are young, and with the great parental joys: "at least you shall be near your friends. Have you a mother?"

"Yes, madam; thanks be to God!"

"Good! You shall have a church near Tergon. She will thank me. And now, Sir, we must not detain you too long from those who have a better claim on your society than we have. Duchess, oblige me by bidding one of the pages conduct him to the hall of banquet; the way is hard to find."

Gerard bowed low to the Countess and the Princess, and backed toward the door.

"I hope it will be a nice benefice," said the Princess to him, with a pretty smile, as he was going out; but, shaking her head with an air of solemn majesty, "but you had better have been Bishop of Tergon."

Gerard followed his new conductor, his heart warm with gratitude, but ere he reached the banqueting-hall a chill came over him. The mind of one who has left a quiet, uneventful life is not apt to take in comfortable feelings at the same pace as rise and balance them, but rather to be overpowered by by each in turn. While Gerard was with the Countess, the excitement of so new a situation, the unlooked-for promise, the joy and pride it would cause at home, pressed him without pause, but now it was passion's turn to be heard again. What! give up Margaret, whom still he held in the depths of his, and her deep eyes in his heart? resign her and all the world of love and joy she had opened on him to-day? For a moment, when it did come, was so strong that he hastily resolved to say nothing at home about the offered benefice, but the Countess is so good, thought he, she has a hundred ways of adding a young man's fortune; she will not cancel or be a priest when she shall learn I love one of her sex: one would almost think she does herself, as she cast a strange look on me, and said, "A priest gives up much, too much." Dare we shy still to pass a place about the palace. And with this hopeful reflection his mind was eased, and, losing now at the entrance of the banqueting-hall, its hushed low murmurings, and ran hastily with joyful eyes to Margaret. He came in sight of the Duchess who was gone. Then he was gone. Nobody was at the table at all; only a citizen in sober garments had just tumbled under it dead drunk and several pages were raising him to carry him away. Gerard never guessed how important this solemn drunkard was to him: he was looking for "Beauty," and lo! "the Beast" lie. In no mildly round the hall, which was now empty except for the steward, he looked. He left the palace: outside he found a crowd gagging at two grand bullocks that were roasting in gute. He asked them earnestly if they had not an old man in a gown and a lovely girl pass out. They laughed at the question. "If" they replied, "a dog at these new lights that turn night into day. They shall be roasted whole heads and tails one and young wenches, everyday sights." From another group he learned there was a nursery being played under cover of the hard by, and all crowd gone to see it. This revived his hopes, and he went and saw two grand bulls, with inscriptions divine personages, too sacred for me to name here, came clumsily down from heaven to talk nephistry with the cruel wives, the bulls' mates, and the seven deadly sins, all present in human shape, and not unlike one another. The women, which weary stuff in rattled the prince of the power of the air, and an imp that kept molesting him and bubbling him over with a bladder, at each of which the crowd were in ecstacies. When the vices had uttered platitudes enough to weary all the virtues twaddle, the celestials, including the nine muses, went gingerly back to heaven one by one; for there was no cloud; and the evil artificer worked it up with its supernatural freight, and worked it down with a winch, in full sight of the audience. These disposed of, the butlouless pit opened and flamed in the centre of the stage: the carpenters and wires moved the vices to it, and the virtues and Beelzebub and his tormentor danced merrily round the place of combustion, much to the ife and labor.

This entertainment was writ by the Bishop of Ghent for the diffusion of religious sentiment by the aid of the senses, and was an average specimen of theatrical exhibitions so long as they were in the hands of the clergy. But, alas! in course of time the laity embodied plays, and so the theatre, my reverend friends informed me, fell into decay in Jano.

Margaret was nowhere in the crowd, and Gerard could not enjoy the performance: he actually went away in the Act II., in the midst of a much-admired piece of dialogue, in which Lucifer complimented Satan. He walked through many streets, but could not find her. He thought, At last, Margaret is out, he went to a hostelry and slept till daybreak. All that day, how sad! how restless, he sought her, but never could fall in with her or her father, nor ever obtain the slightest clew. Then he felt she was false, or had left Ghent. He was ill, and, exhausted now, as well as sad. More good fortune fell on him; he almost decided it. As soon as the next day, after he had once more been through every street, he said "She is not in the town, and I shall never see her again. I will go home." The passport for Tergon with royal favor promised, with fifteen golden angels in his purse, a golden medal on his bosom, and a heart like a lump of lead.

CHAPTER V.

It was near four o'clock in the afternoon. Gerard was in the shop. His eldest and youngest sons were abroad. Catherine and her little crippled daughter had long been anxious about their father, and now they were gone a little way down the road, to see if by good luck he might be visible in the distance; and Giles was alone in the sitting-room, which I will sketch, furniture and dwarf included.

The Hollanders were always an original and leading people. At different epochs they invented printing (wooden type), oil-painting, lithography, engraving, etc.; above all, years before my tale, they invented Dutch gilt. So, while the English gentry, in velvet jerkins and slashed doublet and hose, strode floors of state rushes, foul receptacles of bones, decomposing morsels, spittle, dogs' eggs, and all abominations, this boxer's sitting-room at Tergon was floored with Dutch tiles, so highly glazed and constantly washed that visitors could not off them. There was one large window; the cross stone-work in the centre of it was very narrow, and stood in relief, looking like an actual cross to the inmates, and was eyed as such in their devotions. The panes were very small and lozenge-shaped, and soldered to one another with strips of lead: the lead was painted, and so was the stone of our rural cottages. The chairs were rude and primitive, all but the arm-chairs, whose back, of high angle with its seat, was so high that the sitter's head stopped two feet short of the top. This chair was of carved oak, and very heavy. There was a copper pail, that went in at the waist, holding holy water; and a little hand-broom to sprinkle it for rite with, and a little bell. There was massive oak table, with a dwarf sticking to the rim by his teeth, his eye glaring, and his claws in the air like a pouncing vampire. Nature, it would seem, did not make Giles a dwarf out of malice prepense: she made him a head and torso with her usual care, but just then her attention was distracted, and she left the rest to chance: the result was a human wedge, an inverted cone. He might with justice have taken her to task in the terms of Horace:

amphora coepit

Institui: currente rota cur vescus exit?

His centre was about the region of gravity. Bisected, upper Giles would have outweighed three lower Giles. But this very disproportion enabled him to do feats that would have baffled Milo. His brawny arms had no weight to draw after them; he had no legs to be a vertical pillar like a squirrel, and hung for hours from a bough by one hand like a cherub in a picture. His head would have made a vacuum with his hands, as the lizard is said to do with its feet, he would have gone along a ceiling. Nature, however, had reserved the chief of griping the dinner-table with both hands, and no creature could hear of it. But the crowning climax of delight!—he would seize it with his teeth, and, taking off his hands, hold on like grim death by his mouth alone.

But all our joys, however elevating, suffer interruption. Little Kate came in, full-speed in her gesture, and stood aghast. She was her mother's daughter, and her heart beat with the furniture, and with the three grimaces.

"Oh, Giles! how can you? Mother would be angry if she saw you like that."

"Go and tell her, little tale-bearer," snarled Giles. "You are the one for making mischief."

"Am I?" replied Kate, with spirit. "That is news to me."

"The biggest in Tergon," growled Giles, fastening on again.

At this Kate sat quietly down and cried. Her brother came to her directly, and consoled her, and Gerhard himself under the table, and there glared.

"What is it now, my child?" said the boxer. Then turning her experienced eyes on Giles, and observing the position he had taken up, and a strength expression in his face, he added, sternly,

"Nay, mother," said the girl; "it was but a friendly word from me. I have seen Margaret in another time; but I was tired and in care for Gerhard, you know."

"Let me see to in care for me," said a faint voice at the door, and in tottered Gerard, pale, ghastly, and worn with anxiety, suspense, fatigue, and cries of delight, curiosity, and anxiety, mingled, dropped almost fainting into the nearest chair. Hasting Rotterdam'd over the country like Macgregor, and the long journey afterward, had fairly knocked Gerard up. But his heart was relieved now, and beheld him the centre of an eager circle. First of all they must hear about the prince. Then Gerard told them he had been admitted to the prince's presence, and had said in an enormous hall—he was the judge—and had been knighted by the prince. Kate! when I saw the goldsmiths' work I had like to have fallen on the floor. I thought not all the goldsmiths in Ghent had so much gold, silver, jewels, and craft of design and facture. But, in short, I was knighted by him.

Then, to please the females, he described to them the reliquaries, fretorices, calices, crosiers, crosses, pyxes, monstrances, and other wonders ecclesiastical, and the goblets, hanaps, watches, clocks, watches, tocsoles, etc., so that their mouths watered.

"But, Kate, when I came to the illuminated work from Gerard and Bruges, my heart sank. Mine was dirt by the side of it. For the first month I could not touch my pencil; but I prayed for a better spirit, and presently I was able to enjoy them, and thank God for those lovely works, and the noble skill of their authors. Love my masters. Well, the colored work was so beautiful I gave all mine away, and burned it. Then one day, when all the other prizes had been given, they came to the writing, and whose name think you was called in first?

"Yours," said Kate.

"Yours," echoed her to seron.

"You may laugh," said Gerard, "but for all that Gerard Gerardsteen of Tergon was the name the herald shouted. I stood stupid; they threw me forward. Every thing swam before my eyes. I don't know how I found myself sitting on a cushion at the feet of the Duke. He said something to me, but I was so flattered I could not answer him. So then he said it to the next. Then he did not draw a glove and cut off my dull head, and gave me a sword, and said, 'Rise, Sir Knight,' was a yell and almost a scramble. "And then he gave me fifteen great bright golden angels. I had seen one before, but I never handled one. Here they are."

"Oh, Gerard! oh, Gerard!"

"There is one for you, our eldest; and one for you, Sybrandt; and for you, Little Michiel; and two for you, Little Lily, because God has afflicted you; and one for myself to buy colors and vellum; and nine for her that is gone, and all, and risked the two crowns upon Gerard's hand."

The gold drew out their several characters. Cornelis and Sybrandt clutched each his coin with one glare of greediness and another glare of envy. Not so Kate, who had got two pieces. Giles seized his and rolled it along the floor and gumbaled after it. Then Kate poured on her crutches and sat down, and held out her little arms to Gerard with a heavenly gesture of love and tenderness, and the mother, fairly benumbed at first by the shower of gold that fell on her apron, now cried out, "Leave him, children, leave him, he is my own, my own. Ah, Gerard, my child! I have not loved you as you deserved."

Then Gerard threw himself on his knees beside her, and she flung her arms round him and wept for joy and pressed upon his neck.

"Good lad! good lad!" cried the hosier, with some emotion. "I must go and tell my neighbors. Lend me the medal, Gerard, I'll show it to my good friend Peter Buyskens; he is always regaling me with his prowess, and Adrian was the big schoolking at the Butts."

"Ay, do my man; and show Peter Buyskens one of the angels. Tell him there are fourteen more, where that came from. Mind you bring it back."

"Stay a minute, father, there is better news behind," said Gerard, flushing with joy at the joy he had created.

"Better! Better than this?"

"Then Gerard told his interview with the Countess, and the house rang with joy.

"Now, Lily my child, my lady, and bless the Dame Van Eyck! a benefice, our son! My cares are at an end. Gerard, my good friend and master, now we have all the bright sunshine of success. This dear boy will take our place, and those loved ones will want a home or a friend."

From that hour Gerard was looked upon as the pride of the family. He was no longer to work in another sense. He was always in the right, and nothing too good for him. Cornelis and Sybrandt became more and more jealous of him, and longed for the day he should go to his benefice: they would get rid of him so, and his reverence's purse would be open to them. With these views he cooperated. The mother and the children idolized duller and duller. His success, and the affection and admiration of his parents, made him think more highly of himself, and more meanly of others in Margaret's ingratitude and discourtesy. For all that, she had been the first object toward the rest of her sex, and now for every reason he wished to ordained priest as soon as he could pass the interlocutive stone by. He knew the Church offered better than most of the clergy, and he studied the latter and more practical of the Church with his friends the monks; and the first time the chance came that way, he applied to be admitted "exorcist." the rite was performed, and the bishop questioned him, and ordained him at once. He said to himself, "Now, Margaret prayer, the bishop delivered to him a little MS. full of exorcisms, and said: "Take this, Gerard, and have power to lay on the hands of the possessed and cast out devils and chimens!" and he took it reverently, and went home invested by the Church with power to cast out demons.

Returning home from the church he was met by little Kate at the porch, crutches

"Oh, Gerard! who, think you, has been at our house seeking you—the Burgomaster himself!"

Gerard started, and changed color.

"Glybrecht Van Swieten" What would he want?

"Nay, Gerard, I know not. But he was urgent to see you. You are to go to his house on the instant."

"Well, he is the Burgomaster: I must go: but it is time we met. I have seen him cast such a look on me as no friend casts. No matter; such looks forearm the wise. Besides, he knows—"

"Nothing."

"Nothing?"

"Kate, I'll go."

And he went to Glybrecht Van Swieten's house.

CHAPTER VI.

GLYBRECHT VAN SWIETEN was an artful man. He opened to the novice with something quite wide of the mark he really entered upon. "Your town records," said he, "are crabbedly written, and the ink rusty with age." He offered Gerard the honor of transcribing them fair.

Gerard inquired what he was to be paid

Glybrecht offered a sum that would have just purchased the pens, ink, and parchment.

"But, Burgomaster, my labor? Here is a year's work."

"Your labor! Call you marking parchment labor? Little sweat goes to that, I trow."

"Tis labor, and skilled labor to boot; and that is better paid in all trades than in the labor, sweat or no sweat. Besides, there's my time."

"Your time! Why what is time to you, at two-and-twenty?" Then rising his eyes keenly on Gerard, to mark the effect of his words, he said, "Say, rather, you are idle grown. You are in love. Your body is with those chanting monks, but your heart is with Peter Brandt and his redhaired girl."

I know no Peter Brandt."

"This double-dealing Glybrecht's suspicion that the caster out of demons was playing a deep game.

"Ye lie!" he shouted. "Did I not find you at her elbow, on the road to Rotterdam?"

"Ah!"

"Ah. And you were seen at Sevenbergen but t'other day."

"Was I?"

"Ay; and at Peter's-house."

"At Sevenbergen?"

"Ay, at Sevenbergen."

Now, this was what in modern days is called a draw. It was a guess, put boldly forth as fact, to elicit by the young man's answer whether he had been there lately or not.

The result of the artifice surprised the crafty one. Gerard started up in a strange state of horror, ous excitement.

"Burgomaster," said he, with trembling voice, "I have not been at Sevenbergen this three years, and I know not the name of those you saw me with, nor where they dwelt; but, if my time is precious, though you value it not, give you good day." And he left the room with his eyes sparkling.

Glybrecht started up in his anger, but he sank into his chair again.

"He fears me not. He knows something, if not all."

Then he called hastily to his trusty servant, and almost dragged him to a window.

"See you yon man?" he cried. "Hists! Follow him! But let him not see you. He is young, but old in craft! Keep him in sight all day! Let me know whither he goes, and what he does."

It was night when the servant returned.

"Well! well!" cried Van Swieten, eagerly.

"Master, the young man went from you to Sevenbergen."

Glybrecht groaned.

"To the house of Peter the Magician."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A KENTISH correspondent tells a very good story of a Sussex gentleman.

"Some years ago there lived in this place an old bachelor who was generally known as Bill, and he was very fond of eating nights.

It was determined that a man ought to be elected to sup with him, and Bill had determined to go and see it. On the appointed night Bill waited at the place where he was employed, and meeting one of the clerks, thus addressed him:

"'Mass' Mac, I would like to go to dat bangin', if you please!'

"'Hanging!' says Mac. 'Why, the man has been dead for this month and more.'

"'Humph! my Lor!' says Phil. 'Sos here, Mass' Mac: I have had to go to dat bangin' every year, and dat's jus alikes de way. Whenever I lays off to enjoy myself somebody dies, and I has to attend de funeral.'"

The following is a verbatim copy of a letter received by Captain Sibthorp, who, by the way, is not a man of the nicelle and steamy:

"DEAR CAPTAIN,—I send you 4 yards of drab and 8 of flannel to make me a winter drudge coat and a stuff jacket, I very much prefer the softer cloth to the stiff, but it is 2 inches shorter than the blue one as stems; I want it much shorter, and the flannel jacket to be very short. I wear it often by itself, let it be 14 inches long at the centre or longest point, I have a battery coat to put on over the jacket, and it covers me well. I will send you the cloth to make the other coat as soon as I get it. I have 2 rows of buttons on the drab coat, and a breast pocket behind, you can apply to Mr. Jones for sleeve lining and thread of the same color as the coat. I have 3 boys slip on the surtout and take the measure while Mr. Smythe is there, and send me the size. I am in bed when I can send for them, you can apply to Mr V Sevier for your measure. Your always to be at the service ate as you can, be sure to give room at the arm on the shoulder. Yours truly, and in haste, I can't say. Good. I remain your friends all well and well, wisher, to be kind throughout the year. Yours truly, WM BROWN

Scene—A well shaded street in a town. Time—Morning in early summer. Birds singing and blackbirding among the leaves and branches of the trees.

Enter a gentleman in a white hat, coat and arrow, twenty inked upon shooting the little birds. Benevolent middle-aged lady watching him from window.

After a time:

LADY. Poor boys! boys! GO away. Don't shoot the little birds. I'll send for the police and have you arrested. Don't shoot the little birds, I say. Are you hearing them for? Go away and let 'em alone!

GENTLEMAN. Oh, I'm not shooting at birds. I'm only practising with my gun. I'm a member of the Volunteers, and I'm practising for the Queen's Prize.

LADY. Well now, madam, what's the use o' your thinkin'? We can't have it.

"And so you're going out to the East Hingdon, my darlin', Mrs. Mulligan said, as she fondled one of the young wife of a soldier about to embark for Modern India. "I've been in them parts myself, and I'm a pensioner for the torments I went through night and day with the monkatoes. They take every mortial thing away from their heads, and they'll draw the life-blood out of ye before you're half aware."

This terrifying account lived in the memory of the young woman's mind, and when the transports at length were been crowded, all hands delighted at sight of the shore, and the troops were landed, and the first halt made at Suez, the young woman, who had never seen a camel but in a picture, was startled at the sight, and in breathless agitation, and apparently in great excitement, with uplifted hands, cried out, "Mercy! Mrs. Mulligan! that's a muskrat!"

HEIGHT OF GALLANTRY.—At a Fancy Fair a sailor was strutting past a stall where a very lovely woman had stopped, looked for a moment in breathless admiration, then took a sovereign from his pocket, put it on the table, and was passing on. "My good friend," said the lady, "you've given me a sovereign for your purchase." "No, madam," replied the tar, with another look, "you've given me the most valuable repository ever."

HOW FOR ANGLERS.—"Have you any fish in your basket?" said a friend to a gentleman whom he was returning home. "Yes, a good eel," was the reply.

ADVERTISEMENTS

The wonderful success of Dr. Hutchison's celebrated Vegetable Balsamic Elixir, from the time of its introduction to the public, proves conclusively its unrivalled superiority over all other preparations of the kind now manufactured. It is based on the digestive organs of the most sensitive character, removing all diseases or morbidific matter from the stomach, and thereby restoring the tone of digestion, and the consequent regularity of physical working of the system. Its great success in some hundreds, indeed; some of the most distressing cases of dyspepsia and nervous irritation have been entirely cured by this great agent. The Ballad of Beauty.

BY JULIA CAREY SHEINHARDT.

"Give me a song," said the lover,
"Sing to me, lady fair,
Search through your brain and discover
Melodies fondest and rare;
Sing of the fondest ages,
Or sing of the troubadour times,
When princesses were wooed by pages
And won by the power of rhymes.

"Here we have no princesses," Faltered the lady fair,
"And therefore no golden blesses
Are showered on maids like mine;
For men of the humblest motives
May win the most lofty dames,
If arrayed in a suit of SMITH BROTHERS.
They quiet their nervous flames."

SOMETHING NEW.—B. T. BABBITT'S BEST
MEDICINAL SALERATUS.

Is manufactured from common salt, and is prepared entirely different from other Saleratus. All the deleterious matter extracted in such a manner as to produce a Bread, Biscuit, and all kinds of Cake, without making a portion of the Saleratus when the Bread or Cake is baked; thereby avoiding the unpleasant taste. Every particle of Saleratus is evaporated, and passes through the Bread or Biscuit in the baking—rendering the resulting remains but common Salt, Water, and Lime. You will readily perceive by the taste of this Saleratus that it is entirely different from other Saleratus.

It is packed in one pound papers, each wrapper headed, "B. T. BABBITT'S Best Medicinal Saleratus;" also, picture, testimonial of Bread, and a receipt for making water on the tin. When you purchase, see that my name is on the wrapper, as it is only sold to be purchased by the next quantity like the first—bread as above.

Full directions for making Bread with this Saleratus and Sour Milk or Cream Tartar, will accompany each package; also, directions for making all kinds of Pastry, Cakes, and for making Soda Water and Sulfate Powders.

HEALTH OF AMERICAN WOMEN.

Under this head the Graefenberg Company, of No. 32 PARK ROW, NEW YORK, have published a series of articles upon the diseases peculiarly affecting women, and which are met with in one instance of all women in the country; upon Consumption, the great scourge of the American Continent; and upon all the diseases incident to filth country and climate.

In these articles the Graefenberg Company have proved their eminent position as a Chartered Medical Institution, and have based their claim to confidence upon the fact that they have studied the laws of nature rather than the laws of Gules and Hippocrates, and have applied common sense principles to the plainly-required necessities exhibited by symptoms of local or general derangement.

The proof of their successful treatment is found in testimony from leading physicians of all schools, from public and private individuals who have tested the remedies, from clergymen who have witnessed their immense value upon the health of their churches, and from notices given in the leading journals of the day.

(FROM THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE.)

THE GRAEFENBERG FAMILY REMEDIES are most valuable. In the universal and distressing diseases of women, the remedies are gentle, judicious, and surely effective.

(FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES.)

THE GRAEFENBERG COMPANY have refitted their rooms, so that every accommodation is afforded those who desire the personal advice of the consulting physicians. Invalids, and strangers visiting the city, who require professional advice, had much better call upon him. Dr. Bridge is a regular physician, of fine attainments, and of great judgment and discrimination in the treatment of disease. Office and salesroom, 32 Park Row, New York.

THE GRAEFENBERG MARSHALL'S UTERINE CATHOLICON.

Is offered as a certain cure in cases accompanied with any of the following symptoms:

Irregularities—Weakness—Pallidness—
Deranged Appetite—Sallow Complexion—
Pain in the Back and Kidneys—Chills—
Cold Hands and Feet—Heatings—Feverishness—
Neuralgia—Palpitation of the Heart—
Dizziness—Nervousness—Headache—Drowsiness—
Disturbed Sleep—Flushes of Heat—General Pain—
Crawling and Pain in the Spine and between the Shoulders—
Acid Stomach—Nausea—Indigestion—
Difficult Passing of Urine with Heat or Smarting—
Itching—Burning or Irritation to the Uterine Organs—
Nightsweat—Despair—Hysterics—Anxiety—
Bad Taste—Nervous Twitching—Hurrying—Constipation
—Irritable Temper—Sadness—Depraved Appetite—
Fluttering—Disturbed and Irregular Bowels—
Unpleasant Dreams—Pains in the Uterine Organs—
Nervousness and Pains in the Limbs—
Loss of Memory—Bewilderment—Sorrows in the Feet—Pain in the Back.

All suppressions in young girls, and the cough and decline so commonly attending them in the young, are relieved quickly and surely by the Catholicon.

In this connection Miss Beecher, sister of the Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER, in "Letters to the People," page 129, says: "I have nine sisters and sisters-in-law, and fourteen female cousins, all married, and all delicate and ailing. Amid the immense circle of my friends and acquaintance I am not recall ten married ladies, born in this country and country, who are perfectly healthy. In cases, however, where the GRAEFENBERG CATHOLICON has been used, we must say that health has rapidly taken the place of disease, and ladies have become robust, strong, vigorous, and healthy."

AFFIDAVIT.

OUR SERIALS.

We commenced in No. 134 a new serial tale, entitled "A Good Fight," by CHARLES READE, author of "Love me Little, Love me Long;" with Illustrations by Tenniel. This exquisite Story is printed from early proof-sheets PURCHASED exclusively by us from the Author.

In reply to several inquiries, we beg to say that MR. DICKENS'S new serial, "A TALE OF TWO CITIES," was commenced in HARPER'S WEEKLY on May 7, and MR. CURTIS'S delicious Story of American Society, entitled "TRUMPS," on April 9. We can send the back numbers from those dates, or from the beginning of the year, to any person who remits the money.

THE MASSACRE AT MOUNTAIN MEADOWS, UTAH TERRITORY.

[FROM A CORRESPONDENT.]

THE story of so horrible a human butchery as that which occurred at the Mountain Meadows, Utah Territory, in the autumn of 1857, has by this time, no doubt, reached the States; but as no account which I have yet seen can in the slightest degree approximate to a description of the hideous truth, being myself now on the ground, and having an opportunity of communicating with some who were no doubt present on the occasion, I deem it proper to send you a plain and unvarnished statement of the affair as it actually occurred.

A train of Arkansas emigrants, with some few Missourians, said to number forty men, with their families, were on their way to California, through the Territory of Utah, and had reached a series of grassy valleys, by the Mormons called the Mountain Meadows, where they remained several days recruiting their animals. On the night of September 9, not suspecting any danger, as usual they quietly retired to rest, little dreaming of the dreadful fate awaiting and soon to overtake them. On the morning of the 10th, as, with their wives and families, they stood around their camp-fires passing the congratulations of the morning, they were suddenly fired upon from an ambush, and at the first discharge fifteen of the best men are said to have fallen dead or mortally wounded. To seek the shelter of their corral was but the work of a moment, but there they found but limited protection.

To enable you to appreciate fully the danger of their position I must give a brief description of the ground. The encampment, which consisted of a number of tents and a corral of forty wagons and ambulances, lay on the west bank of, and eight or ten yards distant from, a large spring in a deep ravine running southward; another ravine, also, branching from this, and facing the camp on the southwest; overlooking them on the northwest, and within rifle-shot, rises a large mound commanding the corral, upon which parapets of stone, with loopholes, have been built. Yet another ravine, larger and deeper, faces them on the east, which could be entered without exposure from the south and far end. Having crept into these shelters during the darkness of the night, the cowardly assailants fired upon their unsuspecting victims, thus making a beginning to the most brutal butchery ever perpetrated on this continent.

Surrounded by superior numbers, and by an unseen foe, we are told the little party stood a siege within the corral five or seven days, sinking their wagon-wheels in the ground, and during the darkness of night digging trenches, within which to shelter their wives and children. A large spring of cool water bubbled up from the sand a few yards from them, but deep down in the ravine, and so well protected that certain death marked the trail of all who had dared approach it. The wounded were dying of thirst; the burning brow and parched lip marked the delirium of fever; they tossed from side to side with anguish; the sweet sound of the water, as it murmured along its pebbly bed, served but to heighten their keenest suffering. But what all this to the pang of leaving to a cruel fate their helpless children? Some of the little ones, who though too young to remember in after years, tell us that they stood by their parents, and pulled the arrows from their bleeding wounds.

Long had the brave band held together; but the cries of the wounded sufferers must prevail. For the first time, they are (by four Mormons) offered their lives if they will lay down their arms, and gladly they avail themselves of the proffered mercy. Within a few hundred yards of the corral faith is broken. Disarmed and helpless, they are fallen upon and massacred in cold blood. The savages, who had been driven to the hills, are again called down, to what was denominated the "job," which more than savage brutality had begun.

Women and children are now all that remain. Upon these, some of whom had been violated by the Mormon leaders, the savages expends his hoarded vengeance. By a Mormon who has now escaped the threats of the Church we are told that the helpless children clung around the knees of the savages, offering themselves as slaves; but with fiendish laughter at their cruel tortures, knives were thrust into their bodies, the scalp torn from their heads, and their throats cut from ear to ear.

I am writing no tale of fiction; I wish not to gratify the fancy, but to tell a tale of truth to the reason and to the heart. I speak truths which hereafter legal evidence will fully corroborate. I met this train on the Platte River on my way to Fort Laramie in the spring of 1857, the best and richest one I had ever seen upon the plains. Fortune then beamed upon them with her sweetest smile. With a fine outfit and every comfort around them, they spoke to me exultingly of their prospects in the land of their golden dreams. To-day, as then, I ride by them, but no word of friendly greeting falls upon my ear, no face meets me with a smile of recognition; the empty sockets from their ghastly skulls tell me a tale of horror and of blood. On every side around me for the space of a mile lie the remains of carcasses dismembered by wild beasts; bones, left for nearly two years unburied, bleached in the elements of the mountain winds, gnawed by the hungry wolf, broken and hardly to be recognized. Garments of babes and little ones, faded and torn, fluttering from each rugged bush, from which the warble of the songster of the desert sounds as mockery. Human hair, once falling in glossy ringlets around childhood's brow or virtue's form, now strewing the plain in masses, matted, and mingling with the musty mould. To-day, in one grave, I have buried the bones and skulls of twelve women and children, pierced with the fatal ball or shattered with the axe. In another the shattered relics of eighteen men, and yet many more await their gloomy resting-place.

Afar from the homes of their childhood, buried in the heart of almost trackless deserts, shut up within never-ending mountain barriers, cut off from all communication with their fellow-men, surrounded by overpowering numbers, harmless citizens of our land of justice and freedom, with their wives and families, as dear to them as our own to us, were coolly, deliberately, and designedly butchered by those professing to be their own countrymen.

I pause to ask one calm, quiet question. Are these facts known in the land where I was born and bred?

I have conversed with the Indians engaged in this massacre. They say that they but obeyed the command of Brigham Young, sent by letter, as soldiers obey the command of their chief; that the Mormons were not only the instigators but the most active participants in the crime; that Mormons led the attack, took possession of the spoil; that much of that spoil still remains with them; and still more, was sold at the tilting office of the Church.

Such facts can and will be proved by legal testimony. Sixteen children, varying from two to nine years of age, have been recovered from the Mormons. They could not be induced to utter a word until assured that they were out of the hands of the Mormons and safe in the hands of the Americans. Then their talk is so consonant with itself that it can not be doubted. Innocence has in fresh spoken. Light has fled to the mountains. The time fast approaches when "justice shall be laid to the line, and righteousness to the plummet."

We take pleasure in appending the following from the Philadelphia Press of July 27:

"The HARPERS have fairly surpassed the London Illustrated News in engravings relating to the war. Already they have published fifty-four plates, which is about double the number published by the News. The Harpers have, with their accustomed tact and energy, availed themselves of the engravings in the illustrated papers of Paris, and have published several prepared expressly for themselves. The WEEKLY has now got up to an edition of about ninety thousand."

WHY NAPOLEON MADE PEACE.

THE conversation which took place on 19th July between the Emperor of the French and the Presidents of the great bodies of the State sheds a remarkable light on the recent peace. We know of no public document or private history which reveals so much of the real character and purposes of the Emperor Napoleon.

He began by saying that, had he persevered in the war after the battle of Solferino, he would have been obliged to undertake a long and tedious enterprise against the fortresses which compose the famous quadrilateral; and he implied, though he did not say as much in words, that during the siege the revolutionary party in France would have probably disturbed the peace of the empire. Passing over this danger, he observed that Germany must, or at later, would have drifted into the war, and thus that France would have been compelled to fight on the Rhine as well as on the Adige, and would further have been reduced to seek the aid of revolution to attain her objects. Rather than incur the responsibility of awakening a revolution throughout Europe, and giving the signal for a general war, Napoleon resolved to withdraw from his programme the retirement from the Mincio to the Adriatic, and to save vanish from honest hearts noble delusions and patriotic hopes.

If history contains a more manly and honorable declaration than this we do not remember to have seen it.

Had Napoleon been the ambitious and dishonest schemer which the English and their American followers call him, he would never have admitted that he had failed in his object. He would not even needed any extraordinary display of sophistry to have made out that the Peace of Villafranca fulfilled the pledge of Plombières. He might and he would have done scarifices could have prepared in half an hour a manifesto showing that the Emperor had achieved more than he promised, and had Napoleon been a mere political trickster—as he is so often represented—he would have avoided himself of these explanations, and would have shrunk from the necessity of confessing that he had been foiled. He has not done so. He has stated the case against himself as fully as the London Times could have done. In his position such candor is positively heroic.

Of the weight of the reasons which impelled him to conclude a peace every reasonable person can judge. There are many who are sceptical where intense hatred of monarchy and arbitrary power has to bestow all their goodwill on the revolutionists of Europe, and who desire nothing so ardently as a general uprising of the "people," though the revolutionaries are erroneously called—against these sceptics. But there are generally either country politicians who never saw Europe in their lives, or noisy ignorant Irishmen or Germans whose took precious care to "roar gently" when they were approached by the police of their adopted land. The fact is, that while the monarchical and aristocratic systems of Europe involve much that is unjust and even abominable, the evil of them is, on the whole, about as good as the best of the systems which have been thus far devised for the government of civilized countries. Had Napoleon frankly called the revolutionaries to arms, and undertaken a "propaganda" in Italy, Germany, and Hungary, it is quite certain that a war would have commenced of which many of us would not have lived to see the end; it probably would have been a second Waterloo would have terminated the struggle, and have left the scene of men of family and property every where, would have involved the prospects of liberal ideas for a generation or more.

On the other side, it is quite likely that the continuation of the war would have compelled Prussia to become a combatant. The outside world would have become severe to be long withstood. Prussia's intervention would probably have led to that of Russia; nor could England have remained a passive spectator while all Europe was in a blaze. Could any results imaginable have compensated humanity for so general and so terrible a struggle?

Wise and thoughtful men will, we think, decide that in forgoing his purposes in order to avoid them the Emperor of the French pursued the most reasonable, the most manly, and the most humane course.

But, it is said, he has so, why did not Napoleon forece the dangers before he embarked dans cette galere?

This question can not be answered until we see the results of the Zurich Conference. If that Conference does not render the condition of Italy better than it was before the war, then it will be necessary to admit that Napoleon has made a fatal blunder—has sacrificed needlessly thousands of men and millions of money—and is obnoxious to severe censure for not having foreseen the complications which have occurred. If, on the other hand, the Zurich Conference really effects substantial improvements in the condition of Italy, it will be hard to blame the Emperor of the French; for though he may not have achieved all he hoped, he will still have achieved enough to repay him for the cost of the war.

Again: how could he have foreseen the insane Gallophobia which has attacked the Germans? Before the war there was not a German out of Austria who was not opposed to the extravagant Germanic dominions of Francis-Joseph. They were a parasitic growth, necessarily weakening the strongest Power in the German Confederation. They were a menace to Germany. They diverted Austria's strength from German channels. They were a perpetual bone of contention in the Diet. Until the war no German Cooperation in the Austrian empire had nearly involved a dissolution of the Germanic Confederacy. Yet Napoleon, undertaking to wrest from Austria this foreign growth which had so hampered and harassed Germany, the Germans set up a howl as though he were invading their own homes and hearths. To show the Germans that he intended them no ill it were impossible to do more than he did. He gathered no army on the Rhine to oppose the immense levies they mustered to menace France. He would not bombard Trieste, because it was used by the Confederation. In word and in deed, so far as words and deeds can tell, he told the Germans that his concern was with Italy, not with Germany. Yet so bitter was the anti-Gallic prejudice in the German armed that, in spite of all he could say or do, it is clear that, sooner or later, these Germans would have gone to war, had the campaign lasted, to maintain an Austrian dominions of which it has been the most cherished aim of Prussia and other German States to see her deprived. Is it fair to blame Napoleon for not having foreseen such unexampled inconsistency and perverse folly?

The Power that has not been humiliated by this peace are, after all, not Austria or France or Sardinia, but Prussia and England. Prussia certainly occupies an unenviable position. The smaller States of Germany are furious with her for having shown what they conceived to be signs of guilt. Austria will forgive her for having held aloof in her hour of need. France is not likely to feel grateful for the manner in Baden. England can scarcely have a grudge against her for remaining neutral during the war in the Crimea. If any contingency should place Prussia in peril, England would be very slow to come to her aid. Prussia's attitude during the war has contrived to conciliate the ill-will of all parties. Austria declares that she would never have attacked Prussia if she had received some sympathy for her cause professed for her by Lord Derby; and further urges that but for the stupid neutrality of England Venice would have been seized Turin at the commencement of the war. The French have all along classed Great Britain among their enemies. The unfair attacks of the British Press and Parliament on the Emperor, and the warlike preparations of England, made at a time when the forces of Prussia and army were occupied in Italy, are not likely to diminish the hereditary antipathy which the French feel for the old foe. Both Prussia and England have hereafter awkward settlements to effect with their neighbors, they will have no one but themselves to blame.

MORAL FROM A LAW BOOK.

ACCORDING to an old book of legal gossip the common phrase "glorious uncertainty of the law" should read, "inglorious certainty of the law." Such a volume as Dwarris' docket, "How can the law be certain which of times is reduced curiously?" Quoth the doctor, "It is certain to be certain to the last certainty of perfection." Replies the student, "Such certainty is inglorious."

This reference recurred in turning over the leaves of a recently published volume of the reports of our New York Court of Appeals—the eighteenth volume of the series in as many years; and the sixty-first volume of reports published of State Decisions since the Constitution of 1846 "ordered the Judges to write." If this last "spawn" from the legal press of judicial ooze may be a sample of preceding volumes, then, indeed, in this age of progress, is the "certainty of the law" eminently inglorious. It is—profligate of the whole number! There are a score of dissenting opinions given by Judge and Mr. Justice Roosevelt of this district disagrees in ten instances with his brethren. As in the race or the rubber the last heat or the latest success determines consequences, so it is in law with adjudications of the highest court. But do these determine that the last learning is the best any more than the race or the rubber settle the final winners to be the ablest sportsmen? Each one of these thirty-two reversed cases were first tried before a judge with or without a jury. The result of this trial was an appeal by the unsuccessful suitors to a tribunal of three or more judges; from whose decision, in a great instance, a second appeal was taken to the court of final resort. Many of the judges in the first instances confessedly equal in learning and logic have above upon the upper bench. Moreover, in one case the last judges reversed their predecessors after a few years back.

In view, therefore, of such facts, and cases, litigants may well credit the bar-tradition of the judge "reversed" as the decision to the 'head and tail' test of the jockey's race. Cases on the threshold of a suit at law can sing a paraphrase of Hopkins and Sternhold's Psalm—

> Life is not always longest
> To those who reach the greatest number,
> But legal battles are easiest
> To them with 9 longest pauses!

THE AMERICAN CUTICLE THICKENING.

WITHIN the past few weeks two books have been published in England berating this country. One is written by an Irishman who was Consul at Boston. This writer says what we are not at all civilized, and that Hibernian gentlemen will have the misfortune to cut us on our shores must make up their minds to a certain vast deal of annoyance from our savage habits; and will have much to endure in dining with they make their escape, as he did, from the civilized America to refused and published Journal. Our other writer is Mr. Charles Mackay, who came here in search of fortune, and failed to find it. He, too, is strong on our want of civilization; but his principal charge against us is the tremendous difficulties which beset honest workmen here. Not only, says he, is work very scarce in the United States, but it is also exceedingly mean, and innocent Britishers are constantly cheated even out of the small stipend agreed to be paid them. As for the laborer, he says his readers, quite common for "Paisley" weavers, in paying their hands, to make them take eight threads in the reed instead of six, an outrage what honest man's blood would not boil? Workmen are in New York a real want of water and fresh air! Living generally is unbearable, and very dear. In hard times, which are very frequent, the whole burden is shifted thrown on the workman; generally, he says, on "Yankee cunning," escape it all, and roll in wealth and luxury. Much more this worthy man says which we have not room to report; the sum of his diatribe being an earnest appeal to British workmen not on any account to emigrate to the United States.

If these two books had been published ten or fifteen years ago they would have been widely reprinted here long since, and our newspapers would ere this have been at them tooth and nail. We should have had a terrible row in the old style, that they were evidences that John Bull had not forgiven New Orleans, and that the Americans had blotted unfavorable opinion against the growth and prosperity of the republic. As it is, we dare say that not one person in a thousand has ever heard or ever heard of the works before us, or is likely to ask for them at the booksellers. We have seen but one or two mere reviews of them taught at, and those let him up quite easily; the British workman's onslaught has passed wholly unnoticed.

These things are a symptom of a great hardening and toughening of the American cuticle. Our skin is growing thicker; it is less sensitive to foreign opinion than it was in the days when Martin Chuzzlewit made us foam at the mouth.

Who knows but, by-and-by, we may grow callous enough to laugh at caricatures of ourselves drawn by a foreign hand?

The American eagle would no doubt be profoundly humiliated at the idea, but it thought we could ever learn lessons of any kind from the foreign world. But that bitter fate is, we fear, in store for the noble bird. Indifference has succeeded thin-skinned sensitiveness to foreign sarcasm, and the next step may be an honest desire to profit by criticism from any quarter, without regard to its motives. There are lessons to be learned from the cavils of the most unkind censors; there is much advice and instruction even in Marvin Chuzzlewit.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE LATE BALLOON VOYAGE

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

THE excitement of the public mind in regard to the transcontinental balloon voyage from St. Louis to Jefferson City, New York, having passed away, a few words of explanation concerning the false reports that were circulated about it, and a consequent misunderstanding that has arisen in that public mind, may be opportune at this time.

Your own journal, as well as many other respectable papers, have been imposed on by fabricated accounts, purporting to be from Mr. O. A. Gager and from Mr. John La Mountain.

Permit me to say that I have no ill-feeling against Mr. La Mountain. I verily believe that no trouble would have arisen with him had he not placed himself in the hands of an indiscreet reporter connected with the Troy Times. This person is attempting to build up a reputation for Mr. La Mountain by destroying mines, which I have been told more than twenty years ago, would be done with what success.

As for me, my business is to sell balloons; to improve the system of aerial navigation, to teach it to others; to improve the art in every way I can, and not to engage in controversies about the little details of this or that experiment. I claim to have done nothing but an ordinary duty in any the same experience and inclinations might have done; and I feel it a duty to the cause of science and to truth to give a full and faithful report in pamphlet form. This pamphlet I have intrusted to the perusal of Mr. O. A. Gager for correction and revision before it went to press, and he has made such alterations and corrections as he deems fit and proper. I deemed this a duty I owed to Mr. O. A. Gager, because he was the projector of the Balloon, and because he is a gentleman of energy, intelligence, and manly integrity.

His candid letter to me upon his seeing the fulsome and reports which have appeared is perhaps the best and most explanatory commentary upon this piece of a well-intended adventure. We all felt elated to our mission, and sincere and harmonious in our action, until the pamphlet was out. Then thought fit to mar that harmony by his ill-directed and ill-timed intermeddling.

I here submit this letter:

NEW YORK, July 28, 1859.

DEAR SIR,—I have not yet seen JOHN LA MOUNTAIN since we left him in Andover. I have not yet written you what purports to be "his account," written by Mr. Demers of the Troy Times. I have no account of his exercise on his return to Lansingburgh. The account that have prompted all the articles in the Troy Times are plainly pure and unqualified falsehoods, so far as you, reliably, and by Mr. La Mountain's friends; and I am satisfied the present friends of Mr. Demers will be public in their own vicinity in much enraged since their position.

I now asked which is the "Mr. Gager" whose name is lifted Mr. La Mountain's account. My reply was, I taught it worthy of notice; that I knew no one who was by so himself (Demers). I could only say I thought a rather suspicious case for all. The tone and thickness the gesture to be afraid to an article stating "he was deceived by his friends, and not by himself." I have not looked at both of his own accord, and at the time when I differed with him all the facts of the case. I have not enough to have brought him safely home. Still I told him (Demers) I would have to do it myself, as I could get aloute to my remarks, or in any way associate any more than the possible way of having his published. I would much prefer to be before the world as I am, than to find myself from his associate—to award and a decision from my friends. I am sick, tired, and thickness me to have him pursue my name in his journal. I insisted upon their observing the agreement to be given to the public as "Mr. Gager's account," which they did. Then I had put Mr. Gager's name to it. I am very much averse to a newspaper controversy, knowing that it would injure them, and me. That is the only thing, I think, they are after. I told them I did not blame John, only for allowing his name to appear in such a statement, knowing, as you would yourself after reading it, that it was never written by him.

I am, as ever, truly yours,

JOHN WISE.

I deem this brief explanation necessary to the cause of truth, to the integrity of Mr. Gager, to the correction of the fabulous statements in the statement of Mr. Hyde's account, and to my own humble efforts in this interesting act.

Respectfully yours,

JOHN WISE.

P.S.—I will shortly personally write an article on my further progress.

☞ The Engineer of the Washington Monument at Washington, D. C., has addressed a circular calling on the 30,000 Postmasters throughout the country to collect funds for the purpose of completing that work. If every Postmaster collects something the work will soon be finished.

THE LOUNGER.

THE LAST MURDER.

That a man mad with rum and passion should shoot his partner because in the street is not surprising, however harrowing it may be. But that any body of Directors—composed, doubtless, of well-meaning and moral men—should suffer such a slaughter as that at the Schaghticoke Bridge to occur under their auspices is a most sickening and alarming fact.

According to the testimony of the inquest over the body of Mr. Plympton, the condition of the bridge was known. It was old and unsafe; and a new one was contemplated. A bridge upon a great Northern route of travel, at the season of the year when the travel is the largest, is a key to the nation. A train runs upon it at moderate speed; the bridge suddenly gives way; nine persons are instantly killed, and many more are wounded.

There is no conference chance in this. There can be no plea of unreliable data. The bridge was old, unsafe, and the Superintendent of the road directly—by unmistakable pressure for the public accommodation. By Appleton's Railway Guide for July the name of William Wallace, of Albany, is printed as President and Superintendent of the road. We do not know him. We never heard of him before. We have no doubt that Mr. William Wallace is a man who would not willingly hurt a dog. But he has assumed the responsibility, and he is doubtless paid for the work, of superintending many miles of road. What is superintendence of a railroad if it is not, first of all, taking diligent care that human life is protected against every avoidable risk? To a certain extent defects of metal vitiating machinery, sudden land-slides, or water-spouts covering or washing the road, and some other circumstances which may occasion accidents and loss of life, are to be regarded as unavoidable, and a Superintendent may not be justly blamed if every possible human care has been taken.

But that over a particular river or ravine there should be no bridge at all, or a bridge so notoriously insecure that it is the same as none, is a carelessness which is crime. That a Superintendent should not know the absence or the rottenness of a bridge is a criminal ignorance; it is an inadequacy to the responsibility assumed, so gross and outrageous that the man who is guilty of it should be held up conspicuously to public animadversion. For men have no right to assume responsibilities involving human life without paying the penalty of betraying them.

The day of rhetoric and flaring capitals at the head of the column about railroad disasters on account of the slaughter has gone by. The appeal to the moral sense of individuals who are elected Directors and Superintendents is found to be in almost hopeless. The statistics and the experience of every traveler, demonstrate that any system of railroad management is a ghastly failure. Every where in the world a man travels by railmore safely than by railroad.

The only practicable remedy is to make it incumbent upon every Superintendent, in the case of every railroad accident, to proceed against the Company, and the punishment, upon conviction of carelessness of inadequacy in the case of any bridge in such case the forfeiture of a heavy percentage of the entire capital invested in the road, to be distributed among the injured and the families of the dead by proper adjudication. No man now knows whose without a secret apprehension. The slightest delay, or an unusual sound, instantly excites the passengers to a painful anxiety. Under the administration of travelers, we have not learned how to travel. And we protect ourselves against the railroad companies by exacting from the passage and execution of the severest laws of pecuniary damages—which, in the case of bonds are held specially by the fear of infamy, let the names of the President and Directors and Superintendents of the offending roads be made forever infamous.

CAGLIOSTRO AT VILLAFRANCA.

The first news from Paris is now substantially correct. The warmest friends of Louis Napoleon can only say: "Wait till Zurich." The Emperor is a lucky adventurer. He has done, or more than he intended to do; or else his deliberate plans were of double meaning, to interpret them at his pleasure.

This, however, is to be said for him: that his career has always great ability, and that he is not, probably, without good reasons for his present action. He is the most conservative of all sovereigns in France; and he has undoubtedly benefited by the lessons which he learned as a wanderer on the earth. He knows the world, and can say, concommon, sense into his government. Of course he may mistake his own power, and so lose his life. He may not be able to see the principles and conditions upon which alone he can found a despotism in France. Every man is liable to such a miscalculation see for the crisis. That is, that kings-born must be based upon the principles of the age. It is clear now that Europe would have endured the exile of Austria from every part of Italy as well as from Lombardy. The Emperor has not mistaken what his natural allies—meaning Prussia—deserted him, and Lord Clarendon, and Lord Derby, and Lord Bloomfield, before the news of peace, says that the fate of the fortresses must be left to new treaties.

As the war ceased, the Emperor and the Queen with clasped mailed hands, keep guard over Italy. They propose no intervention under certain conditions. Either, then, the Italians accept them, or decline. If they accept, they receive their country as a gift from the two great powers. If they decline—what is the condition of Italy? But if they take their example of the Pope, and the treasure of pure liberty that Austria and France unite in the benefaction? Have those two powers laid aside rivalry and ambition, and do they look good for the love of goodness?

The warm friendship of the French Emperor, who regarded him as a kind of inspired Providential agent, as a great and good man, and a vast benefactor of his country and the cause of mankind, the dead of the Bonlevards and the exiles of the colonies, may see in the whole affair only another re-splendent signs of his imperial greatness and goodness.

We do not. We see a successful adventurer. We are watching the game of a crowned Cagliostro.

COLLEGE ORATIONS.

The time of conferring degrees has come, and the voice of the college orator is heard in the land. Tears are shed, and flowers are distributed, and in the country, and about thirty thousand students. If we add to the annual orations delivered before the local societies, and to those which are spoken before seminaries and academies, and the sermons and anniversary addresses, we have a volley of eloquence and learning before which ever caught to fly and ignorance capitulates.

Any gentleman may be honored by the invitation to deliver a College Address, for what was called a literary gentleman is now an orator. What shall the orator talk about? Here are two hundreds of living men, full of warm interests and complicated by personal relations to each in which they live, who come together, and, sitting in the lap of their Alma Mater, open their ears and minds and hearts to the man they have raised to speak to them. So let him talk as a living man to living men. Let him say something which will make his book of a piece of his life and experience and thought, and give it to his hearers. It will do no harm if they all differ. He is invited to say what he thinks, not what his hearers think.

Moreover, in this country the only chance we have of fairly discussing the practical questions in which we have a common interest is at such an impartian assembly as a crowd of college graduates. It is precisely the time to look at our political principles from the Olympian and total moral point of view. If we can't do it without losing our tempers, so much the worse for us and our principles. Let it be understood that dry dogmatic discussions of abstract themes are valuable at such times only as they bear upon life. Let it be understood that the educated American citizen is not afraid of repeating and repeating the proverb of his faith in the future of his country, nor of citing his own errors of conduct in regard to that view as well as the errors of others. There are certain popular superstitions about the country—its principle and its practice—which, if every college orator this summer would thoughtfully treat in his address, would be on the way to correction.

A WORD TO THE NEIGHBORS OF ROTTEN BRIDGES.

On Monday evening of last week the Lounger was quietly riding in the cars upon the Troy, Bennington, and Rutland Railroad, when one of his neighbors on the seat before him speaking of the feeble bridge so dangerous that it was notorious. On a bridge crossing a train was upon the bridge, which fell as the locomotive struck it, and a frightful disaster followed.

It appears that the neighbors of that bridge knew its insecurity as the neighbors in Indiana knew the insufficiency of the culvert, which nearly proved its incompetency by choking and washing away the road. It is a singular fact in every country. Of course, there are plenty of such bridges and culverts and other work works left, and daily used by people in the midst of their peril. Equally, of course, the railroad companies prefer to take the risk, and to trust to the certainty that they will be able to pay the interest on their bonds, if they spend money enough to keep the roads in proper order. Let those neighbors, then, put the public on their guard. Wherever a point upon any road is notoriously dangerous, let the fact be made known at it to the public. Let it be understood that who ever takes the cars upon a certain road takes them at the imminent risk of his life. Let us have a Railway Director as we have a Bank-note Detector, and let the well-deserved disgrace of railway murder can not be corrected.

AMERICAN ART IN ENGLAND.

Mr. Powers's statue of the Greek Slave has just been bought at auction in London by the Earl of Cheveden for three thousand dollars. The Art Journal observes in several papers long and careful notices of Crawford's statue of Orpheus, and of the Adams,' which in the main agree with the general judgment of those who saw it here. Even the Athenæum, which rarely speaks of American matters, is disposed to allow an American artist his just share of praise, and while saying nothing with unkindness, willingly concedes that "it does credit to the rising school of transatlantic painters, and is well worth a visit." The Illustrated London News and the Daily News speak much more warmly. The former says: "Mr. Crawford has produced a work of art especially, Mr. Church approves himself a consummate master of the art of presentation in the individual subject to which that art can exercise its powers."

It is probably not known to many who know and admire Mr. Church's pictures that he has never been in Europe, and has, of course, not seen the great pictures of the old galleries. His studies have been among our own scenery, and in that of the tropics, and his fame as a landscape painter of has found the tropical subjects he so delights to represent.

Whatever his reasons for this course may have been, his career shows that very great excellence can be attained without the study of the great illustrations. Of course it remains to be proved in Mr. Church's case how much better his pictures will be after visiting the European galleries. In this country there are perhaps enough pictures by famous masters to show a student what such works are; but it is only familiar intercourse with many works of such men that reveals all their power.

Mr. Church is understood to be passing the summer in the Highlands of Newfoundland and the shores of the Bay of Fundy. Having lured for us the Heart of the Andes, perhaps he is about to reveal to us the splendor of icebergs and cold mists.

AN EPIGRAM.

A correspondent thus pleasantly turns the tables upon certain critics or medis—which is according to the true language:

"Mr. Longfellow,—It is hard to be reprimanded by a bad writer! I refer to the following article:

"In an article written by Judge Edmonds for the New York Tribune, he has treated 'Speaking in Many Tongues' and intended to show how persons 'spiritualized' could speak in languages of which they do not understand), there occurs the following specimen sentence:

"'The name "wrote" was A. Millington, making eleven letters, viz.

"'Henry your friend 'Hans Yorker' pencils on a Newport flat the following:

"'Judge Edmonds to the Tribune writes
A letter marvelous and quaint,
To show us how the medium spirits
Used by some spiritual saint,
Varying the dialects of his tongue
Can speak in many foreign tongues;
Or read with spiritual eyes
All languages, from Celt to Coptic!
But what I think he failed to show,
If, learned in foreign language grown,
A medium writes "wrote his own?"

OUTWARD-BOUND.

A correspondent, E. N. P., who was "once a son of the sea," writes this lovely lyric:

Homeward-bound is a welcome sound,
But outward-bound give me!
With the swelling sail, and the rushing gale,
And the rush of the rearing sea!

We leave behind the chasing wind,
We leave behind the shore;
While hill and dale fade in the sea.
Perhaps to rise no more.

We've said farewell—and the tears that fell
On our cheeks we've brushed away:
But, the homeward-bound, all but in sight
Of the mirth of his children at play!

And the song of his wife, when the winds are at strife,
And the ripe of dark keep under the key,
Any fly-bird a crow in the whistling wave,
And never his family.

Ay, outward-bound is a noble sound,
For the sea is a noble host,
And who deeply grins, from his basket's brink,
Are the guests that love him the most.

We bide not to pace the deck,
The storm-cloud has shadows like sky:
Whate'er may call, whate'er befall,
We are ready to hear, to see, and do.

We never shrink, though heaven be ink,
And the waves a waste of snow;
With good sea-room to meet the gloom,
And all the gales that blow.

Oh, homeward-bound is a welcome sound,
But outward-bound give me;
For I loved the shore, whence they sail no more—
The far country.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—W. V. A., Detroit, writes, in relation to the marriage of the Queen of Spain, a subject, "Have is a law prohibiting the marriage of any of the royal family without the consent of the reigning sovereign, but no legal restriction as the sovereign herself, and so far as she is personally concerned."

—Some Yorker reminds the Lounger that Aaron Hoxsey says and wood French measles attributo to Madame de Maintenon, and not to Madame "Adrian de Jacque," and that Metternich did not first say these. That is true, but he adopted the saying, and made it his own. Besides the first correction is timely and just. Metternich, like Talleyrand, will doubtless have the credit of many more good things than he has said. In like manner, upon a recent occasion, the remark of the "Peculiar Papers" has been delivered so address, some of which "Now is this gentleman?" "Why," said another, much better informed, "don't you know who that is? That is the author of 'Reverter of a Bachelor,' and "The Howadji," and "Nothing to Wear." The quotations are entirely satisfied; and so ought the author in question to have been flattered by the mistake.

—A true, war-hearted Buffalonian sends an account of a dog-fight, which, who, among other supplements, must be "lively as a cricket." It seems hardly fair a great dog-fight should be reported at so object," and who of young and well and altogether admirable animals, musicality, and who also lives in Buffalo, should be obliged to confine his talents to a New York paper. It is justice to the unmarried ladies of Buffalo we withhold the name.

—Turton, Lockport, will find in a late number of the "Round Table" the line he asks for is from a Latin poem of Richard Crashaw:

"Tympha pudens labra ne vitiet et ebrius."

The commentators water now to be published.

—The admirable correspondent of Harper's Magazine, Porte Crayon, has been named Commissioner of Internal betrays so secret in saying to D. H. Strother, of Virginia.

—Mr. Bancroft, Newport, Georgia, confirmed by a Woodbury, Connecticut, in reply to a subscription asked "Night placing her mantle with a star," etc., says:

"Reverend Clarke, the 'Old Poet' of the Round Table:

"'And Evening lets her curtain down,
And puts in with a star.'

"Drake, in his 'Culprit Fay,' has the following line:

"'And Night her curtain down hath drawn.'

—P. P. H. would like to know the meaning of "postprandial." It is derived from the Latin, and means after-dinner." A post-prandial speech is the very proposes.

—It would be possible to show him that all good pork is not nut-fed, as is Spain; and he should acknowledge that clover is the best element for the production of the flavorous juices. If any man dare question this last month into Kentucky and his fine hams are celebrated by the succulent dish of honey-suck-le-bogotten bacon which recently appeared on our table.

—S. S. L. There is no steel engraving of Gignoux's Niagara, nor will there probably be one. The Heart of the Andes will be engraved in due season.

—A correspondent in Georgetown, District of Columbia, writes: "Can you kindly answer a question?" It originates:"

Number 'First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his fellow-citizens,' how ? First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his fellow-citizens," is right.

—The first is a garbled reading by Chief-Justice Marshall, or Light-Horse Harry Lee, of a passage in a work of which he technically turned by printers an end.

—The Lounger has referred to more than one batch of a series of resolutions presented to the United States House of Representatives by Mr. Lovejoy, of Illinois. Here is the last:

"3. That a Joint Committee of both Houses be appointed to report such measures as may be necessary, and expressive of the profound sorrow with which Congress is penetrated at the loss of so great a friend of liberty and peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

—The remaining words were drawn by Governor Floyd, and presented to the House by John Marshall, a representative from Kentucky.

—The preceding resolution is copied verbatim from the 3d volume of Elliot's Debates, and is found in Washington's fifth paper.

—The following article on introducing the resolution, on the death of Washington, is found in the same volume. 1st session, 5th Congress, page 205.

—The funeral oration in honor of General George Washington, before both Houses of Congress, was delivered in the German Lutheran Church of Philadelphia, on the 26th December, 1799, by Major-General Henry Lee. It is correct this passage:

"First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen, he was second to none in the humble and enduring scenes of private life."

—Rev. Hamilton, Georgia. J. Rose Downie is, we believe, at present in California. His published works are: "Zenobiga of a Runaway Slave, with Notes of a Sojourn on the Island of Zanzibar;" and "Yusef, a Crusade in the East."

THE PIKE'S PEAK GOLD MINES.—[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

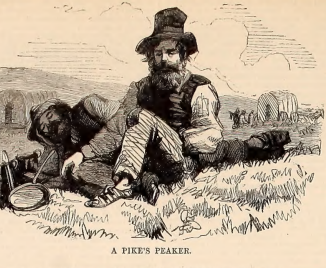
SOUTH FORK OF THE PLATTE, JUNE, 1859.

FAR distant upon the boundless prairies stretching away toward the setting sun, and over four hundred and fifty miles from the border towns of the Missouri River, this letter is written for the amusement and instruction of your readers. The author, dressed in a soiled suit of corduroy, and with a ventilated slouched hat upon his head, is seated upon the tongue of a wagon, with a five-gallon vinegar-keg for his writing-desk, while at the same moment the first teams of Colonel F. W. Lander's South Pass Wagon-road Expedition are entering the water at the crossing of the South Fork of the Platte.

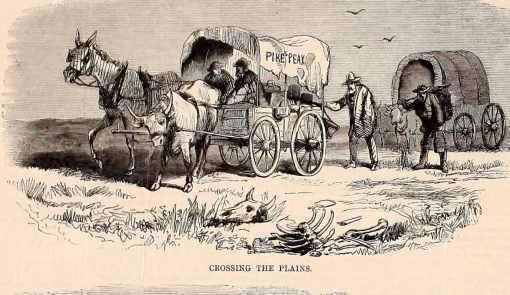
At the present date both banks of the river are lined with the wagons and animals of the emigrants; and the haggy owners of those which have successfully "passed over Jordan" may well cast their eyes across the swelling flood and gaze with Christian resignation upon the toiling and struggling pilgrims who have yet to prove their faith and endurance. The water rushing over the wagon, the plunging and kicking of the mules, and the imprecations of the teamsters, render the scene one of peculiar interest, and to add to it, Dog Belly, chief of the Ogallallah band of the Sioux tribe of Indians, with a small party of his braves, are grouped around Colonel Lander's carriage, smoking the pipe of peace. Mr. Albert Bierstadt, of Boston, the artist of the expedition, is engaged in sketching their appearance. And it is to his pencil we are indebted for the illustrations accompanying this article.

During the past ten days we have met thousands of the deluded and suffering gold-seekers retracing their steps to the quiet farms of the West. Many of them were in a starving condition, barefooted, ragged, and penniless; and it has caused much delay in the progress of the expedition, and materially diminished our supply of provisions, to feed these hungry, home-bound stragglers. We counted upon one day ninety-three wagons, and the following one eighty-four, to each of which was attached from six to ten men; and besides these, hundreds of others who were wandering along without any mode of conveyance. Up to this point of our journey we have probably passed five thousand disheartened and disappointed men returning to the States, and their number is but small compared to those who have pressed on toward California.

On the Smoky Hill Fork route the suffering has been much more extensive and aggravated.



A PIKE'S PEAKER.



CROSSING THE PLAINS.

Of one party some twelve or fifteen died in a state of starvation, and in some instances the survivors preserved their own lives by eating the dead bodies of their former companions. I conversed with a returning emigrant who saw and spoke to the insane survivor of three brothers by the name of Riley, from Whiteside County, Illinois, who had eaten the dead bodies of his brethren, and was found by the Indians in a dying state, and by them carried to the nearest passing train. These reports are confirmed by old and reliable mountaineers, and there is no reason to doubt that the full story of the emigrants' wrongs and suffering is yet to be told.

We hear that some of these deluded men, infatuated by the deception practiced upon them, have risen in their might, and in Denver City have inflicted a terrible retribution upon two or three of the prominent actors in the drama. It is also reported that the conflagration of the town is threatened.

Before closing this article I desire to refer to the advantages of this central, or, as it is termed, South Pass route, as a convenient road. Many years ago it was adopted by the old Northwest and American Fur Companies as the route of supply for their forts. It was selected and traveled, after long exploration of the mountains, by bravest hunters, who set traps upon every stream, and whose experience justified its adoption. Fremont followed this old trail in his passage to Oregon, and the overland emigrant pursues it at this day. When the Congressional act was passed to construct a wagon-road to California through the South Pass, all that could be done to better the road was to shorten it where the travel had been compelled to pass around the dense forests of the Wasatch Mountains. This was done by Col. Lander's party, after a long exploration, and the bridges and ferries of the old road avoided. The next step is to bridge the Platte. The route is equally short to Oregon and California, and passes far enough north to avoid the fenced inclosures of the Mormons, giving the overland emigrants pastures free of cost.

In connection with the danger of crossing this river, we have just received the distressing intelligence that two young gentlemen attached to the expedition, Gilbert B. Towles and John Marshall Wilson, sons of leading citizens of Washington, both taken ill from the inclemency of the weather and sent home from Fort Kearney, have been drowned, in the attempt to ford at the lower crossing.

CHAPTER XVI.

STILL KNITTING.

MADAME DEFARGE and Monsieur her husband returned amicably to the bosom of Saint Antoine, while a speck in a blue cap toiled through the dust and heat, and through the dust, and down the weary miles of avenue by the way-side, slowly tending toward that point of the compass at which the can of Monsieur the Marquis, now in his grave, dressed in the white dress and shoes, this latter article of clothing was the stone faces now for listening to the trees and to the birds, and to every thing on the village stonecutter who, in their quest for barbs to put and fragments of dead stick to burn, strayed within sight of the great stone court-yard and carriage-entrance, had it borne in upon their outward fancy that the expression of the faces was altered. A rumor just lived in the village—had a faint existence there, as its people had, that when the knife struck home the faces changed from faces of pride to faces of anger and pain; also, that when that dangling figure was hauled up forty feet above the then stopped, and bore a cruel look of being wronged, which they would henceforth bear for ever. In the stone face over the great window of the bedchamber, where the murder was done, two fine dints were pointed out in the sculptured nose, which every body recognized, and which nobody had seen of old; and on the scarce occasions when two or three ragged peasants emerged from the crowd to take a hurried peep at Monsieur the Marquis perished, a skinny figure would not have pointed to it for a minute before they all started away amidst a shower of leaves, like the more fortunate hares, who could find a living there.

Chateau and stone face and dangling figure, the real stain on the stone floor and the pure water in the village well—similar decays of seven centuries of the whole province of France—all these fitted—by under the sky and the sun—contemplated into a faint hair-breadth line. So does a whole world, with all its greatnesses and littlenesses, lie in a twinkling star. And as most human knowledge can spit a ray of light and analyze the manner of its composition, so, other intelligences may read in the feeble shining of this earth of ours every thought and act, every vice and virtue, of every responsible creature on it.

The Defarges, husband and wife, came lumbering under the starlight in their public vehicle, to that gate of Paris whereunto their journey naturally tended. There was the usual stoppage at the barrier guard-house, and the usual lanterns came glancing forth for the usual examination and inquiry. Monsieur Defarge alighted: knowing one or two of the soldiery there, and one of the police. The latter he also knew intimate with, and affectionately embraced.

When Saint Antoine had thus received the Defarges in his dusky wings, and they, having finally alighted near the Saint's boundaries, were picking their way on foot through the black mud and offal of his streets, Madame Defarge spoke to her husband:

"Say then, my friend, what did Jacques of the police tell thee?"

"Very little to-night, but all he knows. There is another spy commissioned for our quarter. These may be many more for all that he can say, but he knows of one."

"Eh well!" said Madame Defarge, raising her eyebrows with a cool business air. "It is necessary to register him. How do they call that man?"

"He is English."

"So much the better. His name?"

"Barsad," said Defarge, making it French by pronunciation. But he had been so careful to get it accurately that he then spelled it with perfect correctness.

"Barsad," repeated madame. "Good. Christian name?"

"John."

"John Barsad," repeated madame, after murmuring it once to herself. "Good. His appearance; is it known?"

"Age, about forty years; height, about five feet nine; black hair; generally rather handsome visage; eyes dark; face thin, long, and sallow; nose aquiline, but not straight, having a peculiar inclination toward the left cheek; expression, therefore, sinister."

"Eh my faith. It is a portrait!" said madame, laughing. "He shall be registered tomorrow."

They turned into the wine-shop, which was closed (for the night), and, while Defarge took madame Defarge immediately took her post at her desk, counted the small moneys that had been taken during her absence, examined the stock, went through the entries in the book, made other entries of her own, checked the serving-man in every possible way, and finally dismissed him to bed. Then she turned out the contents of the bowl of money for the second time, and began knotting them up in her handkerchief, in a manner of separate knots, for safe keeping through the night. All this while Defarge, with his pipe in his mouth, walked up and down, occasionally exhaling, but never interfering; in which condition, indeed, as to the business and the domestic affairs, he walked up and down through life.

The night was hot, and the shop, close shut and surrounded by so foul a neighborhood, was ill-smelling. Monsieur Defarge's olfactory sense was by an unconscious, but the stock of wine unsmelled much stronger than it ever tasted, and so did the stock of rum and brandy and aniseed. He walked the room in a confused way, as he put down his smoked-out pipe.

"You are fatigued," said madame, raising her glance as she knotted the money. "There are only the usual odors."

"I am a little tired," her husband acknowledged.

"You are a little depressed, too," said madame, whose quick eyes had never been so intent on the accounts but they had had a ray or two for him. "Come, there is time to talk."

"But my dear—" began Defarge.

"But my dear," repeated madame, nodding firmly; "but my dear! You are faint of heart to-night, my dear!"

"Well, then," said Defarge, as if a thought were wrung out of his breast, "it is a long time."

"It is a long time," repeated his wife; "and when is it not a long time? Vengeance and retribution require a long time; it is the rule."

"It does not take a long time to strike a man with lightning," said Defarge.

"How long," demanded madame, composedly, "does it take to make and store the lightning? Tell me."

Defarge raised his forehead thoughtfully, as if time were regulated by it, and slowly answered:

"It does not take a long time," said madame, "for an earthquake to swallow up a town. Eh well! Tell me how long it takes to prepare the earthquake?"

"A long time, I suppose," said Defarge.

"But when it is ready it takes place, and grinds to pieces every thing before it. In the meantime, it is always preparing, though it is not seen or heard. That is your consolation. Keep it in view."

She tied a knot with flashing eyes, as if it throttled a foe.

"I tell thee," said madame, extending her right hand for emphasis, "that although it is a long time on the road, it is on the road and coming. I tell thee it never retreats, and never stops. I tell thee it is always coming. Look around and consider the lives of all the world that we know; consider the faces of all the world that we know, for proofs of my wrath and discontent to which the Jacquerie addresses itself with more and more of certainty every day. Can those things last? Bah! I mock you."

"My brave wife," returned Defarge, standing before her with his head a little bent, and his hands clasped at his back, like a docile and attentive pupil before his catechist, "I do not question all this. But it has lasted a long time, and it is possible—you know well, my wife, it is possible—that it may not come during our lives."

"Eh well! How then?" demanded madame, tying another knot, as if there were another enemy strangled.

"Well!" said Defarge, with a half-complaining and half-apologetic shrug. "We shall not see it."

"We shall have helped it," returned madame, with her extended hand in strong action. "Nothing that we do is done in vain. I believe, with all my soul, that we shall see the triumph. But even if not, even if I knew certainly not, show me the neck of an aristocrat and tyrant, and still I would—"

There madame, with her teeth set, tied a very terrible knot indeed.

"Hold!" cried Defarge, reddening a little, as if he felt charged with cowardice; "I, too, my dear, will stop at nothing."

"Yes! But it is your weakness that you sometimes need to see your victim and your opportunity to sustain you. Sustain yourself without that. When the time comes, let loose a tiger and a devil; but wait for the time with the tiger and the devil chained up—not shown—yet always ready."

Madame enforced the conclusion of this piece of advice by striking her little counter with her chain of money as if she knocked its brains out, and then gathering the heavy handkerchief under her arm in a serene manner, and observing that it was time to go to bed.

Next morning was the admirable woman in her usual place in the wine-shop, knitting away assiduously. A rose lay beside her, and if she had been overlooked at the flower, it was with no intraction of her usual preoccupied air. There were a few customers, drinking or not drinking, standing or seated, sprinkled about. The day was very hot, and heaps of flies, who were tormenting their inquisitive and adventurous propensities into all the glutinous little glasses near madame, fell dead at the bottom. Their decease made no impression on the other flies out promenading, who looked at them in the coldest manner (as if they themselves were elephants, or something as far removed), until they met the same fate. Curious to consider—perhaps they thought as much at Court that sunny summer day—how heedless flies are!

A figure entering at the door threw a shadow on Madame Defarge which she felt to be a new one. She laid down her knitting, and began to put her rose in her head-dress before she looked at the figure.

It was curious. The moment Madame Defarge took up the rose the customers ceased talking, and began gradually to drop out of the wine-shop.

"Good-day, madame," said the new-comer.

"Good-day, monsieur."

She said it aloud, but added to herself, as she resumed her knitting: "Hah! Good-day; age, about forty; height, about five feet nine; black hair; generally rather handsome visage; complexion dark; eyes, dark; thin, long, and sallow face; aquiline nose, but not straight, having a peculiar inclination toward the left cheek, which imparts a sinister expression! Good-day, one and all!"

"I have the goodness to give me a little glass of old cognac, and a mouthful of cool fresh water, madame."

Madame complied with a polite air.

"Marvelous cognac this, madame!"

It was the first time it had ever been so complimented, and Madame Defarge knew enough of its measurement to know that, indeed, it was; however, that the cognac was flattered, and took up her knitting. The visitor watched her fingers for a few moments, and then took the opportunity of observing the place in general.

"You keep wine, madame?"

"I am accustomed to it."

"A pretty worm too!"

"You think so?" said madame, looking at him with a smile.

"Decidedly. May one ask what it is for?"

"Pastime," said madame, still looking at him with a smile, while her fingers moved nimbly.

"Not for use?"

"That depends. I may find use for it one day. If madame," said madame, drawing a breath and nodding her head with a stern kind of coquetry, "I'll say it!"

It was remarkable; but the taste of Saint Antoine seemed to be decidedly opposed to a rose on the head-dress of Madame Defarge. Two men had entered separately, and had been about to order drink, when, catching sight of that novelty, they faltered, made a pretense of looking about as if for some friend who was not there, and went away. Nor of those who had been there when this visitor entered was there one left. They had all dropped off. The spy had kept his eyes open, but had been able to detect no sign. They had lounged away in a purely stricken, purposeless, accidental manner, quite natural and unimpeachable.

"Ami," thought madame, checking off her work as her fingers knitted, and her eyes looked at the stranger. "Stay long enough and I shall think 'BARSAD' before you go."

"You have a husband, madame?"

"I have."

"Children?"

"No children."

"Business seems bad?"

"Business is very bad; the people are so poor."

"Ah, the unfortunate, miserable people! So oppressed too—as you say."

"As you say," madame retorted, correcting him, and deftly knitting an extra something into his name that boded him no good.

"Pardon me; certainly it was I who said so, but you naturally think so. Of course."

"I think, returned madame, in a high voice. "I and my husband have enough to do to keep this wine-shop open without thinking. And then madame here is, how to live. That is the subject we think of, and it gives us, from morning to night, enough to think about without embarrassing our heads concerning others. I think for others? No, no."

The spy, who was there to pick up any crumbs he could find or make, did not allow his baffled state to express itself in his visiter face, but stood with an air of gossiping gallantry, leaning his elbow on Madame Defarge's little counter, and occasionally sipping his cognac.

"A bad business this, madame, of Gaspard's execution. Ah! the poor Gaspard!" with a sigh of great compassion.

"My faith!" returned madame, coolly and lightly, "if people use knives for such purposes they have to pay for it. He knew beforehand what the price of his luxury was; he has paid the price."

"I believe," said the spy, dropping his soft voice to a tone that invited confidence, and expressing an injured revolutionary susceptibility in every muscle of his wicked face, "I believe there is much compassion and anger in this neighborhood touching the poor fellow? Between ourselves."

"Is there?" asked madame, vacantly.

"Is there not?"

"Here is my husband!" said Madame Defarge.

As the keeper of the wine-shop entered at the door the spy saluted him by touching his hat, and saying, with an engaging smile, "Good-day, Jacques!" Defarge stopped short, and stared at him.

"Good-day, Jacques!" the spy repeated, with not quite so much confidence, or quite so easy a smile under the stare.

"You deceive yourself, monsieur," returned the keeper of the wine-shop. "You mistake me for another. That is not my name. I am Ernest Defarge."

"It is all the same," said the spy, airily, but discomfited too; "good-day!"

"Good-day," answered Defarge, calmly.

"I was saying to madame, with whom I had the pleasure of chatting when you entered, that they tell me there is—and no wonder!—much sympathy and anger in Saint Antoine touching the unhappy fate of poor Gaspard."

"No one has told me so," said Defarge, shaking his head; "I know nothing of it."

Having said it, he passed behind the little counter, and stood with his hand on the back of his wife's chair, looking over the customer and the person to whom they were both opposed, and whom either of them would have shot with the greatest satisfaction.

The spy, well used to his business, did not change his unconscious attitude, but drained his little glass of cognac, took a sip of fresh water, and asked for another glass of cognac. Madame Defarge poured it out for him, took to her knitting again, and hummed a little song over it.

"You seem to know this quarter well; that is to say, better than I do?" observed Defarge.

"AND STOOD WITH HIS HAND ON THE BACK OF HIS WIFE'S CHAIR."

"Not at all, but I hope to know it better. I am so profoundly interested in its miserable inhabitants."

"Hh!" muttered Delapoe.

"The pleasure of conversing with you, Monsieur Delapoe, recalls to me," pursued the spy, "that I have the honor of cherishing some interesting associations with your name."

"Indeed?" said Defarge, with much indifference.

"Yes indeed. When Doctor Manette was released, you will remember that he was given to him, I know. He was delivered to you. You see I am informed of the circumstance?"

"Such is the fact, certainly," said Defarge. He had had it conveyed to him, in an accidental touch of his wife's elbow as she knitted and warbled, that he would do best to answer, but always with brevity.

"It was to you," said the spy, "that his daughter came; and it was from your care that his daughter took him, accompanied by his child's brown mousinger; how is he called?—in a little wiga—Lorry—the bank of Tellson and Company—over to England."

"Such is the fact," repeated Defarge.

"Very interesting remembrances!" said the spy. "I have known Doctor Manette and his daughter, in England."

"Yes?" said Defarge.

"You don't hear much about them now," said the spy.

"No," said Defarge.

"In fact, nobody struck in, looking up from her work and her little song, "we never hear about them. We received the news of their safe arrival, and perhaps another letter, or perhaps two; but since then they have gradually taken their proper place in the past. We have heard no correspondence."

"Perfectly so, madame," replied the spy. "She is going to be married."

"Going?" echoed madame. "She was pretty enough to have been married long ago. You English are cold, it seems to me."

"Oh! You know I am English."

"I perceive your tongue is," returned madame; "and what the tongue is, I suppose the man is."

He did not take the identification as a compliment, but he made the best of it, and turned it off with a laugh. After sipping his cognac to the end, he added:

"Yes, Miss Manette is going to be married. But not to an Englishman; to one who, like herself, is French by birth. And speaking of Gaspard (ah, poor Gaspard! It was cruel, cruel), it is a curious thing that she is going to marry the nephew of her father's old servant. The name Gaspard was exalted to that height of so many feet; in other words, the present Marquis. But he lives unknown in England, he is no Marquis there; he is Mr. Charles Darnay. D'Aulnais is the name of his mother's family."

Madame Defarge knitted steadily, but the intelligence had arrested the attention of her husband. Do what he would behind the little counter, as to the stirring of a light and the lighting of his pipe, he was conscious that his hand was not true-worthy. The spy would have been on any of his best behaved, if he had been coming in to help him to any other, Mr. Barsad paid for what he had already had, and lounged, taking occasion to say, in a genteel manner, before he departed, that he looked forward to the pleasure of seeing Monsieur and Madame Defarge again. For some minutes after he had emerged into the outer presence of the wine shop, the husband and wife remained exactly as he had left them, lest he should come back.

"Can it be true," said Defarge, in a low voice, looking down at his wife as he stood smoking with his hand on the back of his head, "that this is how he has said Ma'amselle Manette?"

"As he has said," returned madame, lifting her eyebrows a little, "it is probably false. But he may be true."

"If it is," Defarge began; and stopped.

"If it is?" repeated his wife.

"—And if it is true, also, while we live to see it triumph—I hope, for her sake, Destiny will keep her husband out of France."

"Her husband's destiny," said Madame Defarge, with her usual composure, "will take him where he is to go, and will lead him to the end that is to end him. That is all I know."

"But it is very strange—now, at least in it is not very strange—said Defarge, pondering with his wife to induce her to admit it, "that, after all our sympathy for Monsieur her father and herself, her husband's name should be proscribed under your hand at this moment by the side of Monsieur Gaspard's. It is actually on the list!"

"Stranger things than that will happen when it does come," answered madame. "I have them both here, of a certainty; and they are both dear to Vengeance. I have said enough."

She rolled up her knitting when she had said those words, and presently took the two out of the basket, examined the work upon the two pairs of stockings, counted the stitches, and began to knit. Then, she knitted with great apparent calculation of her figure, and then she knitted more and more quickly.

"What do you think, my dear?" said her husband, finally.

"I think," returned she, composedly, and not desisting her work, "that at present I will not. But keep it."

He thought it over, as he stood smoking by the door, and over and over again. A mere trifle could have induced him to destroy the paper, and the consequences that depended on it; but, in the indecision of the moment, he let it remain.

Customers coming in and going out, during the afternoon, and early evening, brought various topics of conversation up, but none directly bearing on the one interest. Business being over for the night, and the shop closed, Defarge asked his wife, as they went upstairs:

"What do you think, my dear, now?"

"I think," she replied, "that I will not think at present. I will consider tomorrow."

In the morning, her husband, who was always out early, before she was stirring, came down to her room above, and said:

"What do you think, my dear, now?"

"I think," she replied, "that I am not sure, as yet, that it is good for our safety that the wife of Defarge should be confounded with the prisoners in the Conciergerie and the other prisons. Therefore, I will not think just now."

"You will not denounce tomorrow, then?"

"Certainly not."

He was surprised, but only said:

"Shall I denounce?"

"Do as you please. It is indifferent."

"Then, my dear," said he, "I will do nothing in the matter. I will keep the paper in my pocket, and burn it by degrees. Destroy it yourself, if you change your mind."

"Good," said she.

Thus, the matter rested between them. He remained in doubt, and she remained firm. Her sense that it was dangerous to the safety of herself and husband that Mr. Barsad should be seen coming out of their wine shop was undiminished. Such a visit might be paid on the next day, or the day after that, without any thing more suspicious happening to refresh Madame Defarge's memory. But, as she thought that over, she recalled that a spy would be likely to report, not only what he had seen, but what he had not seen, and what he had expected to see. This grave consideration settled the matter. She would keep the paper.

LITERARY.

We mentioned some time ago that J. Hammond Trumbull, Esq., of Hartford, was engaged in preparing a third volume of COLONIAL RECORDS OF CONNECTICUT. It is now before us, containing a transcript of the records from 1678 to 1689, with interesting historical and family documents by way of Appendix, forming an elegant octavo, in accordance with the previous issues of the same records. Mr. Trumbull is one of the most accomplished historical scholars in America. He has been for many years devoted, as a labor of love, to investigations among the old records and manuscripts of the New England public offices and private houses contain, and especially those in the Archives Department of Connecticut. The colonial records which are there preserved are in a manuscript illegible to any living person but Mr. Trumbull. He has spent not some he gave fac-similes of these, which served to show the method of transcribing and printing them. He has now given three volumes to the public; and we repeat what we said before—that every man of Connecticut should buy these interesting volumes, and transmit them to his children. Here are records that are to be continued. They are not the story of hardship or of faith, told by enduring biographers, or by posterity seeking to interpret the spirit of the colonists. They are not the journals of the men of the seventeenth century of whose recorded constitutions and laws we are so accustomed to regard with veneration—that inhors, trials, trouble, and peace, even unto death, and then the record of their descendants, and documents which they left to their children—eloquent over the long years of civil and social progress.

Mr. Trumbull's three volumes include the records of Connecticut colony from 1636 to 1689. His labor would not be less if the records were comparatively valueless, and add greatly to the importance of the work. To those of our readers who are interested in historical studies we need not specially recommend these volumes, for to such the editor's name and labors are well known. We are almost largely increased the debt of gratitude which the public owe him.

The author of "Allen Prescott" and "Alida" is too well known to need praise. WALTER THORNBURY, in the Cornhill Mag. Past, is another writer pen, most gracefully dedicated to her grandmother, is a tribute of a tenderness and purity rare indeed. Quiet, gentle, and yet full of life and spirit as a story, it will prove the agreeable companion of a travel and all who love a pleasant book to read. The scene of the story is in New England, in the latter part of the last century. The characters are our fathers and mothers, who come of that stock, when they were younger. The movement of the drama is that of the every-day life, with no incidents but such as speaks to the heart of the reader. Few records are so faithful to domestic history as these. The volume is one of the most readable from the press of Harper & Brothers this spring or summer.

The Rev. Dr. Cheever's new publication is a book which is as unexpected as would be the resurrection of some one in the tomb. We say this unsalm covers thinking to find a book of this year of our Lord 1859, by some modern book-maker; and to be cold and commonplace, as a matter of course staves on us from the frontispiece, and the title-page introduces us to his Grace the Archbishop and Duke of Christ. Every one knows the book; every one loves it who loves the memory of the good Bishop Ken—every one but the Pope, who has recently welcome from the religious public of all important denominations, with the single exception of the Pope, who has given a new edition of such sound old orthodoxy, and such quaint and delicious reading.

Charles Lanman's Private Life of Webster, abridged from his large work on the English language, and published by Harper & Brothers, is a new and an eminent treatise of the day. His ability to prepare a book like this we have before to us well known, and not to be doubted. A good grammar is a much desired book. This is the work of a master hand, one who writes as a scholar thoroughly convinced of his complete mastership over his subject, and the result demands and will command the admiration of teachers.

The genius of chess has attracted more attention of late than in many years before. Morphy's brilliant success has made it the subject of conversation in all the social circles. There are numerous books which this publication has brought out, we have seen none more striking and worthy attention than Mr. Morse's SCIENCE AND ART OF CHESS, published by Scribner. It is a simple and very clear account of the game. Its instructions are intelligible to a child, while they indicate an analytical power in the mind of the author which will commend his work to old and experienced players. The book contains a large number of interesting games, given by way of illustration, two of which are of great celebrity among lovers of chess.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

MR. BUCHANAN NOT A CANDIDATE FOR RE-ELECTION.

The subjoined letter from President Buchanan has been received by the Hon. James M'Calmont:

"SPECIAL DISPATCH, July 31, 1859.

"MY DEAR SIR.—I have received your kind note of the 25th inst., together with the leader from the Post. While I appreciate, as I ought, the friendly spirit displayed in that editorial, I yet regret that it has been published. My determination not, under any circumstance, to become a candidate for re-election is final and conclusive, and I have expressed that sentiment often unto in favor of this course. To cut doubts upon this subject forever, I have written a letter to-day to the editor of the Pennsylvanian, which will appear in that paper in a few days. I am, dear sir, yours truly,

"JAMES BUCHANAN."

A LETTER FROM GOVERNOR WISE.

The following letter, purporting to come from Governor Wise, has been published in the Enquirer:

"RICHMOND, July 31, 1859.

"DEAR SIR.—I thank you for yours of the 25th inst. I have apprehended all along that the Testimony Report would be used for party purposes. I will not be a candidate for the Presidency. I am a Democrat, and will support the nominee, and will not be a candidate for any other office. I am not a Democrat because I am a Southern man, but I am a Southern man because I am a Democrat. I have always been a Democrat, and intend to be a Democrat to the end. I have been a Democrat from principles, and ran the election into the House. Then, alone, was I a candidate. I am not a candidate now. I am a Democrat, and will support the nominee. I am a Democrat, and will support the nominee. I am a Democrat, and will support the nominee

We are assured that a paragraph copied by us from an exchange, in reference to the recent execution of a negro in Georgia, for murder, was not correct. A correspondent gives the following details of the case, which he says he has from reliable authority:

"John Cobb was hung on the 8th day of July for murdering an old man by the name of Lindrum, an honest cattle dealer. He was a free negro, possessed of a farm given by his father, who was a member of the Legislature of Georgia, and a man of wealth. He was a mulatto, and had just sold a drove of cattle. Cockett entered the house, and, with the aid of Cobb, the old man was in still in jail awaiting his trial, as he has convicted and is undergoing his new sentence. Cobb was executed last year, but delayed his execution by carrying the case to the Supreme Court. He was defended by Governor Ellis in Georgia, one of the ablest lawyers in the State, and now Governor, and by other lawyers, but failing to do this they had to pay the penalty. Cockett is now in jail, and will be tried at the next term of the Superior Court."

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE LATE WAR.

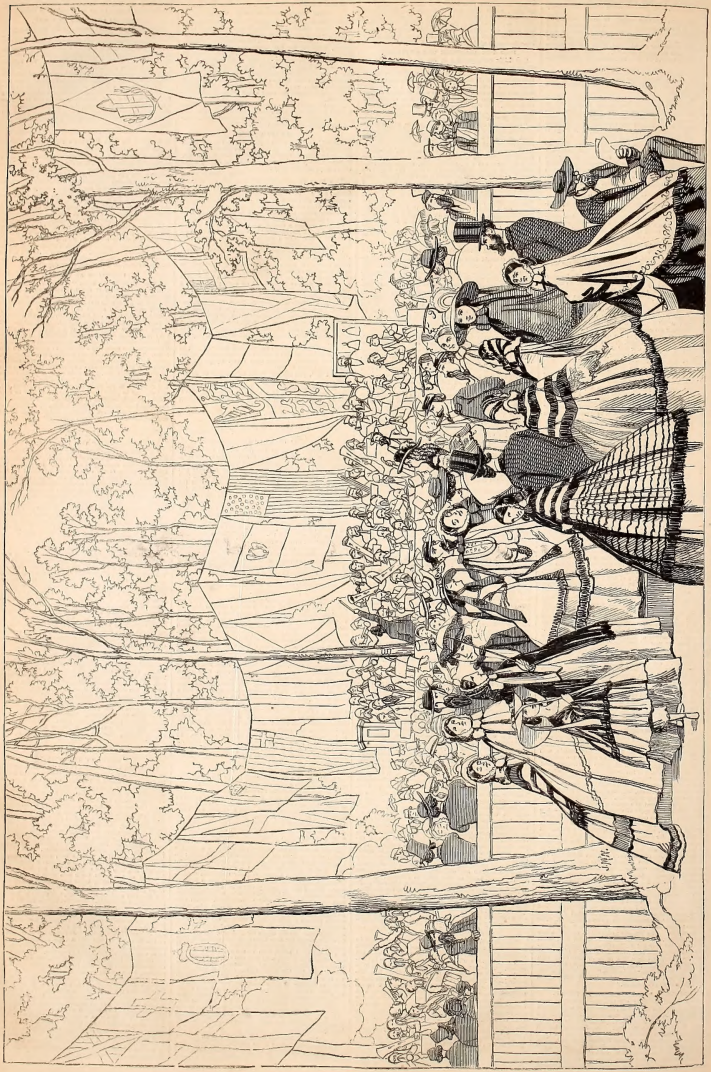
THE MEETING OF THE EMPERORS.

A letter from Villafranca, of the 12th, contains some interesting particulars concerning the interview between the two Emperors:

"The meeting of the two sovereigns was fixed for nine o'clock. At a quarter of an hour before that time, I arrived at the spot, and he came before the time in order that he might go on a tour of inspection among the advance of Austria. Francis-Joseph soon made his appearance, accompanied by his staff, and followed by a numerous escort. As soon as he saw him, and knew that the moment was the two parties had come near, the escorts stopped short, and the Emperors advanced alone to the spot on the road equal space. The aspect of the Emperor Napoleon was composed of Marshal Vaillant, Count Walewski, Count Fleury, the officers of the Imperial household, and of his staff, and of a portion of the escort of honor. The rest of the Guides, all in their splendid, full-dress uniforms. His Majesty rode a fine bay charger, which he has used since the commencement of the campaign. He wore the undress uniform of a General of Division, in which he kept. The Emperor of Austria also wore an undress uniform, and his staff were in the same dress. He is not, by-the-by, a handsome man, and appears to be rather old for his age. He is 47, I believe. It is said that he was struck with the martial bearing of the French troops, and that in presence of the Corn Guides and the Guides for Austrian body-guard and the Chasseurs did not appear to advantage. On the two sovereigns meeting in the mid-space they exchanged salutations with their swords. The Emperor of Austria appeared pleased with the cordial welcome and quick manner of the French sovereign. The two Emperors remained for a moment alone in the middle of the road and afterwards shook hands. They then reciprocally presented the officers of their staffs. And the moment after the two sovereigns and their escorts rode, and Marshal Vaillant was seen in conversation with Baron de Hess.

THE CONVERSATION AT VILLAFRANCA.

"Napoleon III. and Francis-Joseph, on meeting each other moved side by side toward Villafranca, the Czar Guards giving the precedence to the Austrian Guards, as was due to the way, but the Guides passing before the Uhlans. At Villafranca, the houses of which had been prepared at the principal street of the town, had been prepared to receive the two sovereigns, and the inhabitants of the town passed a night there before the battle of Solferino. It is said that Napoleon III. had given the strictest orders that for any extraordinary attack upon the Austrian lines, all arts were given, and the walls painted in distemper. There were several acres of the Emperor's palace in the ten-cloair. In the centre was an oblong table covered with a green cloth, and in the middle was a vase filled with painted flowers, which quite perfumed the room. It was there that for upward of two hours the two Emperors were seated discussing the highest interests, and without any one being present. It is said that the delicacy the King of Piedmont was not invited to the conference. While the interview was going on in the house in the street, whereat I could see the guards, some Austrian officers were walking about with the French officers. It was there that the first conversation of any kind of conversation was suspended; all seemed dominated involuntarily by a certain solemnity, owing to the importance of the incidental which was passing. As to that took place between the two sovereigns, it is not known is that when the two sovereigns issued forth from the conference they parted with the greatest cordiality. The bond of friendship was then established between them. The



THE "BATTLE OF MAGENTA" AT JONES'S WOOD, NEW YORK.

THE WHITE MOUNTAINS—THE RIDE.

THE WHITE MOUNTAINS—ALL ABOARD!

THE "BATTLE OF MAGENTA" AT JONES'S WOOD.

We engrave on page 529 a scene at a recent musical festival at Jones's Wood, in the city of New York. The moment selected by the artist for illustration was the performance of a piece entitled the "Battle of Magenta," which was thus described in the programme:

"It is midnight—the allied armies are brounded on the battle-field—while by the distant watch-fires the serpents eagerly seek to penetrate the veil of night which surrounds them; the bell tolls the midnight hour, and the weary soldier, who may never sleep again, seeks in dreamy forgetfulness a brief respite from his cares—he dreams of home, the cottage by the mountain side, the pleasant evening and the kind friend. Hush! in the distance what means that hoarse and distant murmur which disturbs the quiet of the night? Was it the approaching shots and the far-off booming of artillery. It is a midnight reconnoissance—the enemy is near! The drum beats the rappel, the bugle sounds, the shrill trumpet brays forth its wild alarum, and in a moment the camp is broken up, and each man clutches his weapon and feverishly awaits the coming and inevitable struggle. The allies form their battle lines; but there is a momentary pause, as the waving plumes, falling on their knees in prayer seek aid and comfort of the 'God of battles,' on whose alone depends the victory. Again the sound rolling of the drums, the crashing of the artillery, and the sharp crack of rifle shot are heard on the outposts. French allies advance in battle-array to meet the enemy. The contest now becomes fast and furious; each foot of ground is fiercely contested, as the deadly struggle is obstinately continued; but a panic seized the Austrian army, and, losing heart, they fled in confusion, leaving the field dead and dying of both armies encumber the ground, and mar accidents are the order of the day. The victorious hosts of the allied regiments now unite in the march of victory to the encampment, and the night is spent in singing of bills, the firing of cannon, and the general rejoicings of the people, whose liberties have been thus saved to them and Austrian yoke."

The Herald reporter thus described the scene depicted by our artist:

"The platform for the musicians was located on a wooded hillside at the west end of the Music Hall, having built around the trees, which seemed to spring up like gigantic trunks for supporting immense canopies, leaves of bright and leaves. There were gay festoons, engaged of the flags of all nations, ornamenting the platform, and waving picturesquely among the foliage. On each end of the platform was placed a large transparency, one of which represented the Austrian army in full retreat, with its baggage, artillery and ammunition wagons, and the whole group of soldiers in its character; although the Austrian army predominated, there were Irish, Highlanders, Frenchmen, Italians, and perhaps a dozen other nationalities fully represented.

"The main entrance from the landward was besieged by an immense throng, which kept the gate-keepers constantly busy selling tickets at a quarter a piece and collecting them again."

A COMMON CASE.

It was scarce five minutes since I had left my friends. It had been a pleasant evening, and I was in a pleasant mood as I came down one of the Avenues on my way home. The time was after midnight, and the streets were almost deserted. I was not hurrying. Rather on a saunter, I may say, with nothing else to allow a hope to start from a stoop where it had been crouching, and let my progress.

"Gentleman, will you please give me enough to buy something to eat?"

I could look at her there now as it stood full in the gas-light. It was a woman, covered with rags and squalor, blasted and homeless. I could see, as far as the twilight and levity of appearance of her face would allow me, that she was still young, not over thirty at most, and had once been handsome. I said,

"You do want money to buy something to eat?"

"I am hungry," she answered, doggedly.

"If I give you money you will spend it in liquor."

She turned partially away, as though about leaving me, and then, perhaps moved by my kind regard toward my pocket, she came back.

"You are only like the rest. Why must I tell you that I am hungry, and repeat it, when I am really starving? If you doubt me, why not go where you can see me feed, and satisfy yourself? Will you see me starve here in the streets, and feel contempt toward me for your supposition answer that you are afraid I will spend it in liquor?"

There was something in the woman's speech that told me she was not a drunkard. I had good position. Before I could answer she said again,

"I am hungry. How many more times shall I say it to convince you? And yet, perhaps, if you were to give me money, I should spend it in liquor. I have no power to resist the temptation, but bring forgetfulness. Give me something to eat, and keep your money."

I had the coin in my hand, but I could not give it after such a declaration. What could I do? I could not leave the woman to starve in the street. It was not so late but a light was shining from a distant cellar. Here I could see that there was a restaurant. I think she saw the direction of my eyes, for she said,

"You'll never miss a shilling or so, Sir, spent in that place. I am very hungry."

There was something terrible in the reiteration of these words, and I was anxious at once to cause their cessation by showing her that she should have what she asked for.

How voraciously she ate! She spoke truly when she said she was hungry. I stood looking at the woman from a speculating curiosity, and wondered and wandered back through her life, that I might, from any conceivable sequence of causes, bring her to her present degradation. It is a hard road upon which to build fiction. The stern facts of a career ending as hers had ended were almost beyond invention. She was eating rapidly, and crying, wiping her eyes with the back of the hand which conveyed the food to her mouth. There was no doubt she had once been handsome. Though the eyes were bleared and bloodshot, they still showed that they had once full and blue. I could at least allow my imagination this rein: that she who now seemed so utterly lost to the attributes of a woman was once accomplished and beautiful.

"Were you ever jealous?" These words came forth with a sudden burst of tears, and were the first she had spoken since she commenced to eat; and I was not sitting an answer at once, and so "To be jealous is to be possessed by a devil. No! you have never been jealous, or you would not ask me why I sought my dead at me while I speak the name of this fiend. You would spit and curse at me as some if you had ever felt his power.

I said something commonplace in admission of the truth of what she was saying.

"Why was this terrible curse been sent upon earth?" she questioned, looking at me with a wild look, as though expecting me to answer. "Why was it sent upon me?"

"Were you loved? Know it, feel it, do not trifle with so great a treasure, give no cause for the curse to come to her you love, and give it no encouragement when it comes."

She loosed her hands upon the table, and pressed her head between them again. I arose to go, speaking, as I did so, a few of those stereotyped words we so freely administer both for consolation and advice. She shuffled up her chair hastily, and said, hurriedly,

"Stay, stay, and go. I do not find sympathy, and said so often that I can solve it to give up, unthanked. I can do you no service in return, but if I can warn you of the danger, I will do that. I may tell you how the wretched woman you see before you came to be so.

I had little wish to stay for the tale. I felt that the woman before me was too far gone to rescue. But anything, whatever it might be, at a sacrifice was worth my while to do. I seated myself in my former place, and I seated myself in my former place, and I seated myself in my former place, and me a partner in his crime? And then I would never have betrayed him. I would have given him up to beggary, and when he was penniless taken him to my heart and given him all.

"But he was in prison. I had wealth; it should release him. Wealth was omnipotent; it should make the way for reparation I could make; it should fill up his. With this I flew to the place. What! he will not see me! He must. I am his wife. He will not see me. I should not be admitted to his cell. He knew all!—he knew of my betrayal. He would not see me. I was his wife! I had power, and would send none. He would receive no aid from me. Oh, it was too terrible! All others he would see and take aid from, myself, I sought by all means to reach him without effect. Oh, that terrible day! I sat crouching feet into night when a summons came again to the door-bell, and a lady was shown into the parlor. At her entrance my blood turned cold in my veins. What could a woman want here at such a time, asking for Mr. Sullivan? It was a lady, and I was she was closely veiled upon entering. She advanced quickly to where I stood, holding out her hand and throwing back her veil. She was pale.

"Who could smile at such a time?

"'I am Mr. Sullivan's sister,' she said to his wife, 'I presume, whom I have never seen?'

"How I sprang toward her, and then how quickly I repulsed her! Oh Bess, what I thought that I had found a meditator with him whom I had betrayed; that here, when he was deserted by all save his sister, and perhaps knew not of what had passed, or my agency in it. How she, too, would hate me when she knew all! But she should not see it. And then I told her of her brother's situation. She had heard nothing. She had left Europe when she arrived in town, and hastened directly to his house. Again to her ears I poured out all my story. I cursed myself, and prayed to her to aid me in my forgiveness for herself and meditation with her brother. She listened like one in a dream, and told me note that had first aroused my passion. There was a horrible chill in her voice, but I placed the note in her hands. She had scarcely looked at it when she said,

"'It is my own note, in which I bade him meet me yesterday at the boat. I was too late; and did not meet him according to my appointment.'

"One more blow! Yet I was not dismayed still lower.

"I could not ask or expect that Miss Shelton should treat me otherwise; but there was something in this quiet, stately woman's manner that made me doubly feel my crime—humiliate me much more—than all the harsh words and passionate reproaches that could have found vent in words.

"What more? Another long, and to tell, tedious man in black was ushered into the room. I had no power to speak. I knew that something terrible was coming, though I could not conceive then what had already passed? I felt a cold icicle was creeping about my heart, and I prayed that it might be dead when coming. No. Not that it was such mercy for me. I heard the man say, as I sat there frozen and stiff, 'Mr. Sullivan's compliments,' and his voice seemed to come from some far distance, and to sound as though uttered by some horrible mechanism, as the man in black

"'Mr. Guy Shelton is dead. He died by his own hand, almost as he left you. He left a note with reference to the disposal of the body when the inquest is concluded.'

"I did not faint or become insensible. I would that I had, or from that moment a raving maniac. I was denied even this relief. And a helpless paralytic for three years from that day I was carried from my bed to a chair. I saw and heard all that passed about me, but I could make no sign that I spoke no word. I knew that the body of my husband was brought to the house, that the property—as some part of the eager, gossiping crowd who came to the funeral from curiosity, and who stopped to pass for a few moments at the window of the room, could hear the remarks of the hireling nurses, who canvassed the whole matter—was divided, and about how long they thought I would live. I could know all about the strict-dealing business men who, upon the day of my husband's death, set to sign something to secure them against loss, and who now were taking their claims from the property—ay, every dollar—to pay for the signing of that paper. It was legal and just; no doubt it was so. The honorable gentlemen who assisted him in his affairs to insure, numberless times. Three years I listened to all this, and then I died—remained in my own house, no longer mine, to the county poor-house. A year ago I was discharged, cured they said, and knew that none I have quietly awaited death. It must come soon. Do you think he will forgive me, if we meet in the great hereafter?"

"Now I have told my story. You can do nothing for me. My hunger is satisfied. I will only ask one thing. If some one wholly appeals to you for a mouthful of food, give it. It is a terrible thing to starve to death. Give it, even though it be A Common Cake."

A Good Fight.

CHAPTER VII.

"Look into your desk and write!" said Herr Cast; and earth's cuckoos echoed the cry. Look into the Rhine where it is deepest, and the Thames where it is thickest, and paint the bottom. Lower a bucket into a well of self-deception, and what comes up must be immortal truth, mustn't it? Now, in the first place no son of Adam ever reads his own heart at all, except by the habit acquired and the light gained from some years' perusal of other hearts; and even then, with his acquired sagacity and reflected light, he can but spell and decipher his own heart, not read it fluently. Gerard was a young man that had studied no philosophering to lead him into shallow water. Half way to Sevenbergen he looked into his own heart and asked it why he was going to Sevenbergen. His heart replied without a moment's hesitation. We are going out of town precisely, to know why she lifted us, and to show her it has not broken our hearts, and that we are quite content with our homes and our beauties in property, and don't want her or any of her cliche sex.

He rose directly, and went to Sevenbergen; and there sat a girl in the door-way, plying her needle, and a stalwart figure leaned on a long bow and talked to her. A very pretty, unsophisticated pair at the sight of him. However, the man turned out to be only a gay young fellow to whom Gerard remembered to have seen short at the butts with admirable force and skill. Another animated talk ensued, and then Gerard, who, guest looked up and dropped her work, and uttered a faint cry, and then a gentle sigh, and then the thews and sinews of emotion were swiftly dismissed, and she turned far more cold and indifferent than she would if she had seen a stranger.

"What! is it you, Master Gerard? What on earth brings you to this out-of-the-way place?"

"I was passing by and saw you; so I thought I would give you good-day, and ask after your father."

"My father is well. He will be here anon."

"Then I must stay till he comes."

"As you will. Good Martin, step into the village and tell my father here is a friend of his."

"And mine."

"My father's friends are mine."

"That's doubtful. It was not like a friend to promise to visit for me, and then make off the moment my back was turned. Cruel Margaret! you little know how I searched the town for you—how for want of you nothing was pleasant to me."

"Then one thing is clear. You neglected my father's company, or mine, you would have come back. There I had a bed tied for you, Sir, at my service, and he would have made you one of us, and, who knows, I might have made much of you for a day. Now you are gone, I fear me I will not catch me in the same mind again, neither you nor any young man, I warrant me."

"Margaret, for the moment the counters lets me go; but you were not there."

"Nay, nay, I was not there, but Lisa Cloter, man at our table; we left him to bring you on."

"I owe no one there, but only a drunken man and a boy! Margaret, you know that!"

"At our table? How was he clad?"

"Nay, I know nothing; in and around garb."

At this Margaret's face gradually lighted with a mixture of archness and happiness; then assuming ostensibly and with effort a look of severe cross-questions, all of which Gerard answered most loyally. Finally, with her own hand, Margaret pressed how the misunderstanding had come about. Then came a revelation of tenderness, all the more power, that they had been separated by a cloud, and then more dangerous still, come mutual confessions. Gerard, who had come to Sevenbergen to woo and would have been happy but for this fortunate meeting.

And Gerard found a M.S. Vulgate lying open on the table, and pounced upon it like a hawk. "Ah, were his delight; but before he could get to it two rules hastily scrawled on that open page, and a rod face confronted him.

"Nay, take away your books, Margaret, that I may see where you are reading, and I will return them to at home; so shall my soul meet yours in the sacred pages. You will have it so, Margaret, I must kiss them away." And he kissed them so often, that for very shame they were fain to withdraw, and, in a few minutes, Gerard was as open as

CHAPTER VIII.

An apple of gold in a net-work of silver.

"There, now," said she, "I had been hunting for it ever so long, and found it but even now—and to be caught in the act!" And with a mischievous air she pointed it out to Gerard with her white finger.

"Ay," said he, "but to-day it is all hidden in that great book."

"It is a cowley cap, I'm told by some."

"May be it was, but it is hidden beautiful."

"It is not: it is hideous."

"Well, it was beautiful at Amsterdam."

"Ay, every thing was beautiful that day."

And now Peter came in, and welcomed Gerard cordially, and invited him to stay all night. And Margaret disappeared; and Gerard had a nice learned chat with Peter; and Margaret reappeared and made ice in her self-assured way, a glass half arch half coy, and she glided about them, and spread supper, and beamed bright with gayety and happiness. And in the cool evening Gerard coaxed her out, and coaxed her on to the road to Tergou, and there he parted with her and down, back to it, and when he must go they pleaded each other's errors to gain a moment's pardon, and were pardoned again; and they sealed the promise with a long loving kiss, and Gerard went home on wings.

From that day Gerard spent most of his evenings with Margaret, and his business matters were deepened on both sides till the hours they spent together were the hours they lived; the rest they counted and underwent. And at the outset of this deep attachment all went smoothly; obstacles there were, but Gerard dozed and slumbered with the eyes of hope, youth, and love. The feelings and passions of so many persons that this attachment could thwart gave no warning premonition of their volcanic nature and power. The course of true love ran smoothly, placidly, until it had drawn these two young hearts into its current forever, and then—

CHAPTER VIII.

One bright morning unusual velvet shone, unwonted feathers waved, and horses' hoofs glinted and rang through the streets of Tergou, and the windows and balconies were studded with wondering faces. The French embassador was riding through to spend in the neighboring Brussels.

Besides his own suite he was attended by several servants of the Duke of Burgundy, lent to do him honor and minister to his pleasure. The duke's humbler robe before him with a grave, sedate majesty that seemed his more noble companions were light, frivolous parsons. But ever and anon, when respect and awe neared the oppressive, he rolled off his horse so lgoosily and faunily that even the embassador was fain to burst out laughing. Then he was closeted with the burgomaster, a very representative of merits, and so he played his part. Toward the tail of the pageant rode one that excited more attention still than the duke's people. A gentleman mounted on a Flemish horse of prodigious size and power carried very fine fathom of a man. Huge loins by straps curiously contrived, and on this box sat a huge leopard crouching. He was chained to the horse's neck. The people shrank from his glare, hids and spots, and pressed near, and one or more forthwith, and pointed to the leopard, when the huntsman shouted in a terrible voice, "Beware!" At Antwerp one did but throw a handful of dust in her, and the duke made that of him.

"Gramercy!"

"I speak sooth. The good duke shut him up in prison, in a cell under ground, and the rats cleaned the flesh off his bones in a night. Served him right for bringing the poor to shame. There was a murmur of fear, and the Turgovians shrank from tackling the leopard of such a master.

But an incident followed that raised their spirits again. The duke's giant, a Hungarian seven feet four inches high, brought up the rear. This circumstance creature had, like some other giants, a treble, high voice of boyish power. It was not like a fellow, and not conscious of this or any defect. Now it happened that the giant, in his usual lolling on the side of the balcony; so he stopped and began to make fun of him.

"Hallo! brother!" squeaked he, "I had nearly passed without seeing thee."

"Is the giant fain enough to see," believed Giles, in his sass tones.

"Come on my shoulder, brother," squeaked Titus, and held out a shoulder of proportions list to help him down.

"If I do I'll cut off your ears," roared the dwarf.

The giant saw the homuncule was irascible, and played upon him, being encouraged thereto by the shouts of laughter. He did not see that the people were laughing not at his wit, but at the ridiculous discrepancy of his own voice—the gigantic feeble life, and the petty, deep, loud drum, the monstrous delivered of a squeak and the male-bill belching blunder.

The singular duet came to as singular an end. Giles lost all patience, and, without warning, or giving a creature devoid of fear, and in a rage to boot, he actually dropped upon the giant's neck, seized his head with one hand, and battered his head with the other. The giant's first impulse was to lay down the weight and captivity of the blows specially corrected that inclination.

"He! he! ah! ha! hallo! oh! he! Help! help! Lord! help me! I must kill him or he will! I can't! O Lord! I'll split your skull against the wall!" and a wild rush was made toward the balcony. Giles saw his danger, seized the balcony in time with both hands, and whipped over it just as the giant's head came through it with a stunning crack. The people roared with laughter and exclaimed at the address of first the one and then the other. The indignant giant seized two of the laughers, knocked them together like dumb-bells, shook them, and cursed them flat Gilles's assistance, and threw her apron over Giles, then strode wrathfully away after the party. This incident had consequences no one then present foresaw: it made Mr. Giles a companion of princes. Its immediate result was agreeable. The burgomaster turned proud of him, and after this intoned with a warm affability that he prayed for permission. Giles drove a regular trade with his brother Gerard in this article. That is to say, he went about and begged it gratis, and Gerard gave him copyers for it.

On the afternoon of the same day Catherine and her daughter were chatting together about their favorite theme—Gerard, his graceful, handsome, and the brightened prospects of the whole family.

Their gentle talk had come to them at a point where they would have chosen; besides the advantages of a benefice such as the Countess Chalcote would obtain to give, there was the feminine delight at having a priest, a holy man, in their own house. They will marry Gerard, and Sylvandt: for they can marry (good housewives), now, if they will." Gerard will take care of you and Giles when we are gone. Now, Catherine, we can confess to him instead of to a stranger," said Kate.

"Ay, girl! and he can give the sacred oil to your father and me, and close our eyes, when our time comes!"

"Oh, mother! not for many, many years, I do hope likewise. You pray for that; I am sure my wakes me sad. I hope I shall go before you, mother dear. No! let us be gay to-day. I am out of spirits—quite out of all spirits. It does seem so strange; and I feel so bright and happy. Mother, can you keep a secret from me?"

Nobody better, child." Why, you know I can."

"Then I will show you something so beautiful. You never saw the like, I trow. Only Gerard must never know; for I am sure he means to surprise us with it, he covers it up so, and sometimes he carries it away altogether."

Kate took her crutches and moved slowly away, leaving her mother in an exalted state of curiosity. She soon returned with something in a cloth, uncovered it, and there was a lovely picture of the Virgin, with all her insignia, and wearing her stars over a wealth of beautiful hair, which flowed loose over her shoulders. Catherine, at first, was struck with awe.

"It is herself!" she cried; "it is the Queen of Heaven! I never saw one like her to my mind before."

"And her eyes, mother! lifted to heaven, as if they belonged there, and not to a mortal creature. And her beautiful hair of burning gold!"

"And is it true that I have a son that can make the saints live again upon a piece of wood?"

"The reason is, he is a young saint himself, mother. He is too good for this world; he is here to portray the blessed, and then to go away and be with them forever."

Ere they had half done admiring it a strange voice was heard at the door. By one of the fortunate chances that Christ sets from time to time in the cloth, though there was no need. And the next moment the door was flung open violently around, a man that had not entered the house this ten years—Glyscrecht van Swieten.

The two women were so taken by surprise that they merely stared at him and at one another, and only "That Burgomaster" was quick and impressive that Glyscrecht felt compelled to answer it.

"Yes! I own the last time I came here was not as a friendly errand. Now here their own interests—Gerard and mine—are concerned. Well! let this visit atone the last. To-day I come on your business, and none of mine." Catherine and her daughter exchanged a swift glance of contemptuous incredulity. They knew the man better than he thought. "It is about your son Gerard."

"Ay! ay! you want him to work for the town of Sevenbergen for a little while."

"I come on no such errand. It is to let you know that Gerard and I are at war."

"Now Heaven and the saints forbid! Man, before not a mother! Speak out, and quickly! speak ere you have time to think! Speak, and let us know you."

Glyscrecht turned pale at this affront, and spoke mingled with the other motives that brought him here.

"Thus it is, then," said he, grinding his teeth, and speaking very fast. "Your son Gerard is bent like to be the father of a bastard by a priest: he is forever with Margaret, Peter Brandt's redhaired girl, and loves her like a cow her calf."

Mother and daughter both burst out laughing. Glyscrecht stared at them.

"What, you know it?"

"Carry this tale to those who know not my son Gerard. Women are naught to him."

"Other women are naught. But this one is the apple of his eye to him, or will be, if you part them any more. Ah! you have come to make me waste time and friendly counsel: my servant has been three hours at some times, bandied and reading babies in one another's arms, and—and—and—you have been young too."

"Ah, Sir! I am ill at ease. I have been young, and know how blind and foolish the young are. My heart," I have been sick on it a moment. Oh, Kate, if it should be true!"

"No, no!" cried Kate, eagerly. "Gerard might love a pretty girl—I don't say he might not—I can't think what they see in them to love so: but if he did he would let us know it, and would not deceive us. You wicked man, you will kill me with her. No, dear mother, don't look so!. Gerard is good to his mother as creation of God. He is in love for Our Lady and the saints. Ah! I will show you the picture. Come, Sir, and you can see carefully how he paint the Queen of Heaven like that!—look! look!" and she held the picture out triumphantly, and more radiant and beautiful in this moment of enthusiasm than ever dead picture was or will be, overpowered the burgomaster with her eloquence and her feminine proof of Gerard's purity. His eyes and mouth opened, and remained open in much what the same kind of way, and he, all as a pivot, from the picture to the women, and from the women to the picture.

"Why, it is herself?" he gasped.

"Don't it?" cried Kate, and her hostility was softened. "I forgive you for frightening us."

"Am I in a mad-house?" said Glyscrecht van Swieten, thoroughly puzzled. "You show me a picture of the girl, and you say he painted it; and that is a picture of a saint, and you say it is they, all paint their sweet-hearts, painters do."

"Sweet-hearts!" cried mother and Kate, shocked. "Fie! this is not a girl; this is the Virgin Mary."

"No; no, it is Margaret Brandt."

"Oh, blind! It is the Queen of Heaven."

"Not only of Sevenbergen village."

"Profane man! behold her crown!"

"Silly child! look at her red hair! Would the Virgin be seen with red hair? But who had the pick of all the colors ten thousand years before the world began?"

At this moment an anxious face was insinuated round the edge of the open door: it was their neighbor Peter Dayshen.

"What is to do?" said he, in a cautious whisper, in the Burgomaster blackening my Gerard."

"Stop!" cried Van Swieten. "Peter Dayshen can be a witness to the matter. He knows Peter and daughter both; they cured him of the colic. Here, Peter, who is that?" Now as others, women, for one moment, I see him. Who is that?"

Peter gave a start. "Well, to be sure!" was all he replied.

"Who is it?" repeated Glyscrecht, impetuously.

Peter Dayshen smiled. "Why, you know as well as I do. But what have they put a crown on her for? I never saw her in a crown, for my part."

"Man alive! Can't you open your great jaws and just speak a wench's name, to oblige three people?"

"I'd do a great deal more to oblige one of you

The old couple walked hand in hand; for, strange as it may appear to some of my readers, the uses of the elbow to couples walking was never discovered in Europe till centuries after this. They walked a long time in silence. The night was clear and balmy. Such nights, calm and silent, recall the past from the dead.

"It is a many years since we walked so late, my man," said Catherine, softly.

"Ay, sweet-heart, more than we shall see again. (Is he never coming, I wonder?)

"Not since our courting days, Gerard."

"No. Ay, you were a buxom lass then."

"And you were a comely lad, or ever a girl's eye stole a look at. I do suppose Gerard is with her now, as he used to be with me. Nature is strong, and the stone in all our generations."

"Nay, I hope he has left her by now, robbed her, or we shall be here all night."

"Gerard!"

"Well?"

"I have been happy with you, sweet-heart, for all our rules—much happier, I trow, than if I had—ben—a—a—nun. You won't speak harshly to the poor child. One can be firm without being harsh."

"Surely."

"Have you been happy with me, my poor Gerard?"

"Why, you know I have. Friends I have known, but none like you. Buss me, wife!"

"A heart to share joy and grief with is a great comfort to man or woman. Isn't it?"

"It is so, my lass.

"It doth joy double,
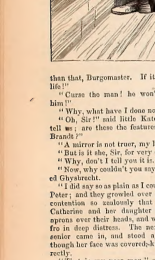
And death trouble," runs the by-word. Ah! here comes the young fool."

Catherine trembled and held her husband's hand tight. The moon was bright, but they were in the shadow of some trees, and their son did not see them. He came singing in the moonlight, and his face shining.



"What can I do?"

"It is Thursday; it is your day to shoot—sooth to say, I counted on you to-day."

"Nay," said the lad, "I may not shoot when the duke or his friends are at the chase; read else. I am no techster." And he took out of his pouch a parchment with a great seal on it. It purported to be a stipend and a license given by Philip Duke of Burgundy to M. N., one of his archers, in consideration for services in the wars, and for a wound received at the Duke's side. The stipend was four marks yearly to be paid by the Duke's treasurer, and the license was to shoot three arrows once a week, viz., on Thursday and on other days, in the parks of Duke's forests in Holland, at any game but a seven year old hart. No one carrying the bow, except that the Duke should not be hunting on that day, or any of his friends. In this case Martin was not to go and disturb the sport, on peril of his salary and head, etc.

Margaret sighed and was silent.

"Come, cheer up, mistress," said he, "for your sake I'll peril my carcass; I have done that for many a one that was not worth a single thought. It is no such mighty risk either. I'll but step into the shirts of the forest, here. It is odds, but they drive a hare or a fawn within reach of my arrow."

"Martin, if I let you go you must promise me not to go far, and not to be seen. Be quiet! Gerard sent sapphires than ill should come to you, faithful Martin!"

The required promise given, Martin took his bow and three arrows, and stole cautiously into the forest; it was once a furlong distant. The horses were heard faintly in the distance, and all the game was afoot. Cowp, thought Martin, I'll soon fell the pot, and no one be the wiser. He took his stand behind a thick oak that commanded a view of an open glade, and drew his bow—a very formidable weapon. It was of English yew, six feet two inches high, and thick in proportion. Martin, broad chested, with arms all iron and cord, and used to the bow from infancy, could draw a threefoot arrow to the head, and when it left the string could scarce follow it, and the bow-string twanged as musical as a harp. This bow had laid many a stout robber low in the wars of the Hooks and Cabbel-jaws. In those days a battle-field was not a cloud of smoke; the combatants were few, but the deaths many; for they saw what they were about, and fewer bloodless arrows flew than bloodless bullets now. This tremendous weapon Martin now leveled at a hare. Twang went the string, thus set sprightly, and her ears made a capital V,

The arrow flew, the string twanged: but Martin had been in a hurry to pot her, and lost her an inch: the arrow seemed to strike her, but it struck the ground close to her, and passed under her belly like a flash, and hissed along the short grass and disappeared. She jumped three feet perpendicular, and went away on the top of her speed. "Bungler!" said Martin. A sure proof he was not a habitual bungler, or he would have blamed the bow. He had scarcely fitted another arrow to his string when a wood-pigeon settled on the very tree he stood near. Alas! thought he, you are not so bold, dainty. This time he took more pains: drew his arrow carefully, and shot it smoothly, and saw, to all appearance, go clean through the bird, carrying feathers skyward like dust. Instead of falling at his feet, the bird, whose breast was torn, not fairly pierced, fluttered feebly away, and, by a great effort, cleared the trees, flew some fifty yards, and fell dead at last; but where he could not see for the thick foliage.

"Luck is against me," said he, despondently. But he fitted another arrow, and eyed the glade keenly. Presently he heard a gentle leveret bleat, and turned round just in time to see a noble buck cross the open, but too late to shoot at him. He dashed his bow down with an impreciation, but that moment a long, spotted animal glided swiftly across the door; its tail lay sternly on a level with the ground as it went. Martin took up his bow hastily—he recognized the duke's leopard. "The hunters will not be far from her," said he, "and I must not be seen."

He plunged into the wood, following the buck and leopard, for that was his way home. He had not gone far when he heard an unusual sound from the lower trees rustling violently, and the ground trampled. An experienced huntsman, he suspected the cause, and hurried in the direction. He found the leopard on the buck's back, tearing him with teeth and claw, and the buck running in circles and jumping convulsively, with the blood pouring down his hide. Then Martin framed a desperate resolution to have the venison for Margaret. He drew his arrow to the head, and buried it in the deer, who, spite of the creature on his back, bounded high into the air, with a loud shriek. The leopard went on tearing him as if nothing had happened.

Martin hoped that the creature would gorge itself with blood, and then let him take the venison. But in a few minutes, the buck reeled, tottered, fell up, and laid his head on the buck's leg. The leopard gave a frightful growl, and licked off some blood. He saw Martin's game, and was sulky and on his guard. What was to be done? Martin took a dead hare with creatures in it and stood the leopard went on tearing him as if nothing had happened.

Martin hoped that the creature would gorge itself with blood, and then let him take the venison. But in a few minutes, the buck reeled, tottered, fell up, and laid his head on the buck's leg. The leopard gave a frightful growl, and licked off some blood. He saw Martin's game, and was sulky and on his guard. What was to be done? Martin took a dead hare with creatures in and stood the human eye. Accordingly he stood erect and fixed his on the leopard; the leopard returned a savage glance, and never took his eye off Martin. Then Martin, continuing to look the beast down, soon perceived, after an actual instead of a conventional, struggle. The leopard flew at his head with a frightful yell, clawing rove, and jaws and claws missed him. He had but just time to catch her by the throat before her teeth could crush his face; one of her claws tore his shoulder and rent it, the other grazed at his cheek, would have been more deadly still, but Martin was old-fashioned, and wore no hat but a scapulary of the same stuff as his jerkin, and this scapulary he had brought over his head like a hood; the brute's claw caught in the ivory button. Martin kept her teeth off his face with some difficulty, and griped her throat fiercely, as also he kept rending his shoulder. It was like blunt reaping-hooks grinding and tearing. The pain was terrible, but, instead of crying the old adage, he put his blood up, and he gnashed his teeth with rage blood as fierce as hers, and found power to check with iron force. The two pair of eyes blazed at one another—and now the man's were almost as fierce as the brute's. She found she was thrashing her, and made a wild attempt to free herself, in which she dragged his cowl over his face and blinded him, and tore her claw out of his shoulder, fleh and all; but still he throttled her with hand and arm of iron. Presently her long tail, that was high in the air, went down, and her body lost its elasticity, and he held a choked and powerless thing: he griped it still till all motion ceased, then dashed it to the earth; then, panting, removed his cowl: the leopard lay still at his feet with tongue protruding and bloody paw; and for the first time terror fell on Martin. I am a dead man: I have slain the duke's leopard." He hastily seized a few handfuls of leaves and threw them over her; then shouldered the buck and staggered away leaving a trail of blood all the way—his own and the buck's. He burst into Peter's house a horrible figure, bleeding and blood-stained, and flung the deer's carcass down.

"There, no questions," said he, "but broil me a steak of it; for I am faint."

Margaret did not see he was wounded: she thought the blood was all from the deer.

She busied herself at the fire, and the meat soon dart clattered and hissed his own wound apart, and soon he and Gerard and Margaret were supping royally on broiled venison.

They were very hungry; and Gerard, with wonderful thoughtfulness, had brought a flask of Schiedam, and under its influence Martin revived, and told them how the venison was got, and thanks to the feats of his youth.

Their mirth was suddenly interrupted. Margaret's eye became fixed and fascinated, and her cheek pale with fear. She paused, and could not speak, but pointed to the window with trembling finger. Their eyes followed hers, and there, in the twilight crouched a dark form with eyes like glow-worms.

It was the leopard!

While they stood petrified, fascinated by the eyes of green-fire, there sounded in a wood a single dog bay: the voice of the boy of a blood-hound. Martin trembled at it.

"They have lost her, and laid muzzled blood-hounds on her scent. They will find her here, and the venison. Good-by, friends, Martin Wilkinshaw needs none."

Gerard seized his bow, and put it into the soldier's hands.

"Be a man," he cried, "shoot her, and fling her into the weed ere they come up. Who will know?"

There voices of hounds broke out, and nearer.

"Curse her!" cried Martin. "I spared her once; now she must die, or I, or both men like."

And he reared his bow, and drew his arrow to the head.

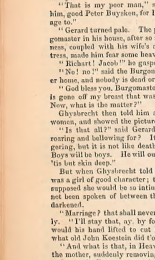
"No!: no!" cried Margaret, and seized the arrow: it broke in half: the pieces fell on each side the bow. The air of the room was filled with the tongues of the hounds: they were hot upon the scent.

"What have you done, wench? You have put the holter round my throat."

"No!" cried Margaret. "I have saved you: stand back from the window! both. Your knife! quick!"

She seized his long pointed knife, almost tore it out of his girdle, and darted from the room. The hounds were now surrounded with baying dogs and shouting men.

The glow-worm eyes moved not.



"ON THE WATER."

ON THE WATER.

On the water, on the water,
While the sunbeams warm were fair,
Whispering words in softest accents
Through a vail of drooping hair;
While the little oar was swaying,
Half-ashamed and rosy red,
Blushing at the earnest meaning
Of the tender words I said.

On the water, on the water,
Fairly shone the sunbeams then,
Dancing on the tiny ripples,
Lighting up the fawn of glen;
None could hear us save the Irish,
Swaying in her golden pride,
And the lilies ever moving
With the motion of the tide.

On the water, on the water,
While the twilight shades drew nigh,
Catching at the drooping branches,
As we floated idly by;
Oh! her small hand's gentle pressure,
And her glance all words above,
And her soft cheek's bright carnation,
When I told her all my love!

On the water, on the water,
Now I float, but all alone,
And I miss the silken ringlets,
And the little hand is gone;
Dies the sunset's crimson beauty,
Comes the twilight as of yore,
All remind me of the dear one,
Lost to me for evermore.

CHAPTER XLIV.

WALTZ AND ROUND.

WHILE thus the Brickle ball murmured and simmered around them, Hope Wayne and her party looked on, criticising and criticised. As for Merlin, who was usually too busy to mix in society, and whose acquaintance was not especially fashionable, was extremely amused. At an early moment he had discovered Mrs. Dagon on her perch surveying Hope Wayne with an eagerness that made him ask her name and nature; while upon the other side, as Lawrence Newt was telling him of his Aunt Dagget, born Cecilia Baxley, Arthur described Mrs. Winslow Grey, with her large, round, bright eyes, studying the group through her glass, and dotting the richness of Hope Wayne's attire.

"My Aunt Dagon, Arthur, is one of those people who serve as pepper in society. Yes, she does double duty. She is vinegar also. She has a good deal of cleverness, which has soured, so that when she spatters her conversation with it, at the constantly does, the flavor is very acid. If you call the Newt family a case of condiments, you may put Aunt Dagon down as the pepper and vinegar. She flanks the whole family, to say."

Her influence is evident in the career of my brother Boniface—in his wife, and in his son and daughter. Do you know Miss Fanny?"

ABEL AND HOPE.

Mr. Merlin did not know her. He had seen her at Saratoga.

"Well, there she is, talking with Mrs. Dinks. Do you observe them? How cool Fanny is! How furious and compressed Mrs. Dinks is! It is incredible what battles are fought upon these soft carpets! How many a man gets his quietus as he stands in kid gloves by the side of the woman he loves! And he has to smile—and they are both so polite! She may be a very sorry under her face. I know how very wretched in his broadcloth. However, a man had better be refused in a quadrille than in a gig!"

They were all listening to him—and Hope Wayne, Miss Amy Waring smiled, while Arthur Merlin laughed out,

"In a gig! Who was ever refused in a gig?" asked Arthur.

Lawrence Newt's eyes twinkled as he answered,

"A friend of mine. He invited Delicious to drive with him, meaning to cover his confusion in proposing by the nonchalance of the horse. They drove deep into the country. The horse came down to a walk. 'Will you have me?' cried he, suddenly, at last to the animal with the whip. 'No,' said the lady—and the horse ran away. They were tumbled into a ditch, and his nose bled all over his shirt-bosom."

There was a burst of laughter.

"Well ?" asked Arthur.

"Well, the lady was vexed and he was ashamed. By-and-by they made it up. They each married somebody else—have a dozen children apiece, and are the best friends in the world."

Lawrence Newt looked casually at Amy Waring as he told this little incident. Amy was very busy looking at Mrs. Van Kraut and Abel, who were apparently so much engaged not help thinking of little Ellen Bennet's Lord Ronald and Lady Mildred—and Ellen had declared—and other things—until, knowing perfectly well who was looking at her, her cheeks were like damask roses, and Ronald and Ellen had declared.

The music of the dance floated through the rooms.

"Yes, every ball-room is a battle-field, and the soldiers are what they have been educated to be."

"Character ?" said Amy Waring.

"Yes, Miss Amy, character counts, I know; and yet a sweet, simple girl may be twisted into an artificial shape by incessant balls. Look at my Aunt Dagon—then at my brother and sister Boniface—then at Miss Fanny. Then you have cause and effect. Fanny is very pretty, intelligent, accomplished, and oh! so knowing! Would you like to marry her, Mr. Arthur Merlin?"

"No," said Arthur, with great gravity and readiness, and looking at Hope Wayne.

That young lady was listening very closely to every word Lawrence Newt said. She was also thinking. Aunt Dagon and Mr. and Mrs. Boniface had trained Fanny, had they, and this was the result! Was not Abel their son? Had he not had the same influences? To be sure he had been for a long time at school. Was, then, the practical philosophy of Savory Davy, Esq., or the practical morality of the Rev. Amos Peewee, D.D., of a much loftier strain than that of Fanny's Mentors?

"I do not say that my niece was the sweetest of girls, to begin with, Miss Amy," continued Lawrence Newt. "You see the whole thing acts and reacts. People make society; society, in turn, makes them. I merely propose the question: Here comes little Lucy Slumb, who has been brocaded and diamonded and summer-shawled into Mrs. Bleecker Van Kraut—tell me, now, how many of the girls you know would not have hesitated a little before saying 'No' to Mr. Van Kraut?"

"Hundreds," answered Amy Waring, with energy.

"For instance—" said Lawrence Newt.

"Hope Wayne," replied Amy, briskly, turning with a bright smile to her friend.

"And Amy Waring," said Hope, in a lower voice, smiling gently.

Lawrence Newt smiled too.

"I know it," said he, "and I think I can say the same of little May Newt, Fanny's sister, and Ellen Bennet. They are both girls that will not be spoiled. Don't think me a heretic, or infidel. Leave a son. This crowd of people is called the World. Each one represents a very small part of it, and a very foolish part, but a very influential one. Half of the smiling faces here cover weary hearts, and hearts weary with the strain of keeping right with this 'world.'"

He smiled—as if he remembered himself. Hope Wayne looked as if she wanted to hear more; so did Amy Waring. Mr. Arthur Merlin had been very intently watching Hope Wayne, because he saw Abel Newt approaching, and he wished to catch the first look of Hope upon seeing him.

The music streamed through the rooms in the airy, yearning, languorous, passionless, persuasive measure of a waltz. The dance was new, and rarely seen in the ball-room. It was a distinction then to waltz at all in New York, as it is a distinction now to waltz like a New Yorker.

When our friends stood listening and quietly looking on, a space was cleared upon the floor as if for waltzing, and after a little delay and preclusive hush and hum Abel Newt, circling the polished billiard-ball, twirled it across the floor.

Mrs. Bleecker Van Kraut, when she waltzed, was simply a circular advertisement of the Van Kraut property. Her slow rising and falling motion displayed the family jewels to the utmost advantage. Thesame opulent roundness and finish prevailed in the whole performance. It was almost as perfect as the Paris type which you wind up, and which spin smoothly round upon a table. Abel Newt, conscious master of the dance and chief of brilliant youth, waltzed with an air of delicate deference toward his partner and gay defiance toward the rest of the world.

The gentleman was so novel and so well executed that the ball instantly became a spectacle of which Abel and Mrs. Van Kraut were the central figure. The crowd pressed around them, and Abel gently pressed them back in his fluctuating circles. Short skirts in the background stood upon chairs for a moment to get a better view; while Mrs. Dagon and Mrs. Cryy, whom no dexterous waltzer would encircle in his dizzy whirl, amused their neighbors with contemptuous and indignant criticisms, remarking Heaven and in their day things had not quite come to such a pass as that. Colonel Burr himself, my dears, never dared to touch more than the tips of his partner's fingers in the contra-dance.

MRS. DINKS. MERE ET FILLE.

Hope Wayne had not met Abel Newt since they had parted after the runaway at Delafield, except in the casual moment when she was stepping from the carriage. In the mean while she had been learning every thing at once.

As her eyes fell upon him now, she remembered that day upon the lawn at Pinewood, when he stood suddenly beside her, casting a shadow upon the page she was reading. The handsome boy had developed into the grand, gallant, gay young man, surrounded by that social prestige which gives graceful confidence to the bearing of any man. He knew that Hope had heard of his social success; but he could not justly estimate its effect upon her.

Of all those who stood by her, Arthur Merlin was the only one who knew that she had ever known Abel, and Arthur only inferred it from Abel's resemblance to the sketch of Manfred, which had evidently deeply affected Hope. Lawrence Newt, who was at Delafield, had wondered if Abel and Hope had ever met. Perhaps he had heard of their meeting, knowing Abel to be audacious and brilliant, and Hope to be romantic. Perhaps the anxiety with which he now looked upon the waltz arose from the apprehension that Hope could not help, at least, fancying such a handsome fellow. And then —what?

Amy Waring did not know. She and Hope were friends, indeed—but they were women, not tattling girls. Their friendship did not begin by each emptying all her experience into the sympathetic heart of the other. Mr. Abel Newt's acquaintance was a very brief episode in Miss Hope Wayne's life. She had nothing to say about him—why therefore should she speak of him? She had nothing to say about him to her intimate friend Amy—no, not though she had so much to think about him, that he was very constantly in her mind.

So Lawrence Newt and Arthur Merlin were furtively glancing at her as the young hero of the dance, in his widening circles, came nearer to them.

Hope heard the music, and her heart beat time. As she saw Abel and remembered the days that were gone and before, for a moment her cheek flushed—not tumultuously, but calmly—and Lawrence Newt and the painter remarked it. The flush passed, almost imperceptibly, and her eyes followed the dancers calmly, with only a little ache in the heart—with only a vague feeling that she had lived a long, long time.

Abel Newt had not lost Hope Wayne from his attention for a single moment during the evening; and before the interest in the dance was pulled, it was a Van Kraut here—soon. It came from Amsterdam. It was studded with jewels. It was part of the property.

As for Abel, he turned and bowed profoundly to Miss Wayne. Of course she knew that people were looking. She bowed as if to a mere acquaintance. Abel said a few words, significantly smiling, to his partner, then he remarked to Miss Wayne that he was very glad indeed to meet her again; that he had not called because he knew she had been making a crowded call—but to-morrow—making herself a nun—a Sister of Charity, he did not doubt, doing good as she always did—making every body in the world happy, as she could not help doing—and so forth.

Abel rattled on, he did not know why; but he did know that his Uncle Lawrence and Amy Waring and Mr. Merlin heard every thing he said. Hope looked at him calmly and listened to the gay cascade of words.

Her manner was still playing; Mr. Van Boosenberg spoke to Lawrence Newt; Amy Waring said that she saw her Aunt Bennet. Would Mr. Merlin take her to her aunt?—he should return to his worship in one moment. Mr. Merlin was very gallant, and replied with spirit that when her worship returned—here he made a low bow—his worth. As they moved away Amy Waring laughed at him and said that men would compliment as long as—as women were lovely, interpolated Mr. Merlin. Arthur also wished to know what speech was good for, if not to say the sweetest things—and so they were lost to view, still gayly chatting with the pleasant freedom of a young man and woman who know that they are not in love with each other, and are perfectly content to be so, because neither they know it or see—they are each in love with somebody else.

This movement had taken place as Abel was finishing his scattering volley of talk.

"Yes," said he, as he saw that he was not overheard, and sinking his voice into that tone of tender music which Hope so well remembered, "yes, making every body in the world happy but one person."

His airy persiflage had not pleased Hope Wayne. The sudden modulation into sentiment offended her. Before she replied—indeed she had no intention of replying—the round eyes of Mrs. Van Kraut informed her partner that she was ready for another turn, and forth they whirled upon the floor.

"I jes see to me, you know, mo, see'd, I don't like to see a young man like Mr. Abel Nevet, sez I, wasting himself upon married women. No, sez I, ma, when you women have moste your market, you oughter start one side and give the fothers a chance, sez I."

Mr. Van Boomberg addressed this remark to Lawrence Nevet, the incident with his ma having occurred at the other side of the room when he saw Abel devoting himself to Mrs. Van Kraut, and heard that he was fond of married society. In the eyes of the old gentleman it was another instance of imprudence on Abel's part not to be made some truly good match.

Lawrence Nevet replied by looking round the rooms as if searching for some one, and then saying:

"I don't see your daughter, Mrs. Witchet," here to-night, Mr. Van Boozenberg."

"No," growled the papa, and moved on to talk with Mrs. Bugeon.

"Why, my Sir," said the Honorable Budlong Dinks, approaching just as Lawrence Nevet finished his remark, and Van Boozenberg growling, departed:

"That was an unfortunate observation. You are, perhaps, not aware—"

"Oh! thank you, yes, I am fully aware," replied Lawrence Nevet. "But one thing I do not know."

The Honorable Budlong Dinks bowed with dignity as if he understood Mr. Nevet to compliment him by insinuating that he was the man who knew all about it, and would kindness enlighten him.

"I should like to know, if a man does a mean and unfeeling, yes, an inhuman act, why it is bad manners to speak of it. Old Van Boozenberg ought to be cut to the proverbial soul for his treatment of his daughter, and we all know it."

"Yes—no—really" replied the Honorable Budlong Dinks, "really—you know—it would be impossible. Mr. Van Boozenberg is a highly respectable man, really—we should have mobs, chaos," and the honorable gentleman rubbed his hands with perfect naivity.

"When did we emerge?" asked Lawrence Nevet, with such a kindly glimmer in his eyes that Mr. Dinks felt merry, "really"—and moved on, remarking to General Arcularius Belch, with a delighted laugh, that Lawrence Nevet was a very odd man.

"Odd, but not without the coin. He can afford to be odd," replied that gentleman.

While these little things were said and done, Lawrence moved through the room as if somehow found himself at the side of Amy Waring, who was talking with Fanny Nevet.

"Yes young Napoleon," said Lawrence to his niece as he joined them.

"What an odd name, you droll Uncle Lawrence?" demanded Fanny, her eyes glittering with inquiry.

"Where's Mrs. Warnser—I mean Mrs. Dinks?" continued Lawrence. "Why, I shall now you talking together a little while ago, I could think of nothing but the young Bonaparte and the old Warnser."

"You droll Uncle Lawrence, aren't you ashamed of yourself?

What an odd name young Napoleon it was! Even then and there, in Mrs. Brickle's ballroom, had Fanny Nevet resolved how to carry her Manton by a sudden coup.

CHAPTER XLV.

HEAVEN'S LAST BEST GIFT.

"My dear Alfred, I am glad to see you. You may kiss me carefully, carefully."

Mr. Alfred Dinks therewith kissed lips upon his return from Boston.

"Sit down, Alfred my dear, I wish to speak to you," said Fanny Nevet, with even more than her usual decision. The eyes were uncommonly round and black.

Alfred seated himself with vague trepidation.

"My dear, we must be married immediately," remarked Fanny, quietly.

The eyes of love shone with pleasure.

"Dear Fanny!" said he, "have you told mother?"

"No," answered she, calmly.

"Well, but, Fanny, you know," rejoined Alfred, in alarm. He would have said more, but he was afraid. He wanted to inquire whether Fanny thought that her father would simplify the sinews of matrimony. Alfred's theory was that he undoubtedly would. It did not occur to the young man that a young woman of Fanny's calmness, intrepidity, and profound knowledge of the world could propose immediate matrimony without seeing how the commissariat was to be supplied. She has all her plans laid, of course, thought he—she is so talented and cool that 'tis all right I dare say. Of course she knows that I have nothing, and that I have nothing except from old Burt, and he's not sure for me, at all. But Boniface Nevet is rich enough.

And Alfred bethought himself of the style in which that worthy commission merchant lived, and experienced in his son Abel's expense and splendor.

"Alfred, dear—just try not to be trying, you know, but think what you are about. Your mother has found out that something has gone wrong—that you are not engaged to Hope Wayne."

"Yes—yes, I know," burst in Alfred, "she treated me like a porcupine this morning—or ant-eater, which is it, Fanny—the thing with quills, you know?"

Miss Fanny Nevet patted the floor with her foot. Alfred continued:

"Yes, and Hope sent down, and she wanted to see me alone some time to-day."

Fanny's foot stopped.

"Alfred, dear," said she, "you are a good fellow, but you are too amiable. You must do just as I want you to, dearest, or something awful will happen."

"Pooh! Fanny; nothing shall happen. I love you like any thing."

"Indeed! much!

"Well then, listen, Alfred! Your mother doesn't like me. She would in any thing to prevent our marriage. The reasons I will tell you at another time. If you go home and talk with her and Hope Wayne, you will be only helping that you are engaged to me; and—you know your mother, Alfred—she could openly oppose the marriage, and I don't know what she might not say to my father."

Fanny spoke slowly and rapidly, but calmly. Alfred looked utterly bewildered.

"But, Fanny, dearest," said he, feebly.

"What do you think we had better do?"

Miss Fanny Nevet was passionless and socially adroit. The only career cognate to her tastes—the only one for which she had been educated—was what is called the social career. She was conscious that her own sagacity needed only the alliance of money to secure success. But how much money? Did she love a man she might have had plenty of other ambitious and advantageous men? She might have given herself to any department of trade, to any profession, to political life; and in the pursuit of any calling she might have succeeded by means she wished.

But she was distinctly did not wish to remain unmarried with an uncertain future; she had no call to be a Sister of Charity; nor to wrap her self in the cold cloak of meritorious philanthropy; nor to await the chance of the coming of a man she could love with security enough to make marriage possible. Money is an odious word to many fastidious minds; to which, however, Fanny Nevet never once thought, and for joy of life. So Lord Byron could not bear to see mountains ironed, (so, indeed, many men regret!—Dear Lord Byron, how profoundly he respected women!

Fanny Nevet saw but one way in which she could secure her object. By marrying a man who was not attached to her, whom she could easily manage, and who was—or who would be—rich. She supposed Alfred Dinks to be that man.

When she heard Alfred irresolutely ask what they had better do, she replied, very promptly and quietly,

"We must be married, Alfred dear?"

"Yes—but when?"

"To-day," said Fanny, firmly, and putting out her hand for her beloved.

He seized it mechanically.

"To-day, Fanny?" asked he, after a pause of embarrassment.

"Certainly, dear; to-day. I am as ready now as I shall be a year hence."

"But what will my mother say?" inquired Alfred, in alarm.

"It will be too late for her to say my thing. Don't you see, Alfred dear?" continued Fanny, in a soothing tone, "that if we go to your mother and say, 'Here we are, married!' she has sense enough to perceive that nothing can be done; perceive a little time, and then in a smooth again?"

Her face was comforted by this view. He was even pleased by the audacity of the project.

"I swear, Fanny," said he, at length, in a more decided tone, "I swear, upon my life, it's rather a good idea!"

"Of course it is, dear. Are you ready?"

Alfred gasped a little at the prompt question, despite his confidence.

"Why, Fanny, you don't mean actually now —this very day? Gracious!"

"Of course," said she, since we think best to be married immediately and in private, why should we arrange it for to-night, or next week, when we can have as ready now as we shall be then? asked Fanny, quietly; "especially as something may happen to make it impossible then?"

Alfred Dinks shut his eyes.

"What will your father say?" he inquired, at length, his mind raising his eyelids.

"Do you not see he will have to make up his mind to it, just as your mother will," replied Fanny.

"And my—my!" said Alfred, in a state of temporary bluderen continued.

"Yes, and your father too," answered Fanny, who had, during the brief evening, the Honorable Budlong Dinks as a mere tender to that woman-of-our his wife, in a way that would have been unpardonable in a young woman considered his wife a pretty trifle or mere domestic luxury.

"And your mother, dear Fanny?" repeated Mrs. Dinks opened his eyes and said,

"Well, Fanny dear!"

"Well, Alfred dear!" and Fanny leaned toward him, with her head poised like that of a bird about to sing. Alfred was fascinated. Perhaps he was sorry he was so; perhaps he wanted to struggle. But he did not. He was under the spell.

There was still a lingering silence. Fanny waited patiently. At length she naked again, putting her hand in her lover's,

"Are you ready?"

"Yes" said Alfred, in a crisp, resolute tone. Fanny raised her hand and rang the bell. The waiter appeared.

"John, I want a carriage from Jobber's immediately."

"Yes, Miss."

"And, John, tell Mary to bring me my things. I am going out."

"Yes, Miss." And leaving nothing farther, John disappeared.

It was perhaps a judicious instinct which taught Fanny not to leave Alfred alone by going up to array herself in her own chamber. The intervals of delay between the coming of the maid and the coming of the carriage the young woman employed in conversing dexterously with Alfred Dinks, and the friends her lover had seen there, and in describing to him the great Brickles ball.

Presently she was bonnected and cloaked, and the carriage was at the door.

"Alfred, dear, and not here a Paradise to Fanny Nevet—nor were Aunt Dagon, Papa and Mamma Nevet, and Brother Abel altogether—but Fanny Nevet, in superfluous emotions of any kind at any time; but as she passed through the hall she saw her cousin Mary Mac—the youngest child—a girl of fifteen—Uncle Lawrence's favorite—standing upon the stairs.

Mary Mac—nothing; the hall was quite dim, and as the girl stood in the half light her childlike, delicate beauty seemed to shine out more striking than ever. If Uncle Lawrence had seen her at the moment he would have thought of Jacob's ladder with the angels ascending and descending.

"Mary, May!" said Fanny, going up to her sister, taking her face between her hands and kissing her lips.

The sister looked at each other, each inexplicably conscious that it was not an ordinary farewell.

"Good-by, darling!" said Fanny, kissing her again, and still holding her young sister's face, to which she was surprised by the unwonted tenderness of her sister's manner, May threw her arms around her neck and burst into tears.

"Oh! Fanny."

Fanny did not discourage the arms that clung about her, and also the young head that rested upon her shoulder. Perhaps she felt that something was lacking in her own.

May raised her head at length, kissed Fanny gently upon the lips, smoothed her hair, and then, with a new surprised by the unwonted tenderness of her sister's manner, May threw her arms around her neck and burst into tears.

"Oh! Fanny."

Fanny did not discourage the arms that clung about her, and also the young head that rested upon her shoulder. Perhaps she felt that something was lacking in her own.

May raised her head at length, kissed Fanny gently upon the lips, smoothed her hair, and then, with a new and delicate hand, half smiled through her tears as she thought that Fanny must have been working busily and incourse with her sister, and then pushed her softly away, saying,

"Mr. Dinks is waiting for you, Fanny."

Fanny said nothing, but drew her veil over her face, and Mr. Dinks handed her into the carriage.

Mrs. Dinks and Hope Wayne sat together in their lodgings, waiting impatiently for Alfred's return. They were both working busily and conversing in their usual strain of London. Hope was reluctant to return home at the earliest possible moment. She wished only to have a clear explanation with her son. Hope Wayne was also waiting for an explanation. She was naturally curious to know why Alfred Dinks had told his mother that they were engaged. Hope Wayne had never thought that she was probably an heiress. As her Aunt Dinks looked at her, and saw how pretty and lofty her features were, yet how simple and candid, she was more than ever angry with her, because she felt that it was impossible she should ever have loved Alfred.

They heard a carriage in the street. It stopped at the door. A moment in the sound of a footstep was audible.

"My dear, I want to speak to Alfred alone. I hope you'll go," said Mrs. Dinks.

"Yes, aunt," answered Hope Wayne, rising, and taking up her basket and work-box toward the door. Just as she reached it, it opened, and Alfred Dinks and Fanny Nevet entered. Hope looked at them and began on.

"Stop, Hope!" whispered Alfred, excitedly.

She turned at the door and looked on, while Alfred, with uncertain bravado, advanced with Fanny to his mother, who was gazing upon them in amazement, and said, in a thick, hurried voice,

"Mother, this is your daughter Fanny—my wife—Mrs. Alfred Dinks."

The words which Hope Wayne went out, closing the door behind her, leaving the mother alone with her children.

Mrs. Dinks sat speechless in her chair for a few moments, staring at Alfred, who looked as if he had committed some long regretted act. Fanny, who stood calmly beside him. At length she said to Alfred in a low voice:

"Is that woman really your wife?"

"Yes, m," replied the new husband.

"What are you going to make of her with?"

"I have my allowance," said Alfred, in a very small voice.

"Mrs. Alfred Dinks, your husband's allowance is six hundred dollars a year from his father, and not a penny more."

There was a sarcastic sparkle in her eyes. Mrs. Dinks had only felt that she and Fanny were contesting a prize. At this moment, while she knew that she had not won, she was sure that Fanny had lost. Rachel was confident.

Fanny was prepared for such a reception. She did not smile. She remembered the great Burt fortune. But before she could speak Mrs. Dinks rose, and, with an air of contemptuous silence, inquired,

"Where are you living, Mrs. Dinks?"

Mr. Alfred looked at his wife with profound perplexity. He thought, for his part, that he was living in that very house. But his wife answered, quietly:

"We are at Bunker's, where we shall be delighted to see you. Good-morning, Mrs. Dinks."

And Fanny took her husband by the arm and went out, having entirely confounded her mother-in-law, who meant to have wished her children good-morning, and then have left them to their embarrassment. But Fanny was occasionally too quick for Mrs. Dinks.

All Right! All Right!

"All right, all right!" and is it so?
Am I "all right" from top to toe?
Let's see again. Just this once more,
And scan me well, friend, ear and eye,
Ere, if you can, my ears delight,
And lend precision, "all right!"

Note first my vest—how looks that, pray?
Is it in the fashion fresh and gay
"I'll answer that in one brief minute;
Prove Albert might with profit be in it."
You really think so? "Hence bright!"
Why, then I'm still in what's right, "all right!"

Now for my coat! "It makes me sigh
That I don't own it. Time may be"
His onward course for years, but no
Such coat will ever fit me so."
"Its fashion, pardon in my sight?"
Why, then, my coat is right, "all right!"

What of my pants? dost like the fit?
"With matchless grace, my friend, they sit.
I'm jealous while I gaze upon
The wondrous things my tailor's done."
Would like the same? "Aye, just such others."
Then send the modest wish to Brothers.
And when you've made your choice for me
She'll reciprocate ere "You're right, all right!"

Richardson's New Method
For the Piano Forte
IS NOW READY!!

This New Method by the Author of "The Modern School," combines the essentials of former works, with such improvements as the experience of Teachers and Scholars, have, from time to time, suggested. Those who have examined it pronounce it unsurpassed, if not unequalled, by any work of the kind extant. Many of the plans from the earliest rudimentary elements of knowledge to the possession of that artistic skill so necessary to the accomplishment of a rapid and finished execution of the best compositions. Its elegantly engraved plates, exhibiting correct positions of the Hand and Fingers in order to form a new and important feature of a work of the kind, and will be found one of the greatest aids to both teacher or and pupil.

SECTION IN ITS PLAN OF STUDY, EXCEEDINGLY ATTRACTIVE IN ITS LESSONS AND EXERCISES, UNEQUALLED IN ITS ADAPTATION TO THE WANTS OF ALL CLASSES. "RICHARDSON'S NEW METHOD" CAN NOT BUT MEET WITH THE FAVOR OF ALL WHO MAY BECOME ITS MOST VALUABLE PATRONS, WHEN ONCE IT IS BROUGHT BEFORE THEM.

Two Editions are published, viz: Boston and London, the other Foreign Examples. When the work is ordered, if no preference is designated, the edition with American Examples will be sent. Terms in receipt of which it will be forwarded by Mail, post paid.

THE PIONEER GIFT BOOK STORE

As to have been for the first taken the lead of all others, we shall endeavor to maintain our position as heretofore. Book Agents, and those desiring to become so, should examine our terms, as no books can be sold in the same time that one may be disposed of in the regular way, through the inducements given by us to be purchaser.

REMEMBER,

☞ That this is the only Gift Book House that takes the risk of loss through the mail.

☞ This is the only Gift Book House that has received the voluntary endorsement of over five hundred city and country journals, and of the leading publishing houses of the country.

☞ This is the oldest established and most extensive House of the kind in the world.

☞ We pay the most liberal commission to Agents.

☞ We keep the most varied and extensive line of Books and Gifts, and gratuitously execute the most elegant Steel Engraving, according to the country.

☞ We guarantee perfect satisfaction to all who may favor us with their patronage.

WHAT REALLY HAPPENED.
BY ONE WHO KNOWS
Inscribed to H. E. HOYT, Esq., Proprietor of the Great
"BALTIMORE GIFT BOOK" Establishment,
Baltimore, Md.

"Good luck a day," my wife did say,
One morning at the table;
"How can this Hoyt and Company
Afford to do as able.
'There's jewellery,' chains, and 'rings' and 'studs,'
With books for the boys to read them;
And now to prove that this is so,
Suppose we go and try them?"

"Agreed," said I—and off we went,
Down Baltimore Street we sauntered;
And on our way I bid my destiny,
And freely my wife hesitered,
At last we reached the looked-for place,
And as we duly entered,
My eyes upon the scene I saw,
Were fiually calmly centered.

The counters wide were strewn with books
Of every size and cover;
With "fairy tales," and "works of art,"
And "Albums" for a lover.
While crowds of ladies, young and old,
Were pushing, crowding, pressing;
To see if fortune had for them
Gifts really worth possessing.

I saw a lady dressed in silks
Pick up the "Pension Pioneer"
And cast her eyes on "Byron's Poems,"
To wile away an hour.
The cashier, at my right, came from out
The recess of very pocket;
Paid for the letter—and received
A Twenty Dollar Locket.

"Fourscth, my dear!"—thus spoke my wife,
Here's the "Discarded Daughter;"
But I will not discard the mother.
The prize—" one and a quarter.
I plunked the cash, and as my "rib,"
Gazed on the clerk so pleasant;
He handed her "Monnie Seta,"
As a free Christmas present.

"Now is the time, dear wife," I said,
As I did tightly clutch
My knees but I my win a prize—
Perhaps a "Gold Watch."
Here is the "Lover's Test." I see,
And I will not my quick now;
Who knows but I like Jessie Sale,
May be purchance in "Love's Dream."

I paid the price—my wife did gaze,
The sight it did our pulses fire;
For in my hands there soon was placed,
A "Jewelled Breast Pin."
We homeward went, convinced that Hoyt
Like prince was of good fellows;
Resolved to sound his praises forth
To town and country revlons.

Then go or send to Hoyt & Co.,
You will find them on the corner
Of Frederick and Baltimore Streets,
Where they will be
Jewel your looks, you'll not regret
The outlay of your money;
You are bound to win a golden prize,
To make your pathway sunny.

CHAPTER XVII.

ONE NIGHT.

NEVER did the sun go down with a brighter glory on the quiet corner in Soho than one memorable evening when the Doctor and his daughter sat under the plane-tree together. Never did the moon rise with a milder radiance over great London than on that night when it found them still seated under the tree, and shone upon their faces through its leaves.

Lucie was to be married to-morrow. She had reserved this last evening for her father, and they sat alone under the plane-tree.

"You are happy, my dear father?"

"Quite, my child."

They had said little, though they had been there a long time. When it was yet light enough to work and read she had neither employed herself in her usual work, nor had she read to him. She had employed herself in both ways at his side under the tree many and many a time; but this time was not quite like any other, and nothing could make it so.

"And I am very happy to-night, dear father. I am deeply happy in the love that Heaven has so blessed—my love for Charles, and Charles's love for me. Still, if my life were not to be consecrated to you, or if my marriage were so arranged as that it would part us, even by the length of a few of these streets, I should be more unhappy and self-reproachful now than I can tell you. Even as it is——"

Even as it was, she could not command her voice.

In the sad moonlight she clasped him by the neck, and laid her face upon his breast. In the moonlight which is always sad, as the light of the sun itself is—as the light called human life is—at its coming and its going.

"Dearest dear! Can you tell me, this last time, that you feel quite, quite sure no new affections of mine, and no new duties of mine, will ever interpose between us? I know it well, but do you know it? In your own heart, do you feel quite certain?"

Her father answered, with a cheerful firmness of conviction he could scarcely have assumed, "Quite sure, my darling! More than that," he added, as he tenderly kissed her, "my future is far brighter, Lucie, seen through your marriage than it could have been—nay, than it ever was—without it."

"If I could hope that, my father—"

"Believe it, love! Indeed, it is so. Consider how natural and how plain it is, my dear, that it should be so. You, devoted and young, can not fully appreciate the anxiety I have felt that your life should not be wasted—"

She moved her hand toward his lips, but he took it in his, and repeated the word.

"—wasted, my child—should not be wasted, struck aside from the natural order of things, for my sake. Your unselfishness can not entirely comprehend how much my mind has gone on this; but only ask yourself, how could my happiness be perfect while yours was incomplete?

"If I had never seen Charles, my father, I should have been quite happy with you."

He smiled at her unconscious admission that she would have been unhappy without Charles, having seen him, and replied:

"My child, you did see him, and it is Charles. If it had not been Charles it would have been another. Or, if it had been no other, I should have been the cause, and then the dark part of my life would have cast its shadow beyond myself, and would have fallen on you."

It was the first time, except at the trial, of her ever hearing him refer to the period of his suffering. It gave her a strange and new sensation while his words were in her ears, and he remembered it long afterward.

"See!" said the Doctor of Beauvais, raising his hand toward the moon. "I have looked at her, from my prison-window, when I could not bear her light. I have looked at her, when it has been such torture to me to think of her shining upon what I had lost, that I have beaten my head against the stone walls. I have looked at her in a state so dulled and lethargic that I have thought of nothing but the number of horizontal lines I could draw across her at the full, and the number of perpendicular lines with which I could intersect them." He added this in a smile, but in his inward and pondering manner, as he looked at the moon. "It was twenty either way, I remember, and the twentieth was difficult to squeeze in."

The strong purpose with which she heard him go back to that time deepened as he dwelt upon it; but there was nothing to shock her in the manner of his reference. He only seemed to contrast his present cheerfulness and felicity with the dire endurance that was over.

"I have looked at her, speculating thousands of times upon the unborn child from whom I had been rent. Whether it was born dead, or living, whether it had been born alive, or the poor mother's shock killed it. Whether it was a son who would grow to be a man, or a daughter who would grow to be a woman."

She drew closer to him, and kissed his cheek and his hand.

"I have pictured my daughter, to myself, as perfectly forgetful of me—rather, altogether ignorant of me, and unconscious of me. I have cast up the years of her age, year after year. I have seen her married to a man who knew nothing of my fate. I have altogether perished from the remembrance of the living, and in the next generation my place was a blank."

"My father! Even to hear that you had seen such thoughts in your face when I came, strikes to my heart as if I had been shut child."

"You, my own? It is out of the consolation and restoration you have brought to me that these remembrances arise and pass between us and the moon on this last night. What did I say, just now?"

She knew nothing of you. She cared nothing for you."

"Yes. But on other moonlight nights, when the sadness and the silence have touched me in a different way—have effected me with something as like a sorrowful sense of peace as any emotion that had pain for its foundations could—I have imagined her as coming to me in my cell and leading me out into the freedom beyond the fortress. I have seen her image in the moonlight often, as I now see you, except that I never held her in my arms; it stood between the little grated window and the door. But you understand that that was not the child I am speaking of?"

"The figure was not; the—the—image; the fancy?"

"No. That was another thing. It stood before my disturbed sense of sight, but it never moved. The phantom that my mind pursued was another and more real child. Of her outward appearance I know no more than that she was like her mother. The other had that likeness too—as you have—but was not the same. Can you follow me, Lucie? Hardly, I think. I doubt you must have been a solitary prisoner to understand these perplexed distinctions."

His collected and calm manner could not prevent her blood from running cold as he thus tried to ananatomize his old condition.

"In that more peaceful state I have imagined her, in the moonlight, coming to me and taking me out to show me that the home of her married life was full of her loving remembrance of her lost father. My picture was in her hands, and I was in her prayers. Her life was active, cheerful, useful; but my poor history pervaded it all."

"I was that child, my father. I was not half so good, but in my love that was I."

"And she showed me her children," said the Doctor of Beauvais, "and they had been taught by me, and had been taught to pity me. When they passed my prison of the State they kept far from its frowning walls, and looked up at its bars, and spoke in whispers. She could never deliver me; I imagined that she always brought me back after showing me such things. But then, blessed with the relief of tears, I fell upon my knees and blessed her."

"I am that child, I hope, my father. Oh! my dear father, 'till you bless me as fervently to-morrow?"

"Lucie, I recall these old troubles in the re-

"SEE!" SAID THE DOCTOR OF BEAUVAIS, ETC.

spect that I have to-night for loving you better than words can tell, and thanking God for my great happiness. My thoughts, when they were wildest, never rose near the happiness that I have known with you, and that we have before us."

He embraced her, solemnly commended her to Heaven, and humbly thanked Heaven for having bestowed her on him. By-and-by they went into the house.

There was no one hidden in the marriage but MR. LORRY; there was even to be no bridesmaid but the gaunt Miss Pross. The marriage was to make no change in their place of residence; they had been able to extend it, by taking to themselves the upper rooms formerly belonging to the sperryphal invisible lodger, and they desired nothing more.

Doctor Manette was very cheerful at the little supper. They were only three at table, and Miss Pross made the third. He remarked that Charles was not there; was more than half disposed to object to the loving little plot that kept him away; and drank to him affectionately.

So the time came for him to bid Lucie good-night, and they separated. But in the stillness of the third hour of the morning Lucie came down stairs again and stole into his room; not free from unshaped fears beforehand.

All things, however, were in their places; all was quiet; and he lay asleep, his white hair picturesque on the untroubled pillow, and his hands lying quiet on the coverlid. She put her noiseless candle in the shadow at a distance, crept up to his bed, and put her lips to his; then kneeled over him and looked at him.

Into his handsome face the bitter waters of captivity had worn; but he covered up their tracks with a determination so strong, that he held the mastery of them, even in his sleep. A remarkable face in its quiet, resolute, and guarded struggle with an unseen assailant was not to be beheld in all the wide dominions of sleep that night.

She timidly laid her hand on his dear breast, and put up a prayer that she might ever be as true to him as her love aspired to be, and as his sorrows deserved. Then she withdrew her hand, and kissed his lips once more, and went away. So the carnise came, and the shadows of the leaves of the plane-tree moved upon his face as softly as her lips had moved in praying for him.

CHAPTER XVIII.

NINE DAYS.

THE marriage day was shining brightly, and they were ready outside the closed door of the Doctor's room, where he was speaking with Charles Darnay. They were ready to go to church; the beautiful bride, Mr. Lorry, and Miss Pross—to whom the event, through a gradual process of reconcilement to the inevitable, would have been one of absolute bliss, but for the yet lingering consideration that her brother Solomon should have been the bridegroom.

"And so," said Mr. Lorry, who could not sufficiently admire the bride, and who had been mowing round her to take in every point of her quiet, pretty dress: "and so it was for this, my sweet Lucie, that I brought you your mother's gift, such a baby! Lord bless me! How little I thought what I was doing! How lightly I sold the old chairs and tables and stock in my friend Mr. Charles!"

"You didn't mean it," remarked the matter-of-fact Miss Pross, "and therefore how could you know it?" Nonsense!"

"Really I will; but don't cry," said the gentle Mr. Lorry.

"I am not crying," said Miss Pross; "you are."

"I, my Pross?" (By this time Mr. Lorry had got her by both hands, and was standing her before him.) "What is to be told to Ladybird? He doesn't know me, and is making love to Pross!"

Mr. Lorry said what he could to calm her, and went himself into the Doctor's room. The Doctor was turned toward the light, as it had been when the door was darkened by the young people, and his head was bent down, and his face was very serious.

"Doctor Manette. My dear friend, Doctor Manette!"

The Doctor looked at him for a moment in half inquiring, half as if he were angry at being spoken to, manner, and then resumed.

He had laid aside his coat and waistcoat; and his shirt was open at the throat, as it used to be when he did those things; and even the old ragged, faded surface of face had come back to it. He looked hard—almost fiercely—but it was a sense of having been interrupted.

Mr. Lorry glanced at the work in his hand, and observed that it was a shoe of the old size and shape. He took up another that was lying at his hand and shook it to get his attention.

"A young lady's walking shoe," he muttered, without looking up. "It ought to have been finished long ago. Let it lie."

"But, Doctor Manette. Look at me."

He obeyed, in the old mechanical submissive manner, without pausing in his work.

"You know me, my dear friend? Think again. This is not your proper occupation. Think, dear friend!"

Nothing would induce him to speak more. He looked up, for an instant at a time, when he was requested to do so; but no persuasion could extract a word from him. He worked, and worked, and worked, in silence, and words fell on him as they would have fallen on the pavement stones, if he had been in the street. The only ray of hope Mr. Lorry could discover was, that sometimes he seemed to work without being noticed. In that there seemed a faint expression of curiosity or perplexity, as to what he was doing, to reconcile some doubts in his mind.

Two things made a deep impression on Mr. Lorry, as important above all others; the first, that this must be kept secret from Lucie; the second, that he must himself avoid all mention of who knew him. In conjunction with Miss Pross, he took immediate steps toward the latter precaution by giving out that the Doctor was unwell, and required a few days of complete rest. As a aid of the kind deception to be practised on his daughter, Miss Pross was to write, describing his having been called away professionally, and referring to an imaginary letter due by one or three hurried lines in his own hand, represented to have been received by herself. Miss Pross entered into the device exactly as the Doctor had foreseen.

These measures, advisable to be taken in any case, Mr. Lorry took in the hope of his coming to himself. If that should happen soon, he kept another course in reserve; which was to give a certain portion of the secret into Darnay's on the Doctor's case.

In the hope of his recovery, and of resort to this third course being thereby rendered practicable, Mr. Lorry resolved to watch him attentively, with as little appearance of watching as doing so. He therefore made arrangements to have himself driven home from the play first time in his life, and took his post by the window in the same room.

He was not long in discovering that it was worse than useless to speak to him, since, on being pressed, he became rebellious. He always resumed his attempt on the first day, and resolved merely to keep himself always before him, as a silent protest against the shoemaking which he had fallen, or was falling. He resolved, therefore, in his own mind, that he would, reading and writing, and expressing in as many pleasant and natural little ways as he could think of, that it was a free place.

Doctor Manette took what was given him to take, and drank, and worked on, and his hair, long, until it was too dark to see—worked on, half an hour after Mr. Lorry could not have seen, for his life, to carry on his own work, though he were beside an useless, until morning, Mr. Lorry rose and said to him:

"Will you go out?"

He looked down at the floor on either side of him in the old manner, looked up at the old manner, and repeated in the old low voice:

"Out?"

"Yes; for a walk with me. Why not?"

He made no effort to say why not, and said not a word more. But Mr. Lorry thought he saw, as he leaned forward on his bench in the dusk, with his elbows on his knees and his head in his hands, that he was in some misty way asking himself, "Why not?" The sagacity of the man of business perceived an advantage here, and determined to hold it.

Miss Pross and he divided the night into two watches, and observed him at intervals from the adjoining room. He paced up and down for a long time before he lay down; but when he did finally lay himself down, he fell asleep. In the morning he was up betimes, and went straight to his bench and to work.

On this second day, Mr. Lorry saluted him cheerfully by his name, and spoke to him on topics of no apparent interest to himself or others. He returned no reply, but it was evident that he heard what was said, and that he thought about it with forced attention. His countenance fell; Mr. Lorry to have Miss Pross in with her work several times that day; in short, on every time they quietly spoke of Miss Lucie, and of her father then present, precisely in the usual manner, and as if there were nothing unusual. He remained without any demonstrative accompaniment, not long enough or often enough to harass him, and it lightened Mr. Lorry's friendly heart to believe that he looked up oftener, and that he spared them sooner, than he would have done if inconsistencies surrounding him.

Once it fell dark again Mr. Lorry asked him as before:

"Dear Doctor, will you go out?"

As before he paused, and then said:

"Yes; for a walk with me. Why not?"

This time Mr. Lorry stopped by on each side of the window, and had not there looking down in the place, but on Mr. Lorry's return he slipped away to his bench.

The time went very slowly on, and Mr. Lorry's anxiety augmented, and his hope grew heavier again, and grew yet heavier and heavier every day. The third day came and went, the fourth, the fifth. Five days, six days, seven days, eight days, nine days.

With each day that was darkening, and with a heart always growing heavier and heavier, Mr. Lorry counted up those days anxious days. The second was well kept, and Lucie was unconscious and happy; but he could not fail to observe that the shoemaking was beginning to be a little out of first, was growing dreadfully skilful, and that he had even made some leeway in point of speed. and that his hands had never been so nimble and expert as in the dusk of the ninth evening.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 20, 1859.

A FEW WORDS TO THE FARMERS.

THE wheat crop of the United States this year is estimated at 200,000,000 bushels. There is necessarily some guesswork in all such estimates; there never has been, and probably never will be, a perfectly accurate return of the whole amount of any crop of any country, except in the limits of the Confederacy. But if we take the reports of those States which are wise enough to count their agricultural products every year, and estimate the crop in the other States according to the most reliable data, correcting these results by reference to the last census reports, we shall arrive at the conclusion that the wheat crop this year does not probably vary far from 200,000,000 bushels.

The quality of the bulk of this wheat is excellent. Last year the wheat crop was not only small in quantity but also poor in quality. The grain was small, and made poor flour. Much of the grain and flour exported to Europe ranked low, and rapidly became of little value compare with the sounder product of England, France, or Russia. This year all accounts concur in reporting the grain sound and remarkably heavy. Some Michigan wheat exhibited on Change in this city has been compared to the famous wheat of Dantzic. The wheat crop of white Tennessee wheat, which has failed so regularly of late years, is this season abundant and fine on the whole.

The value of this great wheat crop can be best realized when we say that it is worth considerably more than the greatest commercial crop ever raised in the United States. The cotton crop of 1858, considerably the largest ever raised, has not been sold for over $170,000,000; the wheat crop of 1859 will command fully $200,000,000.

The question which now arises with regard to this enormous property is, when will it come to market?

On the face of it such a question should carry with it its own answer. Each wheat-grower depends on the wheat for the maintenance of his family; it ought to be fair to suppose, especially as the great wheat-growing sections of the country are poor, that no time will be lost in forwarding the crop to a market and exchanging it for dry goods, groceries, and money. Unfortunately there has been, of late years, so much speculation and gambling in wheat, and there is so much false economy afloat in the rural districts, that this natural and obvious plan may not be generally followed. During the Crimean war bad harvests in Europe, and a factitious demand for cereals created by the war, caused the price of wheat to rise to the preposterous price of $2 a bushel. Many farmers, it is feared, have adopted that very extraordinary figure as their standard, and will decline to sell at a lower rate. A similar spirit is to prevail, too, in many parts of the West, that in the farmer will only bring to their grain, and keep the market sparingly supplied. Whether this be wise or not, we see intimations in some of the rural journals that the farmers mean to hurry no forward their crops, and intend to clutch their own time.

This is a matter in which foolish counsel may do a great deal of mischief. It is true that the farmers of the United States should realize the fact that the crop of 1859 and 1857 are a thing of the past, and that, without some great catastrophe, which is not very likely, they will never realize again. The wheat crop during land is increasing more rapidly than the consumption of wheat: Russia alone, in a year or two, will add more than 100,000,000 of bushels she exported before the Crimean war. Civilization, and its first fruit the wheat plant, are spreading over the fertile West. Australia, it is clear that, in the year 1865 or 1866, a fabulous wheat crop in England or our Western States will create less than the proportion in the price of the staple. The fertility of the soil in Australia is likely to produce as with a surplus each year; but the main question which our wheat growers must rely hereafter will evidently be that of transport.

It is yet too soon to speak confidently of the harvests of Europe. At our latest accounts late July showers and cool summer nights had proved injurious to the wheat in France, and likewise—though in a less degree—to the crop in England. The crop in Ireland, source of such chief among the potatoes in Ireland. We shall know the true amount of the damage that has been done to the wheat before the end of August, when it is ready for shipment. If that damage have been serious, an advance in breadstuffs must follow. But the present unprecedented ruling prices can only be sustained by combinations of speculators.

We will assume that the latter hypothesis will prove the true one. In this case the true policy of the farmer will be to send his grain to market as soon as it is ripe and ready for sale.

By retaining it in his barns in the hope of higher prices he runs a risk which no prudent man should encounter. If the crops of Europe fulfil the promise they have held out all summer, there can be no substantial advance in breadstuffs in the autumn or winter; nor, November, and December the quantity of grain seeking sale on all the markets of the commercial world will be overwhelming. Though a few farmers may manage to hold out many will be compelled by their necessities to sell, and these will keep prices down. In addition to the loss of interest, and risk of fire, storm, and theft, which attends the keeping of grain in store is liable, the farmer who holds over till next spring may find himself compelled to part with his property at much lower prices than those which are now current.

The famine prices of 1856 have engendered a grievous habit among farmers, and that is the cost of growing wheat. Farmers are heard to declare that they can not afford to raise wheat under a dollar a bushel, and that they will not. If any catastrophe should raise the price of wheat to $4 a bushel, we should in like manner hear, on the part of those who had grain, that not possibly be raised under $2 or $3 delivered on the field. The fact is, that in ordinary seasons the wheat crop becomes a staple. By the journey of a railroad, 50 cents a bushel is a very handsome reward to a thrifty farmer for raising and delivering wheat. Under such circumstances the wheat crop will not cease to grow rich by raising wheat and selling it at 75 cents a bushel in Chicago, or $1 a bushel in New York. We know that a great many farmers don't think so. But it is the case, nevertheless. The British farmers took Heaven's witness that they could not grow wheat, and their families left to starve, if the English corn laws were repealed, and American wheat admitted to the British market. Yet they did; the corn-laws were repealed, however, and the British farmers are more prosperous than ever. So will be with ours. That great men who are now refusing to send forward their grain to be sold here at $1.25 the bushel will live to grow rich by growing wheat at 50 cents delivered on their farm.

It is a very simple matter; but, like many similar questions, the final settlement must probably be left to experience. Hundreds of farmers, we dare say, will shut their ears to argument, and, with visions of 1856 prices before them, will hold back their grain this fall, live in miserable poverty all winter, and sell next spring at 25 cents less than they could obtain next month. Old as the proverb is, there are but few among us who truly realize the worth of the pregnant saw—"A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush."

THE BRITISH EAST INDIAN PROBLEM.

MANY months since, at the time the British Parliament passed the Act formally uniting Hindostan to the British Empire, we expressed the opinion that the remedy was not radical enough, and that the great East Indian danger, which Metcalfe and Napier had foreseen, and which had, in fact, burst forth in armed rebellion in May, 1857, was by no means averted.

The latest intelligence from India looks like an earlier confirmation of our views than we anticipated. The white troops, lately of the East India Company's service and now in the service of the Queen, have mutinied at Meerut. It does not appear that blood has been shed. The grievance which caused the mutiny was the attempt of the Government to press these men into the British service without giving them the bounty invariably allowed to recruits. This, of course, is a small trouble which can be easily overcome by the disbursement of a few pounds. It is the incidentals and the surrounding circumstances which give importance to the event.

Thus we are told that the very whisper of a mutiny among the white troops roused the Hindoos of Meerut and of the whole city to assumed excitement. They shook off the patient apathy which, since the victories of Lord Clyde, has been the chief characteristic of their demeanor; they watched the mutineers with feverish anxiety; they collected in knots and clusters, and conversed together in unusual tones; people hurried into Meerut from neighboring villages, apparently prepared to see startling events. On the other hand, Lord Clyde's precautions, necessary and prudent as they probably were, were calculated to lead the Hindoos to believe that the British were frightened. Large masses of Queen's troops were mustered around the mutineers, who were encamped on the usual show and parade. Heavy guns were placed in position, and canister and grape were served out to the gunners. Every preparation was made for a sharp contest.

Of all this the Hindoos will naturally say that Lord Clyde has had a narrow escape, and that many of the white men are on their side and against the Government. Such a conception is not likely to weaken their natural tendency to renew the rebellion.

There is in truth something subtle in the beauty with which the Queen's troops have removed the government of India from one room to another in the city of London, and then sat down satisfied that they had cured the evil which caused the late rebellion. If they had paused, or even proposed, one single measure for the improvement of the social condition or the political rights of the native population of the Presidencies, one might perhaps approach to an understanding of the manner in which it is that they are reposing. But it is a fact that not one word has been said in Parliament, not one ordinance has been passed by the Queen in Council, that is calculated in any degree to mitigate the grievances which roused the Hindoos to armed resistance against their masters. India is still governed, as it has been for the last twenty years, by Englishmen in London. Their decrees are still carried out by Anglo-Indians in India whose only feeling toward the Hindoos is one of contempt and hatred. The back-bone of the new Indian policy, as of the old, is how to sell the most cotton goods to India, and how to get the most money from its people in return. The only legislative measure that has marked the administration of the new Indian Department has been a series of frantic attempts to raise money by expedients which would have disgraced even Austrian financiers.

At this rate it will not be long to test the value of the new system; and we are not surprised to hear that, though the condition of affairs in Europe prevents the employment of a large a force as possible at home, within the last month large reinforcements have been dispatched to Calcutta.

A NEW SPANISH PAPER IN NEW YORK.

WE have received the first number of El Noticiero, a new Spanish-American journal, which has been established in this city under the auspices of the ministers of those republics. It is intended for a weaker paper, being published six times a month, on steamer days for Cuba and Europe, and forming thus a Spanish-American paper after the plan of Wilmer & Smith's European Times. The new journal has a business look, and we wish it long life and prosperous times.

THE LOUNGER.

BOZ.

MANY uncertain rumors have at length assumed the form of a distinct and apparently authorized assertion, that Mr. Dickens is coming to America again, to read in public.

It is more than seventeen years since he arrived in Boston upon his previous visit. He had written "Pickwick," "Oliver Twist," "Nicholas Nickleby," "The Old Curiosity Shop," and "Barnaby Rudge." He was not yet thirty years old, and the most popular and famous of living English authors. The personality which he had infused into his writings—an irresistible fondness—a frank loyalty to all that is generous in human nature—excited an unequal enthusiasm every where, and he was received in America as nobody else ever was or will be. We stuffed pudding into his mouth and into our own eyes and ears and souls, and bore him along in a kind of ecstasy. It was the beatification of Boz.

He had his own purposes, perhaps, in coming here, and when he returned he wrote a book about us. The world—all but us—had a right to it, for that it was bad policy. He wrote freely what he thought, and inspired a universal and generous sympathy. On the first of January, 1842, there was perhaps no man in the world who had so universal a personal acquaintance as Charles Dickens. On the first of January, 1843, that personal feeling was quite gone. He was only one more author to be duly a distinguished novelist. Since his visit nearly—albeit inoffensive title of Boz has been quite forgotten, and for many years Charles Dickens.

This change in popular way of coarse partly the reaction of our own enthusiasm, of which we were possibly a little ashamed, and so made our idol our scape-goat. But the reaction was in the good dispute, and although the lapse of time has softened the feeling, and in a very generous mind and delights in him for itself, that fresh, loyal, and lyrical acknowledgment is gone forever.

Nor is it to be denied that twenty-three years of active literary life have worn off the wonder of novelty—albeit the freshness of genius is perhaps utterly liked, although he commands more readers and support than—and that recent private events in his life, both domestic and economical, have not fostered a kindler feeling toward him upon this side of the water.

All this is perfectly familiar, and is current in all conversation. Whoever says it, therefore, is telling no secret; and merely to say it, however firmly and fully in the rare genius of Dickens—as he regards him—is not to say that many other factors—who finds in his imagination a Shakespearian affluence, and in his deep human sympathy a Shakespearian tenderness, and who has had a critical famous man—need not affect to be unconscious of the sources and the nature of his fame.

There will be no repetition of the old reception, but there can be no doubt of the success of his tour. Mrs. Kemble's account of Mr. Dickens's reception are a foreshadowing of Dickens's in reading Dickens. It is just the thing he will like, and it is very many judge from unanimous report—perfectly done.

A VISIT TO A JAIL.

A FEW days since we went to a county jail. It is attached to the court-house, as is frequently the case in the country; and the jailer and his family seemed to be living very comfortably. The house door opened into the yard of the house, and upon entering it, we observed a small building, not much taller than the breadth of the door, with a cell upon each side upon the ground-floor. In the door of each cell there was a small open space through which to communicate with the prisoners. The cell to the right was empty, and the prisoner to the left as we was perhaps ten feet broad by twelve long. It had one high grated window opening into the yard.

In this cell there were four prisoners. Two of them were, they informed us, boys of about fifteen years of. We saw no beds; but there were some pieces of crockery, two or three stools, and some old newspapers scattered about. The men had on their own shirts and trowsers. They crowded to the square in the door when opened, and when we discovered of whose visitor it was they fell back. The oldest moved restlessly up and down the cell; another remained up on a stool, with his head and arms on the sash; and the other, who was the companion of the subject of this sketch, sat in the corner of the cell near the conversation. They all had the same weary, listless air. They seemed to be consumed by the monotony of their lives. The oldest could only take a turn in the corridor it would be some relief. They could not read, and they had no work to do, and no happiness. But day after day, month after month, to turn like wild beasts in the little cage, and to be told that there is to do so for a year, or even the minutes, was intolerable. They could read, and what glimpses of the world they had caught was dulled and destroyed by the state of mind produced by such imprisonment. The young man we were at the door was severely ill at the time, momatory disorder; but he had remained in the cell with the rest, and had been treated there during all the time.

The oldest prisoner was a man of perhaps forty years of age. "I is my offence," he said, as he nervously paced up and down, "that this sort of thing does no manner of good to any body. It does to this," touching the one we had come to see, "it will come out a good deal worse than he came in. It will make him more fit for the state prison."

For is this mere caging of offenders a system of revenge, or of improvement? Is it supposed to be such a boy who is foolishly led astray, as this one was, by the threat, and throw him into a hole, long but little for or no exercise, and then suppose that it is done any thing but make a criminal of him? Nothing of the sort is the result it takes. If men break the laws they must be punished; but then they must be punished in such a way as not to make them worse than they were before laws. It is often said that prisons must not be made palaces, and that many a man would commit a crime for the sake of securing the shelter and food of a jail. But facts do not sustain the theory. Imprisonment under any circumstances is so repulsive and frightful to every body, that it is found people would rather beg and run the risk of starvation than go to the poor-house, which is a kind of pauper prison—yet without the shame of it. Why then should we not adopt as deep an instinct in human nature as this itself.

There must be laws, and there will be lawbreakers. There must, therefore, be punishments. But certainly the object of punishment is not revenge, but reformation. In the case we have described, what are the chances that a boy, overwhelmed by the stern shame of trial and imprisonment, who is shut up in a little room with other offenders, all of whom are exasperated by incessant confinement and tortured with illness—having nothing to do but to talk over old projects and to devise new ones for the release of each other—a boy will escape chastened, or with the slightest inclination to be said of him that he has been positively the better for his on account to settle with society? The question is not whether it ought to be so, nor whether he has not had tracts given him to read during his imprisonment, but what, under the circumstances, is the effect of the whole system of the method of punishment which society has inflicted upon him.

Is there any reason why the system of social labor by day, and solitary confinement by night, which is pursued in the State Prisons, should not be followed in the County Jails? It will take more care and trouble, we know. So it does to have railroad bridges sound instead of rotten. It would be a judicious outlay of the public money to pay the chief practical manager of the jails over the State as much as District-Attorneys and Attorney-Generals receive. And it would be an act of Christian charity, and of good citizenship, for every body to inform themselves of the actual condition of the prisons in their counties, and of the harm of the prison influence upon the convicted and the unconvicted. Such as is a Parish, an outcast—that nobody cares for him.

JOSEPH MAZZINI.

"YOU promised to die," said Joseph Mazzini, shaking his long finger from the tribune at the members of the National Assembly at Rome. The black hair had been silvered in a few days with grey. "You promised to die. Come with me." But they did not promise. It is not so easy always to hard to perform. Mazzini felt that they would not support him—that his own death would be a useless, others might justly say, a criminal sacrifice—and he escaped to England.

Far ten years he lived there, always sad, always brooding, always hoping for Italy. Contemned as a visionary by the money-making Anglo enthusiast, even less practical than Kossuth—the stern Roman republican has led his melancholy life in London, in the misery and isolation of exile.

These are the ten years during which the splendid success of Louis Napoleon has made many hopeful eyes. The years during which his natural genius has been accepted as the mood of a great mind whose sympathies are the sympathies of Europe, instead of the stealth and shrewdness of an adventurer, with a single purpose only. Three months ago, when Napoleon entered Italy, there was many a man who said, "Poor Mazzini! now he will go." In the same way he was generally attained. What can a dreamer do? Here is a man who understands men; and the sympathy with Mazzini has christened "the man of lies" will prove to be the liberator of Italy."

The stern Republican replied, only, "Beware of Emperor! Beware of King! Beware of Pope! Liberty and Italy for Italy."

The good world shrugged its shoulders, and fixed its eyes upon the practical man who was to liberate Italy.

That liberation terminated at Villafranca. The Austrian possessions, with modifications, are the ransom of the restorer of nationalities, and of his friend and ally, the destroyer of nationalities, have been followed by Savoy and Nice. In a word, the practical copious eloquence—a strain that flows like a stream of lava—has ended in smoke and ashes. Mazzini, what he foreshowed, that Italy has gained nothing, that Austria and France have struck hands, and that Sardinia is the victim. He has exhorted to instant union, and active resistance, for a united republican Italy. But he does not believe that every student of affairs must feel, that it is only to be purchased by a Continental religious war.

For he understands between two nations the principle of absolute human authority in religion is irreconcilable in the same country with the principle of the democratic principle in politics. The doctrine of individual liberty must be consistent. Now among a people, politically, religiously servile, and intellectually debauched by the despotic or absolute principle, what hope is there of any thing but not a profoundly radical, and therefore very gradual, movement? When the fountain is muddy, why try to purify the stream?

Any effort to be permanently effective in Italy must be a religious effort. Where priests rule, republicanism can not prosper, and priests will rule in Italy until the revolution is organized upon the principle of reform. But to do that is to fight the same of a new thirty years' war. And when it is remembered that the priestly power has the means of tradition and of political terror, the change may not be so hopeless.

Mazzini's fiery proclamations will sound only like splendid but melancholy music.

THE RAILROAD CRISIS.

THE simple point for simple people to meditate upon just now is the financial disaster which every few paying railroads in the country. Most of them are heavily mortgaged. The directors have to decide whether they will take the risk of appropriating the earnings of the road to keeping it in good repair, and thus paying the interest on the mortgages; or whether they will take the risk of first paying the interest in full, and then, if any thing be left, keep the road in proper condition. They know that if the interest is not paid every six months, the mortgages will be foreclosed and the road virtually sold out. They do not know that if the road is let to its natural wear and tear, any particular bridge will give way, or any other special accident happen at any special place. They do not know it. They merely know that the road is always wearing out at every point. But they will run for luck the next six months. So, as in this case, they may or may not pay the interest; but they deliberately murder nine innocent people.

How long do the American people intend to be conscious of all, propose to put themselves at the mercy of railroad companies, whose sole object is to make their road a paying property instead of a safe transit? It is clear that there must be more stringent laws passed upon the subject. After the expectation of some awful calamity, there will be a crowdsheet. And it is said that Mr. President and Superintendent Wilkins will then write out his personality safe in the neighborhood of Schuylkill. And then the moment the intelligent community believes that the laws are not careful enough of human lives confided to corporations, that moment there will be a bill presented by the people against those corporations.

It is easy to say that laws will not help the matter; but it is as foolish as it is easy. We do not ask any or post facto enactments. But let railroad directors hereafter understand, in this State at least, that they have assumed personal and personal responsibility, and subvert a person, if he has been insufficient or a bridge insecure, and the indictment will not lose either in consequence of parsimony, or ignorance, or carelessness—might, in fact, have been avoided—let the Directors be liable to imprisonment, and a fine exceed which every stockholder shall feel aching in his own pocket.

If, under the form of a corporation, we can not contrive to respect human life, let us try a disposition and knife again. Where the Government can not protect, the railway corporations are.

Even if the present excitement come to nothing, the duty of vigilance remains. The deferred paper cents and vested interests are powerful things. But human life and human rights in general are more powerful, and in the long run, although very slowly, they are sure to carry the day.

NEWSPAPER HONESTY.

IF a gentleman request something that he has learned of another, and that another knows that it is untrue, he hesitates to repair the injury he has done by a public declaration. He says and shrugs that he was mistaken, and that the story is untrue. This is simple decency. The man who would decline to do so in this manner either believes that the other lies, which is an account between them, or else he is a coward. In either case as to prefer that the other should be injured by a public falsehood than that his own reputation for infallibility should suffer.

Why should not a public journal behave with the same propriety? If it is—There was an earthquake in Charleston yesterday," and it transpires that it was misinformed, why not say so instantly instead of endeavoring, "Oh, yes, there was an earthquake in Lisbon during the last century; and our correspondent probably means that we may hear a noise in his cellar." For such a wretched equivocation a man would be kicked out of decent society.

There is nothing more comical than the newspaper assumption of infallibility. Every day it deceives nobody. When the morning paper comes, we all know that it is Bobo who writes on the Seattle Business, and Cole who does the heavy political thunder, and Dobs the sarcastic quibbling. And Fobs and Nobs are the critics of the Prima Donna and the light comedian after the play, who write the eulogies of opera and drama. It is all rolled into one, but we distinguish. We can recognize under the roar and the baby mouse only the hand that wrote, who, like a good fellow, wants to be recognized and have the pudding of praise as well as that of pop.

Well, now, when Scott says what is not true about somebody who lives in Portland or San Francisco, we all know that he writes a mistake, and we try to say, he prints a letter which he has received, or the substance of it, and in good faith. He says openly that he has been told so and so, and that being he finds in his exchanges or in his customary correspondence. We by all understand it, as he knows that he may make misstatements. He, Scott the thinker, is a man like the rest of us. We hope, and that is a gentleman, and a gentleman, and when he printed the rumor writes that it is untrue. Now there is nothing in this but "honor bright" "You lie," and stick to his statement; or he may say "We are very sorry to have reported an untruth, and it would be unseemly to continue."

If he say the first, he probably has his reasons. If he say the last, he makes an honorable apology. But if he try to worm between the two—to wriggle out a sort of explanation which leaves, and is meant to leave, a false impression that it wasn't exactly as he said, but the thing was really so after all—why, then he is a coward, and we know that his wish was not to tell the truth but to injure somebody in Portland; and every body says what a mean weak Scott has turned out.

LONGFELLOW'S LETTER-BOX.

—WARE, ILL. C. Yes this is the first of the Sixth Canto of the Walter Scotts "Lay of the Last Minstrel."

—Brooklyn, Conn. Thanks, and no dead.

Who never to himself hath said

"Why was my name not spelled?"

—PALE TRY. The entire number of new books, new editions, and translations published in England every year, is about five thousand. This includes pamphlets, and makes a rate of nearly fifty-six books a week.

—Ah, yes, that is the fate of tender feeling. But they do not seem to the Lounger so striking as to claim the necessary space for print in his column. He thanks Dotta for his courteous note.

—CORNERA, PENNSYLVANIA. "A Woman's Poem" was written by Richard Henry Stoddard.

—ACHEON. There was never any thing certainly known of the fate of the Collins steamer Pacific.

—WARRENSBURG, Connecticut, after saying that the line "Now night's tide her curtain down," was by Mrs. Donald Clarke, adds that "a pretty full account" of him is to be found in Mrs. Childs's "Letters from New York."

MORE ABOUT THE GOLD DISCOVERIES OF THE ISTHMUS.

ANDOVER of the interesting golden relics found in the province of Veragua, near Panama, and of which illustrations were printed in the Weekly of 6th August. It is a mistake to suppose that the fact of their occurrence, in considerable numbers, in the Indian graves of that district is a late discovery. Large quantities have been taken out, from time to time, for many years past; and I was informed by the late Governor of the Bank of England that several thousand pounds' worth were annually remitted from the Isthmus, as bullion, to that establishment. Most of the figures which I saw at the Bank were exceedingly rude, but there were a few among them of relatively fair design and good workmanship. None, however, were quite equal in either respect to some relics dug up during the construction of the Panama Railway, of which I inclose accurate drawings. They were found about seven miles from Panama, on the left bank of the Rio Grande, six feet below the surface of the ground. Trees between two and three feet in diameter were growing over them.

Figure 1 is engraved one-fourth of the size of the original, and consists of three bells firmly attached to a disk, which is supported by a hollow handle wrought in the form of a bird. The gold of which the whole is composed is slightly alloyed with silver. It will be observed, that in form not general style of ornament these bells coincide with one of those found at Chiriqui, and figured in the Weekly. Their workmanship, however, is superior. Persons gifted with acute ears profess that they are able to distinguish a nice adjustment of tones in the bells, which certainly give out a very clear, liquid sound. The balls inclosed in the bells seem to be of a different metal—perhaps silver.

Figure 2 is a perspective and vertical view of a kind of boss of pure gold, engraved one-fourth size of original. The disk is composed of two thin plates; the one below is attached to a short, hollow cylinder; that above is turned down at its edges, so as to lap over the rim of the plate below. The star in its centre is formed by cutting through the plate, but the other ornaments, which are in relief, appear to have been struck up with a die, and are exceedingly regular and chaste.

Figure 3 is a golden box, of full size. It is cast, and the lid fits over the flange of the body with great exactness. The gold is considerably alloyed with copper, and the box is much worn on its exterior, as if it had been used for a long time.

Figure 4 represents a number of beads of gold found at the same place. They are thin—in fact, simple shells, easily crushed between the fingers—and were no doubt originally plated over beads of bone or shell, which have decayed. I have found beads of this kind plated over in like manner, but with silver instead of gold, in the mounds of our own country. In connection with these was also found what appeared to have been a hollow globe of gold, not thicker than writing paper. It had probably covered a globe of wood or ball of other material, which had disappeared.

Figure 5, drawn one-fourth size of original, is a singular relic, the purposes of which are obscure. It is of cast gold, and quite massive, consisting of a series of pairs of birds' heads, rudely designed, all evidently cast in the same mould or from the same model, and afterward soldered together. To facilitate this process, each pair was cast with a flange at each lower corner, pierced by a hole, through which was passed a stiff golden wire. By this device the various sections were kept exactly in place while the soldering was effected.

Figure 6 represents the same relic reversed, so as to show the hollows left in the casting. These are still partly filled with the fine, black, indurated sand which formed part of the matrices in which the sections were cast. As illustrating the processes of aboriginal art, these relics are extremely interesting. A number of others were found at the same time and in the same place, but were scattered by the workmen who discovered them.

I possess a number of other relics of gold found near Antioquia, in New Granada, to the southward of Panama. Of these Figure 7 is a superior example. The design, which is in relief, seems to have been worked out in gold wire, on the back of which was cast a thin plate of gold, so as to give the whole the appearance and solidity of a single piece.

The same device seems to have been resorted to in producing the ornamental line on the back of the Serpent, Figure 8. We find it again in Figure 9, where the outlines of the features of the face, and the arms, hands, etc., were all evidently formed of gold wire, to which the flat surface was afterward cast. Figures 10, 11, 12, and 13 are of full size, and display a certain degree of skill. They all have little rings at their backs for suspension; and, like Figure 7, were doubtless designed as pendants, either for the nose or ears, or on the breast of their ancient owner.

Farther to the southward, in Peru, the aboriglines were remarkably skilful in working the precious metals. They cast them in moulds, soldered them, inlaid them, and reduced them into leaves. They were generally cast hollow, and with such perfection as often to leave no trace of the joints of the mould. They sometimes cast objects combining gold, silver, and copper, in alternate bands, so well inlaid and united as to appear to form one mass. Figure 14 is an example of this kind of work. The body of the figure itself is composed of a mixture of silver, antimony, and tin. Occasionally, in vases and other open vessels, they embossed figures on the outside by hammering from the interior, as shown in the accompanying vase,

FIGURE 7.

As to the origin and date of the golden relics found at Chiriqui there is no doubt. Columbus, when he discovered Chiriqui Lagoon, in his fourth voyage, found all the chiefs and important people decorated with these and similar ornaments, which, as he says in his relation, gave him "great promise of the richness of the country in gold and silver." Hence he named the district Cantilla del Oro; and hence the coast came to be known as Costa Rica, or rich coast—a name still preserved as that of the State of Central America adjoining the Isthmus. He mentions particularly, among the ornaments worn by the chiefs, great plates or mirrors of gold suspended on their breasts, "which they would neither sell nor exchange." These are unquestionably the "golden plates, from three to twelve inches in diameter," mentioned by Dr. Oviedo, and one of which an engraving is given in the Weekly. Columbus adds that the Indians cast gold with some degree of skill, "but in no way equal to the Spaniards." He says also that "in all the regions around Veragua the Indians inter with their chiefs, when they die, all the gold which they possess. Thus it is," he continues, in a moralizing strain, "that all men seek gold; they barter all they can spare of their produce for gold; gold is excellent; with it they lay up wealth here; and they even take it to their grave, as a comfort to their souls hereafter. Alas! for the follies of men who know not that gold is only valuable in its use, not in its accumulation."

FIGURES 10, 11, 12, 13.

Singularly enough old Diego de Porras, who accompanied Columbus, has given us a list of its various articles of gold which the Admiral obtained at the Rubio del Aburrente, as Chiriqui Lagoon was then called. He says:

"The number of pieces of gold which we obtained, great and small, was 220—weighing altogether 9 ounces, 3 ochavas, 7 tomines, and 1 grain

[equal to about 80 ounces]. There were also 12 pieces of guanin [gold much alloyed], weighing one mark and six ounces. Two pieces were not weighed—one a large tube, and the other a plate like a mirror."

In the last accounts from the "grave diggings" of Veragua, mention is made of the discovery of a "crown or hat of gold;" which reminds us of some of the articles which were taken from one of the principal caciques of Veragua, whom Columbus made prisoner, enumerated by Porras. He says: "Among these were five large golden mirrors, and two coronas, or crowns."

So much for the discoveries of the conquistadores: they robbed from the living; our modern adventurers rob from the dead. E. G. SQUIER.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER XLVI.

FROM LAWRENCE NEWT'S BACK WINDOW.

IS Lawrence Newt to be blamed that he stood many a long half-hour at the window of the loft in the rear of his office and looked up at the window where he had seen Amy Waring that summer morning? Thomas Tray and Gabriel Bennet were not surprised. They would not have been surprised if he had done things much more inexplicable than that. Young Venables declared that he expected to see the day when Lawrence Newt would drive an omnibus in

LAWRENCE NEWT SEES THE REASON WHY.

Broadway, and carry passengers for nothing, or pull it himself on the same terms, for the horses.

Then merry laughter rang in the counting-room of the India merchant. And if he entered while the music was still sounding he did not scowl nor march into his inner room with conscious unconsciousness of all his clerks; but he bowed and smiled, and asked Venables how his sister was, or Gabriel how Ellen liked the fairy poem of the "Culprit Fay," of which he had sent her a manuscript copy, which Ellen's cousin, Amy Waring, had made for him; or Thomas Tray stopped him to say that Mrs. Tray thanked him for the basket of wonderful fruit, and to add, that the box of tea was the most delicious and timely thing that was ever thought of.

It was perhaps owing to these little eccentricities of character and conduct that all Mr. Lawrence Newt's clerks looked for him with an indestry and sympathy which were of the greatest assistance to the business. Thomas Tray told his wife that he was positively glad when business was so pressing that he had to stay at the office until late in the evening.

"Thank you," Mrs. Tray would say, with a slightly hurt air.

Thomas, intent only upon gratitude, would reply, "My dear!" in such a tone of incredulous surprise and indignation that his wife knew was fifty, if a day!—who had set this little mare to entrap a lucky word or look, and with a gentle reproach, to be immediately smoothed up, said, ostensibly,

"Of course, Thomas."

Upon which it has been known to happen that, interrupting the order of his remarks, this decorous and exact book-keeper walked straight up to his wife, who might be washing her tea-cups, and kissed her—actually kissed her, although they had grandchildren—and with as much love and respect and admiration as he had kissed her thirty years before, when they were first married.

Do you suppose that Mrs. Thomas Tray disliked a man who was indirectly and remotely the cause of that kiss? Nay, when he, and whose, had been in the very cups she was washing?

The humble houses of Venables and Bennet also—were they not loyal to Lawrence Newt? He was a bachelor. Amy Waring was sure, and said, that he was born to be a bachelor; but he had homes enough, for all that—homes in which he was loved like a friend, a brother, an uncle, a father—there was only one other way in which he could be loved.

He had often enough wondered what that particular errand of mercy had brought Amy Waring to the house in the year of his story, and he had gazed at the window, but never saw her there again. He had understood her beckoning gesture as an indication that she did not wish him to go to himself the trouble to come up, and that she did not choose to have her visit thus interrupted.

It was natural enough. Had he not been ready to run with shame when Amy Waring had caught him upon a charitable errand at the Widow Simmer's? And suppose she had not been! Very certainly he would not have been standing now and looking up curiously at the window in the upper story of the dingy red brick house behind his store, because very certainly he would not have known Amy Waring.

When he came to this point in his reflections his hands sunk into his pockets and his eyes clung to the window with immovable tenacity.

While thus the master Lawrence sat dreaming, the clerk Gabriel, in the office, was fast mastering the mystery of the machinery of business. It was becoming very clear to him. Even double entry did not fly his comprehension. He became familiar with the names of ships and merchants; and in the evenings he pored over the aloud books of travel, which unfolded to him the character and natural history of foreign lands. To a youth who handled Asian and East Indian commodities, and wrote about them in invoices and journals and copies of letters by day, it was romance to read by night of the countries which produced them and the manner of their preparation.

The candid energy of Gabriel in the pursuit of his business impressed his father with due respect. The smile that flickered over his face grew positive as he looked at his son and felt his influence.

"It really comforts me, Gabriel," he said to his son, "to see you so interested and devoted. It is a real, real comfort."

His voice of course was low and lingering. But as he spoke he looked at his wife and Ellen with such an air of pitcous benignity that Gabriel's eyes filled with tears.

Sometimes in the intervals of work together or in the evening, after sitting with half-closed eyes for a long time, gently humming a monotonous old song she sang, Mrs. Bennet said, in a drooping voice,

"Gabriel, I am glad you love your mother!"

There was something in the tone that prevented its sounding droll to the son, who merely remarked, in a laughing way,

"I should like to know how I could help it."

The father made no reply. But one morning for a long time, while Gabriel went on reading; Presently the voice, which seemed to proceed from his eyes, so vague and dreamy was it, remarked,

"She was born to better things!"

Then the weary face looked about the humble room, and the old, sunken eyes rested upon Gabriel. Gabriel looked inquiringly, but his father continued, gazing into the fire and swinging his foot:

"I tried very hard—and—and—"

The voice died slowly away again. Then the speaker looked up at his son kindly, and smiled uncertainly.

Gabriel tried to learn from his mother if his father had any particular trouble or remembrance; but she said No, softly, and her eyes filled with tears.

"No; nothing that can be spoken of, dear." So Gabriel returned to work from time to time, and the home to which he nightly returned was all the brighter for his coming.

"Gabriel, you should have seen Miss Hope Wayne last evening at Mrs. Brickle's. She was beautiful. There's nobody in the world like her," said his mother on the evening after that great entertainment.

"Not Susan Amy?" inquired Ellen, incredulously.

"Well, Ellen, Amy is different. Amy looks like a lovely woman, and Hope Wayne like a good goddess. Gabriel, you must have seen her at Delafield's."

Seen her at Delafield! Why, what else was Delafield in his mind but a succession of Hope Wayne? Gabriel fed his fancy and his regrets upon that remembrance. If he found himself—for he did find himself—getting profoundly interested in his business—if he actually awoke in the morning singing, and the unconscious roses of robust health persisted in blooming in his cheeks—if he found himself ready to be invited to parties of all kinds, where he was exposed to the charms of young women, and especially if he immensely enjoyed the contemplation of them—and all these enormities he did discover upon a strict review of his conduct—he would not severely—he denounced himself as a light, heartless impostor, and informed himself in the plainest manner, that he was not worthy to love a noble woman. Ivanhoe would not have done so, Sir! Romeo would have scorned such recklessness; and was the German knight, Sir, who went into a monastery because his mistress refused to a convent?

With this style of self-accusation, growing constantly severer as the occasion became more frequent, Gabriel made himself theoretically quite wretched.

Would it have consoled him to know that Hope Wayne never thought of him—that she had never had any other feeling for him than an emotion of pity when he lay bruised in her grandfather's house, and a half-conscious vexation with him for having been hurt by Abel?

But while she forgot Gabriel, and had long forgotten him, it had been the struggle of months to forget Abel Newt. In truth, to forget him was impossible. When he first came to her it was not as a stranger, but as the hero long announced by vague hope and desire. The quality of her feeling for him could not be estimated by the duration of their actual acquaintance; for their feeling annihilates time. When they were separated her imagination made him the man she loved. No noble or manly trait was wanting in the portrait in whose presence she continually lived. Could she be worthy of his life-long love? Could she possibly satisfy any aspiration of that lord of men and of her soul? Would the service of all her powers, all her gifts, all her existence, lavished upon the altar of love for him, not be too insignificant for his acceptance? He loved her. Would he prize her? She did not ask. To ask would be a reproach upon him. Therefore it did not occur to her to ask. Her love was absolute faith in him, and utter distrust of herself. He loved her. That was sufficient—that was heaven!

And all this was unconscious in the mind of Hope Wayne. It was the great high-tide of life rising and swelling into every sentient nook of feeling, covering every top of thought and hope, until it was a universal whole. And she was lost in love!

Do you think how exquisitely organized, how fearfully and wonderfully made, is the human body? It defies exposure, disease, fire and water. Is it tougher than oak-fiber? more recuperative than the earth itself? Yes, yes. But the prick of a needle will let in death.

When Hope Wayne heard with her ears and saw with her eyes the falsehood of Abel Newt, it was but a moment's sight, but a moment's hearing—but it was all over.

And ever since then her life had been a struggle, and a mortification. There were great heroes at Balaklava and Thermopylæ, at Plattsburg and Waterloo, at Saluda and Magenta, at Bunker Hill and Saratoga; but what do you think of the hero at your elbow going about in daily affairs and holding his tongue? Joan of Arc be blessed forever; but how about the heroine whom no poet has ever sung—whom no painter or friend suspects—who, all alone, under a mist of silence and smiles, is not fighting the visible enemies of her country, but the invisible, sly, insidious doubts and despairs that storm her heart, her pride, and her conscience? It is comparatively easy to be great upon a great stage, with a great world looking on, and Cleo ostentative, with her pen in hand and her page before her. But to be great in life, unknown ways requires another heroism. Look at Wordsworth or Charles First can die painlessly, and with a parlatic pen-stroke, in the face of mankind—but in the hospital on Ward's Island lies an emigrant woman dying in the slow, fiery torture of cancer in the breast—while on the other within thousands of miles—scarcely her language understood—she is calm, so cheerful, so unmurmuring. No, Regulus was not the only hero.

Hope Wayne read a great deal. She worked a great deal. She studied a great deal with Amy Waring. The friendship of these two young women was beautiful to see. Amy was so sagacious, so clear and effective; Hope was so true, so candid, so ardent. But the ardor—the quality that so readily call enthusiasm—when it is united with imagination—was gradually suppressed. Hope and Amy had long talks about the books that Lawrence Newt and Arthur Merlin brought with them and read at their little meetings. Amy was always enthusiastic about Shelley. Lawrence Newt held by Milton, loved Cowper, and was fervent at Byron, whom Hope Wayne now defended in a very feeble way, and with a leaning toward Shelley. Amy insisted that to read Shelley was to dabble in a cold stream scooping up sand that you thought was gold, but proved to be only glittering gravel. Arthur defended his poet dexterously and declared that it was not to much what he said as the quality of pure beauty, of intellectual morality, into which he led the way, that made him so charming. Byron's warmth of the sultriness of midnight, he said; but Shelley is the morning—not altogether clear and of a healthful freshness, but still daylight in which is sky-lark, and singing.

Lawrence Newt smiled, and secretly believed with Amy. But when Arthur, with his deep, rich music, read some exquisite strain of his favorite, there was not one of the party who did not agree that the singer was a poet.

Ostensibly poetry was the subject of the meetings of what Lawrence Newt called the Round Table.

"We have our King and Queen, our Merlin the Enchanter," he said.

"A speech from Mr. Merlin," cried Amy, gayly, while Hope looked up from her work with encouraging, queenly eyes. Arthur looked at them eagerly.

"Oh, Diana! Diana!" he thought, but did not say. That was the only speech he made, and nobody heard it.

The meetings of

DRAWING NEAR TO PARADISE.

the Round Table were devoted to poetry, but of a very practical kind. It was pure romance, but without any thing technically romantic. Mrs. Waring often sat with the little party, and, as the worked, talked with Lawrence Newt of earlier days—" days when you were not born, my dears," she said, cheerfully, as if to appropriate Mr. Newt. And whether she made this kind of allusion Amy's work became very intricate indeed, demanding her closest attention. But Hope Wayne, remembering her first evening in the society, trained her eyes again with curiosity, and as she did so, Lawrence smiled kindly and gravely, and his eyes hung upon hers as if he saw and what he had thought never to see: while Hope received that she would ask him under what circumstance he had known Pinewood. But the opportunity had not yet arrived. She did not wish to ask before the others. There was some secret that was involuntarily respect, while we only know that they are secrets.

Perhaps Lawrence Newt had this feeling as he looked up at the window from the back of his lofts. He was certainly as curious about that room as Hope about his early knowledge of her name.

"I'll put an end to that and settle this matter," said the merchant to himself.

But he did not stir. His hands were in his pockets. He was standing as firmly in one spot as if he had taken root.

"Why should I go up? Why do I want to go up? It is so very extraordinary that a young lady's chariots should bring her into Front Street?"

He asked himself these questions, but he did not answer them. For he could not quite make it out as ordinary case of chivalry. When Amy Waring had seen him from that window she had been a little startled to think how near he was to something he did not suspect, and she was very anxious that he should not see she was startled.

Therefore, of course, he did see it. There was a peculiar energy in her movement telling him not to come up, which excited his profound curiosity. Perhaps if Mrs. Waring, instead of her daughter, had looked from the window and made the forbidding motions, Lawrence Newt might easily have restrained his curiosity and forgotten the circumstance. But it makes a serious difference who looks from windows. It makes all the difference in the world who it is that has secrets. Lawrence Newt supposed that he wished abstractly to know who lived in that room. It was a melancholy self-deception. He wanted only to know what secret Amy Waring was keeping in that room, and why she kept it. And yet he did not wish to ask her. There comes a time when a man wishes to ask nothing of a woman of whom his heart longs to ask every thing. While there is a minor reserve to be asked, there is a secret between them. Shall I pull out her secrets, like green fruit from the bough, he asks himself, with a kind of bitter severity and self-scarsm; when the time is full will they not fall into my confiding hands of themselves as ripe fruit falls upon the grass? Yet, oh that the time were full!

Something of the kind surely was in the mind of Lawrence Newt whenever he stood at that window. Something of a strange conflict was going on in the mind of the merchant—a man so shrewd and sound that even old Jacob Van Bonzenberg respected him—at conflict so soft and strange that you might have expected it in Ellen Bennet's heart or May Newt's—possibly in Hope Wayne's or Amy Waring's.

"Yes—upon the whole, I'll just run round," thought Lawrence, without the remotest approach to motion of any kind. But his fancy was running round all the time, and the fancies of any one who watch windows, as Lawrence watched this window, are strangely fantastic. He imagined every thing in that room. It was a woman with innumerable children, of course—some old money of Amy's—who had a kind of respectability to preserve, which intrusion would injure. No, no, by Heaven! it was Mrs. Tom Witcher, old Van Boozenberg's daughter! Of course it was. An old friend of Amy's, half-starving in that miserable lodging, and Amy her guardian angel. Lawrence Newt mentally vowed that Mrs. Tom Witcher should never want any thing. He would speak to Amy at the next meeting of the Round Table.

Or there was another strange idea. What will not an Indian mercantile dream as he goes from his window? It was some old teacher of Amy's—some old music-master, some French teacher—dying alone and in poverty, or with a large family. No, upon the whole, thought Lawrence Newt, he's not old enough to have a large family—he is not enough of a man of the world—he has to struggle with the world—he was a gentlemen in his own country; and he has, of course—it was natural, how could it be otherwise?—help it?—he has fallen in love with Miss Wartington. Those music-masters and Italian teachers are such silly fellows. I know all about it, thought Mr. Newt; and now he lies there forlorn, but generous and very handsome, sighing sweetly to his guitar, and reciting Petrarch's sonnets with large, melancholy eyes. His manners are refined and fascinating. His age? About thirty. Poor Amy! Of course common humanity required her to come and visit him. It does not suffice. Of course he is desperately in love, and so very pretty. Poor Amy! She always something about the kinship of pity? I really think, says Lawrence Newt to himself, that I ought to go over and help that unfortunate young man. Perhaps he wishes to return to his native country. I am sure we ought to. His native air will be balm to him. Yes, I'll ask Miss Waring about it this very evening.

He did not. He never alluded to the subject. They had never mentioned that summer moonlight exchange of glance and pressure which was so curious an effect on Lawrence Newt that he rose stood quite as often at his back-window, looking up at the old brick house, and the front-window, looking out over the river and the ships, and leaning over the spires—at least it seemed so—in Brooklyn.

For how could Lawrence know of the took that was always in the house devoted to the use of those beneficition by forever fragrant upon those united sinner?

"I am really sorry for Hal Battlebury," said the merchant to himself. "He is such a good, noble fellow! I should have wagered that Miss Waring would have been so very happy with him. He is so true in every word and act. His figure, in tastes—in sympathy altogether. Then he is so manly and modest—to imple and true. He is very—very—sorry."

And so he mused, and asked and answered, and thought of Hal Battlebury and Amy Waring together.

It seemed to him that if he were a younger man—about that of Battlebury, say—full of hope and faith and earnest endeavor to do the right—as young generous people will—he would be the very thing he should do—to fall in love with Amy Waring. How could any man not be her and love her? But if she were not for me as he did—if he saw that she was always kind and friendly, and very kind and friendly—that the flowers were left in melancholy state upon the parlor table—that her gracious manner was a gift of generosity—an inspection of the world between stars—life would be a little dreary then, he thought. A brave man does not live [illegible] in that case—! Yet, if she loved him—!

It was curious that his reflections grew vague at that point.

"If so lovely a girl did not return the affection of such a young man it seemed to me, of course, what else could it be?—it would be be cause she had deliberately made up her mind that, under no conceivable circumstances whatever, she would she ever marry."

As he was not satisfactory conclusion Lawrence Newt paced up and down before the window, with his hands still buried in his pockets, thinking of Hal Battlebury—thinking of the foreign youth with the large, melancholy eyes pining away in a hell of pain and poverty. Petrarch's sonnets, in the miserable room opposite—shrinking from that strange coldness of virgin hearts which set the ardent of love and cold such.

And, springing before the window, he thought of his own boyhood—of the first wild passion of thin young heart—of the little hand he held and the soft darkness of eyes whose light misled him—seeming the palm-trees—the flaming river—and, at the very moment upon which he was unconsciously gazing, a face appeared, with a black, embroidered veil about the head, and looking down at the street between the houses.

Lawrence stared at it without moving. With windows were closed, nor was the woman at the other house bowed down. She looked, indeed, scarcely seen her fully before she turned away. But he had recognized that face. He had seen the woman he had so long thought dead. In a moment Amy Waring's visit was explained, and a more heavenly light shone upon her character as he thought of her.

"God bless you, Amy dear!" were the words that unconsciously rode to his lips; and he turned into the office, Lawrence Newt told Thomas Frost that he should not return that afternoon, wished his clerks good-day, and hurried around the corner into Front Street.

CHAPTER XLVII.

ABEL NEWT SEES SLIGO MOULTRIE REMOVED.

The Pioneers were at Bunker's. The pet, good-hearted Grace, full of fun and flirtation, revered that New York was life, and all the rest of the world death.

"You do not compliment the South very much," said Sligo Moultrie, smiling.

"Oh no! The South is home, and we don't compliment relations, you know," returned Miss Grace.

"Yes, thank Heaven! the South is home, Miss Grace. New York is like a foreign city. The tumult is fearful; yet it is only a sea-port after all. It has no metropolitan repose. It has not time to rest. It is strange."

"Then I like trading towns, if that is it," resumed Miss Grace, looking out into the bustling street.

Mr. Moultrie smiled. Quiet, refined, intelligent, and accomplished, in Europe you would have supposed him a nobleman.

He supposed himself one at home. Not offensively, but with that half-shy sense of superiority which gave the high grace of self-possession to his manner. Lawrence Newt, who pervaded his whole character. The symmetry of his person, the delicacy of his hand, his carriage, a sweet voice, a handsome face, were valuable allies of his intellectual-accomplishments; and when all the forces were combined, Lawrence Sligo Moultre very fascinating. He was not audacious nor brilliant. It was a quiet, and an active nature. He was not rich, although Mr. Boniface Newt had a vague idea that every southern youth was rich. Mr. Newt's opinion of a fine old family, like the Newts and Hallsons and Moultries, was that, if a Newt or Moultrie, born to be a gentleman, but born poor, was resolved to maintain his state.

Miss Grace Remer was the only daughter of the celebrated Louisiana planter, Godefrei Pioner. She had been educated in the best schools, and at thirteen, then she was sent to Madame de Feuilles's, and had remained almost constantly at the north until the previous year. She was in the school and entered society simultaneously. She was now nineteen years old. Her large, dark eyes, profusely curling black hair, olive skin, pouting mouth, and pretty neck. Very rich. Very pretty, and very much like Abel Newt's Flower, who believed with enthusiastic faith that life was a fairy-land, but who was very shrewd and very kindly also.

Sligo Moultrie understood distinctly why he was staying at the house of Boniface Newt.

"The roses are in bloom at your home, Sligo, my friend," said Abel.

"Yes, I suppose they are, and a dreadfully lonely time they're having of it. Southern life, very pretty, very much like Abel Newt's Flower, but it is a little lonely, isn't it, Mr. Moultrie?"

Grace said this turning her neck slightly and looking an arch interrogatory at her companion.

"Yes, it is very lonely, Miss Grace. But then there is so much going up to town and traveling that, after all, it is not so much worse than here at home; and a man ought to stay at home a good deal, and not be a vagabond."

"Thank you, sir!" Grace began mockingly.

"I said 'a man,' you observe, Miss Grace."

"Man includes woman, I believe, Mr. Moultrie."

"In two cases—yes."

"And they are?"

"When he holds her in his arms, or in his heart."

Here was a sudden volley masked in music. Grace Pioner was charmed. She looked at her companion, and bade him "a vagabond all winter in New York; but there were few more pronounced vagabonds than he felt at home with him as a compatriot. Yes, this would do very well.

Mr. Moultrie Pioner had scarcely mentally installed Mr. Sligo Moultrie as first flirter in her corps when he saw the unmistakable head-dress at the window from the street, more dangerous even than when she had seen it in the spring. Thank you, sir! Mr. Sligo Moultrie was right, but and bowed to her with an admiration which Mr. Moultrie could be took more than real.

Abel Newt was not a passive, but an active man.

The next moment he was in the room, perfectly coeur d'ion, sparkling, resistless.

"My dear Miss Pioner, how charming you seming. I felt it as I approached Bunker's. I said to Herbert Octopus (he's off with the Shrimp.) 'Thank you, sir, I'll walk. I feel as if the air [illegible] that I could fly.' I was morning under very [illegible] and I said, 'I will breathe it.' I was the best fruits and the earliest flowers are, I ask Sligo Moultrie."

Mr. Moultrie bowed.

"The first rose of the year blooms in Mr. Moultrie's greenhouse," continued Abel, who galloped on, laughing, and seating himself upon the nearest chair. He had his eyes were lower than the level of Grace Pioner's.

She smiled and joined the hunt.

"He talks nothing but 'ladies' delights,'" said she.

"Yes—two other things, please, Miss Grace," said Moultrie.

"What, Mr. Moultrie, two other cases? You always have two more."

"Better two more than too much," struck in Abel, who saw that Miss Pioner had put out her darling little foot from beneath her dress, and therefore he felt that her eyes upon it, with an admiration which was not less upon the lady.

"Heavens!" cried Moultrie, laughing and looking at them. "You are both two more and too much for me."

"Good, good, good for Moultrie," applauded Abel; "and now, Miss Pioner, I submit that he has the floor."

"Very well, Mr. Moultrie. What are the two other things that you talk?"

"Tennis and archery," said the young man, rising and bowing himself out.

Miss Pioner, you love tennis, the inspiration of my found Sligo, who was never so brilliant in his life before. How generous in you to come and shine on this wretched town! It is the glory of Sahara. Miss Pioner descends upon it like a star. When have you been?"

"At home, in Louisiana."

"Ah! yes. Know ye the land where the cypress and myrtle are? I have been there, but it comes to me here when you come, Miss Pioner."

Still the slight persiflage to cover the audacity.

"And so, Mr. Newt, I have the honor of seeing the plantations of your friend Abel Newt this winter."

"We will not our enemies say of us, Miss Pioner?"

"You have no enemies," replied she, "except, perhaps, Mr. Moultrie, whom I have not seen this winter."

"Who? who? I insist," said Abel, looking at Grace Pioner earnestly [illegible] and dropping his eyes upon her very pretty and very low-ringed white hands, where the eyes lingered a little, and remained in the pause which ensued.

"Except, then, your own sex," said the little Louisianian, half blushing.

"I do them no harm," replied Abel.

"No: but you make them jealous."

"Jealous of me! Jealous of the young man, in a lower tone, and more seriously.

"Oh! [illegible] of—of—Grace, what I hear from the girls," said Grace, fluttering a little, as she remembered the conservatory at Mrs. Bonifacio's, "that you are very much like Abel Newt's Flower, who believed with enthusiastic faith that life was a fairy-land, but who was very shrewd and very kindly also.

Sligo Moultrie understood distinctly why he was staying at the house of Boniface Newt.

"The roses are in bloom at your home, Sligo, my friend," said Abel.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE LATE STATE ELECTIONS.

At latest advices there seems to be little doubt of the election of General Houston, by a large majority, as Governor of Texas. In Tennessee, the Opposition has gained considerably on the last election. Some say that three Congressmen have been gained. Some say that the Democratic majority will be reduced to one. In the Legislature the Democrats have a majority of 12 in both Houses. In Missouri Gamble the Opposition have gained on their opponents.

A NEW TERRITORY AT FIRE'S PARK.

From the Kansas gold region we learn that a movement is on foot for the organization of a Territorial Government. A Convention was in session at Pike's Peak on the 6th inst. to select for the purpose of taking the necessary steps to that end.

THE WISE LETTER.

Governor Wise has issued a letter to the Richmond Enquirer, in which he acknowledges having written the letter to Governor Packer, which has been published. After from the latter, stating that the publication was unauthorized, and that he was sorry for it.

Mr. Cassidy, of the Albany Argus, denies emphatically that he was the author of the letter.

BATHING AT NEWPORT.

The Newport correspondent of the Providence Journal gredicts a lively season at Newport. Bancroft is there, and Longfellow is expected. Greeley is also to visit it. On the 4th, with many others well known to the world, a letter gives the following description of morning bathing scene:

"The bathing this season is charming, and hundreds, thousands, refish and enjoy it. From morning till night the bathers are to be seen in the water. The ladies all have the strongest attachment. The early morning is especially interesting. Then the ladies in groups take a ramble to them good, appear as the sands at a somewhat later hour. Then the ladies in groups take a ramble to the bathing-houses, and, after a short time, the secretary bathing-house, into which many hair forms are to be seen, is a busy place. It is a most delightful time to excite appetite.

"The hair is protected by a cap of oil-silk.

ship hat, bound with red carpet-binding, answers for covering for the head. A pair of loose pants and a flannel roller, studded with something lighter, the Bloomer costume, and of course the bathing dress of the ladies should be—for comfort and convenience. Think of seeing Miss Grundy in the water with a pair of pants on! Helen might have erived, dancing in the surf and the bathers as they walk to their bath-houses. Many of the bathers as they walk to their bath-houses. Many of the bathers as they walk to their bath-houses. Many of letters from the Count Sartiges report his health still better. His departure was not expected on the 1st inst. The Queen spoke of his arrival as a handsome and kind attention to this country.

Mr. Dallas is at the Preble Houses at the White Mountains, and, under date of August 3d, that the Republican party, in all twelve persons, have set out for their New York homes.

The correspondent of the Providence Journal, we presume, Dr. Hall, in addressing to the recent decision of the "Broad Church," says, "the world needs something more than a common religion."

The Boston Herald learns that a well-known and wellcapitalized adventurer has gone to Europe to buy the stock of the Tri-Mountain City, has both sold within and put out of bonds all the stock he could, and will, on a change of the decision he has been attached to the amount of $10,000 he already has in his hands, and has just passed from the Police Court for his arrest on a charge of embezzlement.

The Evening Post announces on the authority of a private letter which arrived by the last steamer, that Mr. Charles Dickens is still this country's debtor to the amount of one hundred dollars for the readings from his own works that have been so successful in England.

According to one of the Sunday papers published in the city, the Rev. Dr. Cheever was assisted by Select Orator, the Rev. Mr. Chapin, in a public settlement of all fashionable crimes, in only half an hour, at the modest sum of $500, for the whole.

The New Times says a young man, named Scott of Norwich, Conn., was robbed of a pocket-book at Sherry's Hotel, New York, on Monday evening last, on route for Troy and Niagara. The lucky pickpocket received him to the Troy steamer and his trunks were placed on board. They were found on the 4th inst. and have been found by his friends in the baggage-room of the steamer, but the young man has not been found or heard from either drowned or murdered.

S. F. B. Morse, the inventor, has determined to leave Venice and return to Virginia, for the purpose of making that state his permanent abiding place.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE PEACH QUESTION IN PARLIAMENT.

On the 28th, in the House of Commons, Lord John Russell made his statement in regard to the negotiations. He would have postponed it if there had been any prospect of being able to announce the definitive settlement of the affairs of the Continent before the approaching close of the session. He was glad to say that the relations of the Emperor of France had determined to place the treaty on a very much easier footing. The treaty of Villafranca of peace, as proclaimed by the two Emperors, he could not at present find out because it was not to be found in the archives of the state. It was not to be found in the archives of the Foreign Office, and he had not yet received the official copy of those conditions of peace which were offered to the neutral Powers. The most important part of the treaty, however, related to the future of Italy. The organization of the Emperor Napoleon to England to enter the congress was to relieve the Emperor of all effort in Italy, quite irrespective of the terms of the treaty of Villafranca. England had not proposed to join the Congress, and would not until they saw what the result of the Conference at Zurich would be. But the Ministers did not bow absolutely as Italian Conferences, but only from Austrian Conferences, to the Congress one. He deeply felt the sensitive state in which the Emperor Napoleon was placed, and that the existence of the struggle in the mountains of Northern Italy, England must know how it was prepared to act. He could not, therefore, declare the policy of England with respect to the restoration of the Dukes of Tuscany and Modena, as England was not in a position to say forthem on their people without their free consent. He rejoiced to say that the King of Naples was not going to get an end to the system which prevailed under the late King, and since that time had been carried on by him. There was a treaty about to be made at Vienna, which a ministerial paper in Paris had announced, and he gave to arrange the basis. He believed that the Emperor of Austria was willing to make concessions to the Government of Italy, and that the Emperor Francis Joseph would be a Congress, but he thought it would not be possible for him to attend it. He was sure that no person from such an assembly if there was a chance of procuring by the liberty of Italy and the welfare of Austria and Europe.

Mr. Disraeli expressed the wish that Lord John Russell had been more explicit, particularly as to any terms that might have been offered to the Duchies of Tuscany. He reiterated his objection to England having any thing to do with the Congress, and hoped that no pledge be bound by the treaty of Villafranca.

Mr. Cobden regretted that England had submitted to terms to Austria, which were to be imposed by the Congress. He thought that the Government, at the head of the French Republic, had acted in accordance with the chance of communication, and had submitted none to Austria, at the same time that the Government of England saw the views of the French Government, and the English gave to an entire approval. He thought it would be impossible for the Government to engage in the Congress with the spirit of the noble Lord's address was shown.

A HONEY-MOON CUT SHORT.

The following incident is told of a navy officer who had just married a daughter of a clergyman in England:

"After the nuptial ceremony the 'happy couple' left town to spend the honey-moon; but scarcely had they departed when a telegraphic letter was hastily received by the clergyman's residence, directing him instantly to join his son-in-law at Brighton, as he was ordered to sea, and the following morning on foreign service. No time was lost in dispatching the reverend gentleman to the married couple, whom, much to their consternation, it was discovered, but the evening before separated, and with the intention to stay as constant attendant the British officer, that, by the time he was ordered to sea, he might be enabled to bring his wife without inconvenience. The marriage was a love match, and the ratio of sons likely to forty-three as born at the time of the marriage, rendering his being left to return to the shelter of the parental roof till the arrival of more peaceful times."

FRANCE.

REDUCTION OF THE FRENCH ARMY.

The Moniteur of the 20th ultimo contains the official announcement that the Emperor has decided that the army and navy shall be reduced to a peace footing without the least possible delay. The necessary orders for this purpose have returned to France and renewed their peaceful occupations. The reduction commences with the class of 1858, which will afterward be made definitive for all those men who have served their seven years with the colors.

The administration of marine is said to have received the necessary instructions for the progressive and speedy disarmament of all sailors, who, having already served six years, have been called to join the fleet within the last six months.

THE DISTRESS CORDIALE TO BE PRESERVED AT ALL RISKS.

The Paris correspondent of the Herald writes: "I believe I am not mistaken in saying that there is a passage in Lord Derby's letter to Lord John Russell so nearly resembling it in effect. His Majesty told me last night that it was his wish to the immediate completion of Savoy with France, and that he thought the annexation of Savoy would follow." Lord Malmesbury, also, at the Emperor, says the Herald, "has stated to Lord Cowley, that if England has a heavy war budget in 1860 the fault shall not be laid to my door. I wish for peace and I will maintain it. The most intimate union and England ought not to be hypercritical at the steps France may take in endeavoring to restore the prestige lost in 1815. It is only natural that I should desire the consolidation of the new kingdom of Italy. I do not even doubt that it (it is to) lead to a friendship with England."

THE EMPEROR AT HOME.

The first remark of the Emperor of the French, on entering his family assembly, in town him at St. Cloud, was said to have been:—"Haines had in store for me, indeed, a welcome. I have been to Paris, and I could find another to welcome me." The Paris correspondent of the Times says that the Emperor's reception by the people on his return to the capital was the strength which the Paris demonstrations could give. The Emperor was met at the gates of Paris by the Municipal Council, and by the Prefect. He is much beset in figure, and apparently much exhausted in power, especially in the face. He seems to have entirely to repair the injury done to the doctors' work.

Subsequently to the Paris demonstration we have been seen in Paris since his return from the war, but the usual spirit, which has been lacking in the city since he began wears the palaces of his woodcuts turned up and still, with the Empress, and the Imperial Prince in the carriage drawn out, as they did before his marriage. What, if any, the Emperor's intentions may be, are not known. It is very inauspicious sign, perhaps, as it is a reconciliation of his Majesty's attention to business.

MR. HOME IN A CRAZE.

MR. HOME, the well-known spiritualist, says the Medical Times, has lately taken pin his feet into it at Rome, and has consequently had to be carried off to a fashionable active individual, made a sudden grab at the spirit, and was hurrying off with it, when Mr. Home, first Mr. Home's foot in his hand. On another occasion a cellist a glass of water, which he threw over the fellow-creature was being put to rights after its cessation.

ITALY

THE POPE ACCEPTS THE PRESIDENCY.

Rome letters to the 30th ult. state that the 23d of July. His Holiness the Pope received the French Emperor's letter, in which he was informed of his presidency, which lasted two hours. Letters received announce that the Pope has accepted the office, and that the Confederation has been accepted by the Pope. A notification of the fact has been sent to the Powers, all of whom voted favorably for the Presidency.

The Pope's reply to the letter of Napoleon we may assure our readers that his Majesty the Emperor Napoleon has written to the Emperor Napoleon, the representatives of the Pontifical States, and particularly at the Legations. The Pope's reply is considered by the Papal Court will find in this relation a state of things sufficiently favorable to the Holy See, and that the Pope will not only be used to the Emperor Napoleon, but that there will be no intervention in Central Italy, either by Austria or by France, and that the occupation of Rome is not far off.

DISTURBED STATE OF ITALY.

Chevalier Farini, Governor of Modena, has, by an order of the King of Sardinia, withdrawn from Sardinian service, and has been appointed Governor of Modena. Modena is divided into the following districts:—Modena, Reggio, Mirandola, Correggio, and Sassuolo. The Chevalier Farini accepted a provisional capacity to maintain public order, and to prevent the threatened anarchy of Modena, which is to pronounce on the future of the Duchy.

The result of the deliberation on the question of annexation to Sardinia is expected to be known in a week or one hundred and forty-one places, including Leghorn and Florence, have declared unanimously in favor of annexation, against fifteen negative votes.

The Sardinian Government has given its consent in favor of his son is officially confirmed.

The Duke of Modena and his ducal troops are to occupy the Legations, and the Pope will not be able to retain the present where they are. Novaras else will there be any Austrian troops left.

The London Times quotes a letter from Milan, which says that the Austrian troops are to leave the Papal States, and that it is possible Venetia may rise in insurrection.

The Milan correspondent of the Times says: Speaking of the proclamation to the peace, Garibaldi uttered the remarkable words: "I have done all this for the King of Sardinia, but he has refused him.

THE CONFEDERACY.

The London Times correspondent says: "H. Walewski was on his way to Vienna with the draft of a treaty, the draught of a plan of confederation, and submitted it unofficially to the Austrian Government for consideration. It is H. M. Walewski evidently taken for granted the restoration of the Italian princes expelled from their dominions, and the establishment of the Duchies of Parma something like the Confederation of the German Sovereign States. By the Villafranca treaty the nominal or honorary presidency of the Confederation of Italy to the Pope will be filled in reality by the Kings of Sardinia and Naples, who will command the forces of the Confederation, exist without the means of defense, a federal army will be formed, to which each state will furnish a contingent. It is, however, it may be fairly considered whether it will be a defense for Italy or for Austria.

A ZOUAVE IN LUCK.

A young Zouave of Saillans, Drome, named Margot, who was wounded at Palestro, has addressed to his parents the following letter, dated Verneil, the 16th: "Perhaps you will, perhaps, preside me in announcing to you the unexpected honor which, in the midst of so many populaces, I have received from the hand of the Emperor himself. I was in the hospital at Verneil, and his Majesty was about to pass through Verneil on his way back to France, I hastened to dress myself, and went to the Prefecture, where I waited for him with a wife my crutches—I went toward the railway station. The good inhabitants of Verneil, who had collected in a crowd at the station, exposed to take pleasure in letting me pass, my crutches and a half little soldier, standing the spot at which the Emperor was about to stop to take refreshments. Scarcely had I arrived when the Imperial train arrived. The Emperor was accompanied by the King of Sardinia, and their Majesties were greeted with the most enthusiastic cheers. After having received the compliments of the authorities, the Emperor cast a glance around him and related the people gratuitously. I had the good fortune to be noticed by him. He came to me, made a sign to me to approach, and said to me, 'Courage, and so, you are wounded? Yes, Sire.' 'Where?' 'At Palestro.' 'Ah, at Palestro, well! What would did you receive?' 'It was in the leg, Sire,' and I showed him the wound in my thigh and my left hand. 'Ah, yes, you are getting better?' 'Yes, Sire; I am beginning to walk a little.' 'That is much.' Then he made a sign to me to approach still nearer, and in the midst of the most profound silence, he detached from his breast the decoration which he wore, placed it with his own hand upon my breast, and said to me, 'Courage, my child, you are a brave soldier.' I could not express my gratitude nor even my sobs, and two large tears rolled down my cheeks. Then he said to the General who accompanied my grabbing, for I could not speak. The Emperor embraced me, and I kissed his hand. I was filled with emotion. And ten striking scene followed when the Imperial train had left. I was surrounded by a half, personages of the town entreated me to offer their congratulations to the Emperor, and I was very fond of my wife. But what was still more striking was that the Emperor had left me his cross. I was decorated with a little cross, and I was proud. However, you must come to the point and dine with me.' I refused, however, would not hear me, but made me get into a carriage with him by his side, and I, the son of a shepherd of the first persons in the place long present."

AUSTRIA.

PROJECTS OF REFORM.

The correspondent of the Independance Belge thus speaks of the projects of reform entertained by the Emperor of Austria:

"All the provincial councils of the empire are to be convoked simultaneously, in order to have a series of suggestions on the amelioration which they may think necessary to the internal organization. The Councils will ratify in the presence of their deliberations, and may make known openly and sincerely to the Emperor the wishes and wishes of the population. Important financial and military reforms are likewise projected."

The War Department of Vienna has decided that the four army shall be maintained at present on a war footing in Italy. Its effective strength is estimated at 400,000 men. The Austrian Government continues to give on the march to take their former cantonments in Galicia and Hungary.

SARATOGA IN 1777.—THE CELLAR OF THE HEDDESEL HOUSE.—[See Page 538.]

SARATOGA IN 1777 AND 1859.

THE contrast, on the two preceding pages, of Saratoga in 1777 and the same place at the present time is sufficiently striking to attract general admiration.

Eighty-two years ago, as every one knows, one of the great contests between the English and the Americans for dominion on this continent was drawing to a close at Saratoga. The Americans, under Gates, had won several victories over the British and Hessians under Burgoyne; but it was by no means certain that whether he would be able to keep his word and give a triumphal feast at Albany at the close of the season. The Hessians were discontented; the Americans were flushed by success, and eager to bring the campaign to a close. The battle of Bemis's Heights had convinced them that without succor from New York Burgoyne must surrender.

That terrible conflict took place on 19th September. On 7th October Burgoyne perceived that he must risk another battle, as his troops were suffering severely from short allowance. At the head of 1600 men he advanced to make a reconnaissance in the American lines, and was promptly attacked. The result of the battle was the surrender at Saratoga. It is a scene during the terrible fight on that day that our artist has depicted.

The commander of the Hessians, the Baron Riedesel, was accompanied by his wife and children. The Baroness, a woman of equal intelligence and courage, followed his army in all its marches, and kept a faithful diary of what she saw and heard. On that 7th October, she says, "a cannonade was being opened against the house in which I had taken refuge, we were obliged to remove to the cellar for refuge; and in one corner of this I remained the whole day, my children sleeping on the earth with their heads in my lap. . . . Eleven cannon balls passed through the house. . . . My reflections on the danger in which my husband was exposed now agonized me exceedingly. . . . The ladies of the army who were with me were Mrs. Harnage, a Mrs. Kennels, the wife of a lieutenant who was killed, and the lady of the Commissary. . . . We sat together deploring our troubles. . . . Scarcely one entered to announce bad news." There was whispering among her companions, with deep looks of sorrow, "I immediately suspected," says she, "that my husband had been killed. I shrieked aloud." She was notified by another that nothing had happened to him, and was spoon to understand by a sidelong glance that the wife of the lieutenant was the unfortunate one; her husband had been killed.

Our artist has, we think, seized the dramatic point of this thrilling situation with much skill.

The contrast to this scene will be recognized by all who have had the good fortune to spend a few days at Saratoga, and to witness a ball at the Congress Hall. The gilded saloons—the softened lights —the delighted remembrance happy group of gentlemen—the tired infant, half-startled from its dream of pleasure by fairy music—the tender mother gazing with speechless anxiety and satisfaction at her gay young family—the fond father bending over his group to whisper a word—all these form a contrast to the scene in the Riedesel Cellar more striking or more touching than this?

ANNETTE.

BY C. H. WEBB.

Oh! my heart was a well,
And it rang to its cell
With a tremulous joy, Annette,
When the birds came to tell
What your blushes said well—
Did you tire of your toy, Annette?

One still night a star fell,
As the angels know well—
From my soul to the dust, Annette;
Like the dew from the dell
Which disappears ghost-like,
So from thee went my trust, Annette.

Of thy once-witching spell
But nail memories dwell—
So the sunset mists flee, Annette:
Still my heart is a bell;
But a toy muffled knell
It is tolling for thee, Annette.

A ROMANCE THROUGH A BED-ROOM WINDOW.

CHAPTER I.—THE WINDOW.

IN the window itself there was nothing remarkable; it was an ordinary French window—difficult to open, difficult to shut, and secured by a complicated fastening—which no rusty to use on the fourth floor of any hotel in France. So, when the host of the Hotel de Grand Cerf directed my attention thereto, it was not so much the window as the view to be seen from it that he wished me to take notice of.

But I was not in a mood to enter into these estimates; I was hot and cross, worn out with travelling, and suffering from a neglected sprain. So I quickly came to terms with M. Bouvin, cut short the enumeration of its beauties, advantages, and comforts I had secured to myself, and dispatched him in quest of a doctor to examine the injured limb.

The result of the examination was not of a nature to allay my irritation of mind. The doctor informed me that I must keep my room for some days, and not stir beyond its precincts until I had his permission; otherwise, a severe lameness might follow. To my intense disgust I was obliged to concur in the reasonableness of his advice, and give my word that I would not attempt to leave my room until his visit was withdrawn.

My third day of imprisonment dragged slowly to an end. Watching the light fade off the pinnacles of St. Basile opposite, and feeling gloomily certain that I could predict in advance every occurrence of the next hour, my eye suddenly caught the flutter of something white up at one of the narrow windows in the tower. I thought I could make out the outline of a woman's figure in the shadowy nook, but it was growing dusk. The figure, whatever it might be, disappeared, and a few minutes after I beheld a girl of graceful form issue from the church porch and descend the steps with light steps into the square. She hastened quickly along the pavement, stopped before a large, dull-looking house—the Archbishop's palace, I believe—and entering the arched door-way, was lost to my sight.

Then came on a solitary old man with a stooping figure, carrying a violin-case under his arm, followed on her steps; then a light shone out from a window on an upper floor.

Every night I had remarked a light in that same window, long after all the other lights were closed and darkened. Hitherto I had taken no particular notice of the fact, supposing it to be the chamber of some student or artist; but now that I began to speculate on the matter which lively incident, I suppose, had caused the commencement of others were extinguished; nay, it was still there when, in the middle of the night, I awoke from sleepless bed; and I watched it, as I lay, growing pale and sickly before the dawn.

The next day I observed the old house in the corner of the square with close attention. It differed from its neighbors chiefly in the fact that the green were all closed, and only the upper rooms inhabited. It had a dull, secretive sort of look, which gave an interest to the building. The next night young girl I had seen last flitted across the tower. She let not from the window in the tower; for she had left another way. I saw her enter the house the door after her? Why did that light burn there at those unholy hours?

At seven o'clock in the evening I saw the door of the gloomy house over the way open in a cautious, quiet way, and the young girl came beckon a hackney carriage from the stand near. He darted his head forward, as the door communicated with the silin-case, which he deposited in the carriage; then he reappeared with the young lady, and drove away quickly away. . . . Something in their returned home; and again, as during their absence, I saw the light glimmering in the tower.

The next morning my eye caught the following paragraph in the Courrier de L——:

"OPERA.—Last night the fine 30th July just past will be ever memorable in the lyric annals of L——. Never since Madame Gabrielle Gerard made her appearance has so great a treat been offered them as was afforded us last night by the delicious voice of a young girl, Mlle de Lamonnerayer. Her exquisite voice, a pure soprano," etc.

Was it possible that this was my incognita?—Yes; I did not doubt it for an instant. There, in that gloomy old house on the other side of the square, dwelt the singer of last night, and I had all this enthusiasm in the critic. And now, perhaps, the mystery of the light in the window was solved. The hours when all the city was quiet and at rest had been devoted by the young orgete to preparation for her début. It was evident that I was destined to be the topic of the day in L——. Pierre, the waiter, and M. Bouvin, the host, had given me "a most extraordinary thing about it," said the latter, "it that no one has ever heard of this wonderful singer till last night. She has dropped almost among us from the clouds. There run a thousand reports also of her origin, but nothing that is certain. No matter; she is a true genius, whatever she be; and moreover must make haste to get well to go and hear her."

But my doctor shook his head on my proposing that I should go that very night, and, having finished orders with Pierre to use force, if necessary, to prevent me having my chamber. When evening came again, and the setting sun flamed like crimson bike, in the windows of distant houses, and all the children were playing in the square under my windows, I saw the figure of the young girl once more up at the window in the tower. Still as the statues in the niches over the arched door-way, that fronted me in the middle of the square, she stood, with folded arms, gazing at her from spot and gargoyle, and the flash of autumn sunset on her white dress. Her head was clasped together, and her gaze, stretching above the roofs, was fixed on the horizon. Was this the spot in which she had stood on the evening of my arrival? or did she only seek a purer air, a deeper quiet than could be found below?

The night had flung its shadow over the tower, when I saw her slowly descend the great flight of steps that led into the Place, pass quickly across the street, and so glide quietly away to her home.

From that hour the identity of the young girl with my recluse was established in my mind beyond doubt. Every night that it was announced that Mademoiselle would sing, I saw the light open, the hackney-coach stood at the door of the gloomy house—the young girl, muffled in shawls and rings, the visits to St. Basile were paid as before.

One moonlight evening, exhausted by the heat and glare of a long summer's day, I had fallen asleep in my chair by the window. When I awoke the distant church clocks, peeping over roofs, were just striking twelve. One after another they clanged out into the night, some with brazen, some with silvery, some with cracked tones. Sounds waves died off on the purple air, the silence grew more solemn than before. Gazing carelessly on the moonlit Place, I was suddenly startled by a sight that roused me to wide wakefulness. There was something creeping along the roof of the gloomy house on the opposite side of the square—something that crouched and crawled along stealthily in the moonlight. Now it was hidden in the shadow of the high chimneys, now it was gliding along the very parapet. Suddenly this shapeless mass arose and revealed the figure of a woman. There, on a mere ledge of stone, she stood looking calmly and lonely into the square. The figure tossed its arms wildly above its head, as if in glee; and then through the still night-air came a loud discordant laugh. My heart stood still as I gazed at the apparition. A few moments dragged on, and then I beheld another figure glide along to the woman's side, lay a firm grasp on her robe, and bear her away through a window in the roof. They disappeared. The moon shone peacefully as before. All was still save the splash of the fountain under the lime-trees, and a few minutes after I half doubted whether I had not been dreaming.

Indeed so improbable did all this seem to me, next morning that I decided to ascribe it to disordered fancy of one suddenly roused from sleep, and, as was subsequently forgot all about it, as I should not have been many days after when my doctor gave me permission to leave my room.

The first use I made of my freedom was to hasten to the booking-office of the opera in the Rue Herold and secure a place for that night. The house was crowded when I took my seat at night; but among all the excited spectators not one perhaps awaited the raising of the curtain with such anxiety as myself. As I confidently expected, Mademoiselle Durras and my mysterious neighbor were one and the same person. I recognized her instantly. When the burst of applause that greeted her appearance had subsided she commenced her first air. From that moment I was all ear. Never before had I heard such a voice as hers. Hers was the voice of a thrush, guided by human sense and feeling—clear and liquid as the outpouring of a lark. I cannot describe it. Such description I could not control. In the grand scene at the close of the opera, when the actress vowed eternal love, rose with the part, until a picture of heart-broken woe, that had all the terrible truth of reality, was presented. . . . I cannot tell how I applied it without emotion. I left the theatre in a glow of enthusiasm.

Too excited to retire for the night, I walked up and down under the lime-trees, recalling the powerful scene I had witnessed. Suddenly I heard the sound of wheels on the rough pavement of the Place. I expected to see Mademoiselle Durras and her father (from his tender solicitude I knew the old man could be no other) return to their home.

At last the carriage drew up, and the young lady was near enough to their door when they alighted to see a tall, powerfully-made young man, with gold ear-rings and a high-crowned cap, holding a light in the entrance. I could hear Mademoiselle Durras's voice as she spoke to him.

"Well, Marthe, we are home again, and so tired!"

The light shone full on her face; it was pale and jaded, but beautiful as ever. They paused a moment; the man closed the street door, and I heard bolt and bar drawn within. The last echoes of their footsteps died away in the house; just a gold there still in the shadow of the door-way, haunted by the vision that had suddenly risen before me of the strange woman who had clambered on the roof.

Was Mademoiselle Durras a somnambulist?

CHAPTER II.—THE MIDNIGHT INTERVIEW.

My long confinement had rendered the four walls of my chamber on the fourth floor of the Hôtel du Grand Cerf so irksome to me that I spent the whole of the following day in the open air. Even when evening had given place to night, and the world of L—— had forsaken the promenade on the Grande Place, I still remained out under the trees, loth to exchange the freshness of the night-breeze for the stifling atmosphere of my room under the roof.

I was watching the gradual disappearance of all the lights from the upper windows—all save one, which kept its solitary vigils and burned—when the sound of a door opening attracted my attention. In the dark, gloomy door-way of the house, with his cane in his hand and a cloak over his shoulder, as though prepared for a midnight walk. He crossed into the middle of the square, began pacing up and down under the trees with slow and stopping pace. In the course of my solitary walk on many times, when he approached the fountain where the grim water-god in the centre sat pouring a noisy cascade into the basin. The old man stood, and gazed into the dark pool before him, with his silver netting on his head, and his cloak about him. I saw him bend down his head, and heard him weeping. There was something very sad in the sight of this old man's grief. I should have withdrawn, but I had been a stranger thus revealing some secret sorrow; and my long confinement and loneliness made M. Darron and his daughter seemed to have established a sort of tie between us, and given me the privilege of a friend. It was therefore without hesitation or reflection that I gave way to the impulse upon me.

"Monsieur Darron," I exclaimed, going quietly up to him, and placing my hand on his arm, "your grief pains me much. You can, I hope, rely on me as not a great a stranger as you suppose."

"Who are you?" he said. "What do you know? How comest it you know my name? Monsieur, this intrusion is an offence!"

He was angry in the dark; his voice shook with anger.

The presumption of my conduct had, in a moment, become clear to me. I attempted no commonplace apology, but told him of my long confinement to my room, of the observations that had grown out of it, and the process by which I had come to a knowledge of his name. When he heard this, he grew calmer. "The eccentricities of a sick man must be pardoned," he supposed. "An invalid was glad of any resource for killing time, and therefore monsieur had taken a fancy for studying the habits of a neighbor so insignificant as himself."

"Not only from the idle curiosity of a sick man," I replied, "had I watched my neighbors. I might—"

"What had other motives—secret ones? Speak out! What did I know?

M. Darron clutched my arm fiercely; but I replied that I knew nothing but what was the result of conjecture; and that as my motives, they were to be found in the interest—a most friendly one, I would presume to say—that I felt in him self and his daughter. As I spoke, M. Darron looked fixedly at me. After a minute, I could see on his face relax in the uncertain light.

"Then I am to believe, monsieur, that you possess a mature servitude as an indirect you to seek my acquaintance because you have seen me in distress to-night? Well, a man who offers his sympathy on my bare should not be harsh and hardly. I am no close discriminator of character, I fear!—he heaved a deep sigh—"or I had a poor triumph to deceive me. You are a stranger to me. I mistake not?" And the old man, in whom there seemed a strange mixture of simplicity and simplicity, seemed desirous to put aside the distrust with which he had at first received me. We moved away to a bench near and sat down.

"You have seen my daughter, then? You know her! Is it not truly a wonderful voice? The mention of her name had roused his enthusiasm in a moment. "I had the deepest faith in the music of the world. My Josephine! She is more to me than you can conceive. Monsieur, the world knows her not. It was not only the first attempt of the opera; but—I know her as the angel of my home, the devoted daughter of my age—the companion whose seat in the orchestra is only allowed him because he is her father. Ah, monsieur, she is the best child in one, and yet—yet my affectionate afflicts us most through those we love best."

He ceased, and I heard him sob beside me, sighing deeply from time to time. Once or twice, in the desultory conversation that ensued, he appeared on the point of communicating something to me, but a nervous restraint seemed upon him, and he would stop suddenly and relapse into silence. After a short time he rose, bowed a hasty good-night, and moved off in the direction of his own house.

I was about to follow his example, when I noticed something lying on the bench by my side; it was M. Darron's cane. He had left it behind in his agitation, and I could hear him utter a curse, but his door had closed upon him ere I reached the house. I knocked, the door was immediately opened by Marthe. M. Darron stood in the entrance, looking angry and surprised at seeing me. I gave him his walking-stick, and handed him the box. He thanked me politely, wished me good-night, and shut the door again. I heard him, as I crossed the square, ordered to be retiring footsteps, and then moved slowly away. I had got a little way across the square when there came a loud, jarring fit of laughter from within the house. It was the wildest, most unearthly laughter I had ever heard. It was unmistakable, and then a window above was hastily closed. I shivered as those sounds of demoniac ice-blast had passed through the summer night.

CHAPTER III.—LA GRANDE ARTISTE.

THE day following my midnight interview with M. Darron on the Grande Place, I received a note from his inclosing an order for the opera for that night. I need not say that I availed myself of it when the hour arrived. I had thought much and long about the beautiful young singer and her strange home since the adventure of the night. Had I ever myself unable to check the growing interest I felt in all that concerned her. Could it be that some terrible secret existed in the gloomy and fearful laughter of those? The light that burned there nightly, the apparition on the roof, and the fearful laughter I had heard, were more than enough to rouse suspicion. Was it possible that Josephine Darron, the great actress and singer, was a somnambulist? or, worse still, the victim of a diseased mind? The idea was too horrible. And yet, the more such idea was too horrible. And yet, the more such thoughts passed before me on the stage, singing with a supernatural pathos, I seemed again to have before my eyes the ivory figure that stood on the roof of the old house tossing its arms wildly to the sky.

The terrible fascination which this thought gave to every look and movement of the actress I can not describe. It was like the spell of a skein of wretched excitement.

The next morning I resolved to call on M. Darron, and request him for the ticket. As I rang the bell at the door of the gloomy house, I looked up at the closed windows of the upper rooms and speculations. It was evident that there were no other tenants in the house, for all the lower floor-shutters were closed, and no signs of returning life were there. The door opened at length, and the masculine-looking Marthe, with her gold rings and high cap demanded my business with an air of grim surprise. Evidently hesitating as to the policy of the proceeding, she let me walk in, locked the door again, and ushered me up a great flight of stone stairs. She paused at the landings, as we ascended, echoed drearily in the empty chambers we passed, and throught the high-arched windows of the staircase. Dusty streaks of sunlight fell athwart our path. Marthe spoke not a word, but seemed to evince a certain distrustfulness, I thought—every time we reached a landing. At length we arrived on the fourth floor, and passing through a gloomy little ante-room, Marthe led me into a large cool-looking chamber adorned with curtains of dark crimson. An open piano stood in one corner, and sheets of music were littered the chairs and floor. I could ascertain these things in an instant-room. Marthe, who had all along eyed me with considerable suspicion, now left me with a look that I fancied denoted her master. I remarked that the grim woman carried a great bunch of keys at her waist, and she carried a great bunch of keys at her waist, and locked and relocked all the doors with methodical care.

In two or three minutes M. Darron appeared, wearing an old dressing-gown and shabby slippers, and carrying his violin in his hand. From the coldness of his reception I feared he considered my visit an intrusion. I proceeded to thank him for the great pleasure he had afforded me, and begged that Mademoiselle Josephine would accept the bouquet of flowers I had ventured to bring her; then, as I had nothing more to say, I sat in silence.

"You are very polite, monsieur, and my daughter will thank you."

She all took the flowers, and laid them on the piano; he then resumed his seat, and sat looking at me, as though he wished to know what else I had for coming there. As I was scarcely in a position to explain, I took refuge in some generality of conversation, only, however, to subside again into silence, for my host gave me no encouragement to proceed. Here I remained, as I knew not had not the door opened and Mademoiselle Darron appeared at this crisis. She did not see me on entering; but when I rose, she turned to the piano, exclaimed, "How kind of you, mon papa, to buy me these lovely flowers!" Then, perceiving me, she bowed with an air of surprise, and looked toward her father for an explanation.

"It is a little English gentleman, who has come to thank for your misspent, Josephine. He has called, I believe, purposely to make your acquaintance."

Mademoiselle Darron thanked me in a few simple words. From her unconstrained manner it was evident that the presence of a stranger did not disturb her as it did her father; or it might be that his embarrassment gave her confidence; for after an awkward pause, during which M. Darron drew a few plaintive notes from his violin, as he sat nervously caressing it, she led the conversation to my recent accident, and spoke of my long confinement in my room, of which my father had told her. While mademoiselle expressed her sympathy in a most natural manner, and filled me with admiration of her grace and beauty, I watched her pale and worn she looked. When Josephine rose and left the room to seek for a vase for the flowers, M. Darron crossed over and came and seated himself by my side.

"Sir, I know not what other motives you can have in seeking our acquaintance than those you have already assigned. I will, however, endeavor to believe them. It rejoices me to see my daughter interested in any thing or in any one. Her life is not as bright or gay as that of the young persons should be. Yet, monsieur, I regret to say that I can not welcome you to my house as a frequent visit. My home is of necessity a quiet, a secluded one. Therefore, though I thank you, monsieur, for the friendly interest you express, and beg you to continue it, you must pardon me for not returning the same after you have left my house to-day."

His daughter entered, and he ceased speaking. Shortly after I withdrew: Martha reappeared to conduct me to the door, and again I passed through the same process of locking and unlocking, until we reached the ground floor, where my conductress grimly took leave of me.

During the week that followed I made some little further advance in my acquaintance with my mysterious neighbors. I ventured to leave a basket of choice fruit one morning at the door, which I trusted mademoiselle some English books she had expressed a wish to read; and M. Darron did not seem disposed at that moment to quarrel with the nervousness and reserve of manner never wore off. One evening, when thinking I had been asleep for other, he suddenly exclaimed, "Monsieur, I am glad of any thing that will interest or rouse my daughter. Think you that she cares for poetry, then she did? Bah! how can you judge? For, after what I say." And he proceeded rapidly to another subject.

I had now been one month in L——; I had received from my banneret a letter, requesting me, nay, yet I felt loth to quit the place, and had made no plans for further travel. They were made for me, however, by others.

A letter from an old friend reached me at this time, informing me that, if I felt sufficiently to do so, he again ere he left Europe, I must proceed to Marseilles within three or four days, as he was just starting for the East. I looked at my self-imposed weakly, I did not hesitate for a moment, but resolved to quit Lyons on the day but one to-day. I was on my way to the post-office in the Rue de Rue to dispatch my letter, when I caught sight of the words "Darron," "Saint-Ursanne," and "Paris," on a large bill placarded on a wall: "The sudden illness of Mademoiselle Darron compels the undersigned to substitute another opera this evening. Much to trusted would be," etc.

I had seen mademoiselle only the day before, and had already taken a place for that night. I turned my steps in the direction, and walked rapidly to the outskirts of the town.

It was growing dusk when I noticed the figure of an old man standing near the water's edge. A few yards from where I by. He was looking, steadily at the stream, and bowed on his stick, as if in meditation. It was M. Darron. Surprised to see him there, when his daughter was lying ill, I rose and approached him. He started when I first spoke, but, upon recognizing me, recovered his composure.

"Yes, monsieur, my poor Josephine is ill—very ill. She tells me she will soon be well again; but her illness is not one that can be cured by art, and so sighed heavily, and shook his head.

I was standing some words of sympathy when M. Darron turned round to me with a warmth of manner I had never seen in him before.

"Monsieur, you have met my daughter, my Josephine, is to me; you know how God has gifted her; figure, then, what I suffer to see her pining away—dying before my eyes! And so young—so young!"

His voice shook, and he stopped. M. Darron was a mood unlike any I had ever beheld him in. Whether it was that the twilight did away with his natural reserve, or that an uncontrollable desire to pour out his sorrows into some friendly ear had seized him, I know not; but we sat down upon the bank, and he talked to me as though I had been the friend of years. His revelation ran thus:

Josephine, his idolized daughter, was dying of a broken heart. Though she appeared before the world full of the energy of genius, and seemed to feel the emotions of an audience at her will, she was sinking under a malady "which was slowly destroying her life," as M. Darron expressed it. Three years ago her hand had been sought by a young officer who had been brought up in the same place—a town on the German frontier—where her own youth was passed. He had studied the violin under M. Darron, and of all his pupils was the one the old musician most loved. Not that in spite of his regard for Fabien de Molèon, M. Darron showed small favor to his suit. He had other views for his daughter. His ambition was to see her—poor child, as I said, he was not looking forward to the day when the hopes of a lifetime would be repaid in the fame of his child—to see her the wife of a man who had made his name his family; and when Madame de Molèon, his mother, heard of her son's infatuation for the daughter of his music-master, she determined to leave no means untried to break it off. Threats shall cannot avail with her son. The old man's contempt declared his love to be unalterable. So Madame de Molèon had recourse to the pride and generosity of Josephine to liberate her son from his engagement. In a secret visit to the musician's house she had represented to him that her son's prospects in life would be ruined by such an alliance as that he would bring upon the head of all his friends; and how the best proof of her love for him would be shown in putting an end to the engagement. She had left the house in the girl's dignity and affection was not in vain; Josephine returned to her home, and bade him that was done right. Had she known what a cruel stab she was inflicting on a heart that beat only for her she would have spared herself the pain. Fabien de Molèon wrote her one letter, which she had carried ever since in her bosom, and then never pressed the thirst of hair to scourge his guilty flesh. It lay there burning out her heart, for its words were heated with the most indignant passion that ever she loved best in the world. In Molèon returned to her all love-tokens she had given him, and, tenderly, cutting off all traces to his retreat. From that hour Josephine Darron devoted herself to her father, and to the pursuit of her studies. "And now I have gained my wish!" continued the old musician, bitterly; "I have made her the first violinist; but her heart is breaking. Fools—fools that we are! What need had I to change my name, and assume that of Darron? Was it not made De Molèon-peasant! I would give all I have could I now recall his name to her."

Such was the story confided to my ears by the old man's trembling lips as we sat by the river-side in the evening twilight. "And now, sir," M. Darron at the door of my hotel, and retire to my room, pondering on what I had heard. As I went up, I had not fully fathomed the mystery of that household; M. Darron, I feared, had concealed from me the worst calamity—the one that would end in death—that threatens his daughter.

The next day I found that I could not be regarded as an intrusion were I to call and inquire after Mademoiselle Darron's health. I had already no reason to suspect that the colonel was in the house of their secluded habits, the residence of the popular singer was generally known. Visitors had observed, gave prompt replies, but admitted none. For myself, I augured an exception would be permitted.

But when I presented myself to the grim custodian, she answered my inquiry with a shake of the head, and left me standing in the street. I was not sure whether her master was at home—though he wouldn't see me—could I leave a message in mine? I asked, impatiently and peevishly, and with a very bad grace, at last allowed me to enter.

It was the same room in which I by, seated in silence, by the chamber, with doors on either side communicating with other apartments. Near one of these doors stood a large Indian screen, which added to the sombre aspect of the room. Marching across the polished floor before me, Martha suddenly stopped. "Pete! where have I put my keys, then?" she exclaimed, making an excuse to leave the room. "I must have lost, I must have left them below. In two minutes, monsieur, I will return;" and she hurried down stairs with rapid steps.

But the two minutes expired, and Martha returned not; at the end of a quarter of an hour, appeared. I stood listening for the sound of her returning footsteps; but no, when I looked toward a strange noise in the room: it seemed like the breathing of an animal, and came, I thought, from behind the screen. I listened, it was still. No; there it was again—a heavy, measured respiration, close at hand. I was not mistaken. A strange fear that crept over me at the sound. I stood rooted to the ground. The next moment the screen trembled from top to bottom, and a violent figure rushed out from behind it, and stood staring at me with shining eyes. Good Heaven, it was Josephine Darron!

"Hush!" she whispered, placing her finger to her lips—"hush! you will betray me. Are you here?"

She held up Marthe's great bunch of keys, and looked at me with a look of blind terror.

"Ah, ah! you won't tell?" She jingled the bunch of keys, darted through the side-door near her, and, flinging herself on the floor of the adjoining room, burst into a loud, mad shriek of laughter.

Had I once suddenly upon her dead body lying in the room, it would not have filled me with such horror. There, grovelling on the floor in idiotic mirth, lay that beautiful and gifted girl—lay there, babbling, stricken, mad! I cast one glance at the unhappy creature, fled, and rushed down the suffocation seize me, and hastened rapidly from the room.

I have some recollection of passing Martha rushing up the stairs, and of finding the street-door wide open, but I remember nothing clearly for the first few minutes after I had made this terrible discovery.

Horrible realization of my worst fears! Josephine Darron was mad. The next morning I quitted L——, and bade farewell to my old chamber under the roof where I had viewed the first scenes of this strange drama, yet to be played out before my eyes.

CHAPTER IV.—THE CATASTROPHE.

ARRIVED at Marseilles, I found that all the distractions of travel and new scenes, powerfully as they influenced me, were unable to drive away the recollection of the old house on the Grande Rue of L—— and its inmates. At night, I saw in my dreams Josephine dancing in the costume of a fairy. I heard that fearful laughter ring in my ears. Then, when I opened my eyes, after a busy street or in a crowded quay, I would start at the sound, and my friend rallied me for having grown nervous with my continued ill-health.

The day he left I went to the bureau des diligences and secured a place back to Paris for the morrow.

I had a fellow-passenger, a dark, sunburned officer, who had just returned from Algiers. Colonel Rembert had been very from home for many years, and showed a lively interest in the affairs of his native land. As the day wore on, he narrated, from Algiers, where he had gained promotion and the star that seemed his dark face.

We had a most wearisome traveling I should have found the journey intolerable but for the society of my companion. Colonel Rembert days by making our way back to L——, which lay between us and Paris, and all that time the salutem sun poured down with a tropical intensity upon the dust and dusty roads.

At last we were by means of proceeding to Paris until the following day, Colonel Rembert—between whom and myself a very friendly feeling had sprung up—had the unnecessary one to the town where I was about to stay. It was not the old one on the Grande Rue, which I had left with so many emotions, but was situated in another quarter of the town, near the Rue Rivoli.

I was looking with anxiety to put some questions to the people of the hotel respecting the Darrons, and to learn having their history deceased in a public room prevented me, as we sat at table, I could see through the hotel windows some of the passers-by in the street. Suddenly, announcing Mademoiselle Darron's appearance in one of the fashionable carriages, I by.

"What a pretty man you are!" I exclaimed, as we rose from the table together. "Going home to your friends—returning to Paris; why, with those two qualities, you must be very young, or to be in the line of your circle for a month to come!"

"Why, Mr. Lennard," he replied, "a soldier's circle is in the mess-room; his friends, his brother officers. I shall not make the sensation you anticipate, I assure you;" and he laughed rather bitterly, I thought.

I looked at him earnestly as he sat turning over the leaves of a journal at a side-table. Colonel Rembert was perhaps a man to be less envied than pitied. Though he were traces of rather rough usage than that the vicissitudes of a soldier's life bring with it, he was handsome in spite of his face. His was still looking over the paper when he exclaimed,

"There is an opera, I see, in L——, to-night. Who is this going to play Amina in 'La Sonnambula?' Darron, Mademoiselle Darron, is the lady's name?"

"What! To-night? Mademoiselle Darron?" I exclaimed, snatching the paper from his hands. "Where? Where did you see it? You are wrong—you are wrong!"

"Here—see there!" and Colonel Rembert stared at me in amazement as he pointed to the paragraph. I never refused to comprehended it. There, on the printed page I held, it was announced that Josephine Darron would make her second appearance since her recent illness that very night! I stood speechless.

"Is the young lady, perhaps? Is she really so great a genius as the press of L—— would have me believe? I am curious to hear her. What say you to our going to judge for ourselves? I am at idle man to-night."

"Go?" I exclaimed; "yes, at once—this very moment. We shall yet be there in time!" and, without offering any explanation, I hurried my companion into the street. We reached the doors of the theatre before I had time even to do more than to ask myself what I was doing. Colonel Rembert had to be supposed, and on quitting L——a short time since, had left her temporarily ill. I have no recollection of his reply; I only remember that we went in with a dense crowd, and that the house was filled from floor to ceiling, five minutes after the doors were opened. Once I turned to a neighbor in the pit, and inquired of him if the principal singer had been long ill.

"La Darron? Oh no; only a little indisposition," he supposed. "We could not afford to lose our star yet—no, no;" and he shrugged his shoulders and went on laughing and talking with the friend by his side. I felt sick with apprehension. Could it be possible that I was awaiting the appearance on the stage of her whom I had last seen in a paroxysm of insanity? Josephine Darron, even had she recovered her reason, could not be returning to her profession again: the idea was monstrous, revolting. I sat beating away the wild fancies that rose up before me as I watched for the uprising of the curtain.

At length a bell tinkled, strains of music broke from the orchestra, and the curtain slowly rose. I could see nothing at first for the sudden agitation that came over me; then, when I had grown calmer, I beheld the group of village maidens awaiting the appearance of Amina. After the opening music had been sung, there was a silvery laugh heard, and the next moment, to the wild audience of the audience, the heroine came on. She was there—there for the thunders of applause that burst forth, then advanced to the front of the stage and began to sing her. She has reached the foot-lights, and stands in the full blaze of the whole house. It is none other—it is Josephine Darron!

To see her standing there, beautiful and self-possessed, with that clear voice flowing from her in my memory, was at once the saddest and most appalling contradiction. Mademoiselle Darron, in my mind, had turned only white, and stood trembling in every limb. There was a wild gleam in her eyes as she came on, that was fixed on me where I sat, as though she beheld a spectre there. The audience, still, started almost in a whisper, gazed at her as at one possessed; the orchestra grew mute while a terrific silence settled over the whole house. Then, as if to save Mademoiselle Darron's reason in us that she stares thus wildly? Her lips would be thought she was about to sing, but her head is pressed on her brow, the other on her heart; she has overdosed; she is going mad. The next moment a loud cry rang through the house, and Josephine Darron fell, like one dead, upon the stage.

The whole house was a scene of uproar; on all sides there was a clamoring of voices and disorder. I saw the leader certain sliding down, and behind a gray-haired old man carried out from the orchestra. I saw the curtain fall on the figure grasped as though in a vice by the companion at my side. Colonel Rembert seemed suffocating. Great drops of sweat stood upon his brow, and his nostrils seemed issued from his chest. With an immense effort he rose, and made his way through the crowd of human beings about us. I followed on his steps, harassing to know not whither, but conscious that a crisis was at hand.

I have a recollection of traversing lobbies and dingy passages, and of diving into many delightful recesses, of coming suddenly upon motley groups in stage costume. On all sides they gave way before my companion; there was that in his air that told them it would be dangerous to interrupt him. At last, suddenly we reached a green-room; there, surrounded by the frightened people of the place, lay Josephine Darron, pale and lifeless, as they had borne her from the stage. Colonel Rembert was at her side in a moment. One glance at her face, one touch of her hand, told him that the right by which he approached her thus: it was Fabien de Molèon who knelt by her couch.

"Air—air!" he cried; and he put aside the thronging women, and took her in his arms.

"Monsieur, monsieur!" and he hastened to assert authority there.

"Where is her father? Where is her home here? Who knows?"

He looked round, and his eye caught mine. I was endeavoring to rouse M. Darron, who, during almost insensible on a bench near. The old man heard his name pronounced, and rose.

"Home, Fabien? Yes; what is it? I am better now; we must go home. O God, my daughter!" He had caught sight of his child as he spoke, and had suddenly a knowledge of what had happened.

I had no time for a consultation. I turned to will Colonel Rembert it was at the door. My anxiety to remove them from this place was great; I dreaded the exposure of the child to the world's prejudiced recovery. Perhaps, now, her reason had fled forever!

When at last we reached the old house on the Grande Place, it tortured me to think of the terrible discovery that we have Colonel Rembert to make. Little did he dream, as he bore his loved burden up to the old chamber, what a terrible surprise had wrought there. I could have prayed, as I saw her lying in his arms, that that might be death which locked on her face. Better her spirit should pass away thus, than return to a home where there was darkness deeper than that of the grave.

But no, she lives! Josephine Darron stirs, sighs, then opens her eyes, and gazes up into the face bending over her. There is a sharp cry, her face—a smile of reason—of deep content. We stand around her in silence. Then, Colonel Rembert, and L. Josephine is speaking to De Molèon in a low and gentle voice; Martha, the grim, grandfather-like Martha, is weeping; M. Darron is gazing at them with a working face; and I—I am awaking from the nightmare that has oppressed me for some many weeks.

So, there in a strange figure hovering in the room-ground! The door at the further end of the room has slowly opened, and another Josephine stands shadowy at the portal!

"O Heaven! it is Louise!" screams Martha, wringing her hands in dismay.

"Louise, my poor Louise; come here, sister." Josephine Darron half rose from her couch, and spoke in the tone in which one addresses a child. "You love to see me happy, Louise? Well, I am happy, very happy, to-night." She drew the former figure to her side and kissed her on the brow.

The girl looked strangely at us, then laughed a low, elastic laugh, and began playing with Josephine's long hair. Even there, side by side, there is the same likeness to be seen; and as I gaze at them, the secret of that gloomy household, the mystery of many years, reveals itself to my wondering eyes. In that blighted creature crooning at Josephine's side, I recognize the spectre that has long haunted me—it is Mademoiselle Darron's twin-sister.

It was a strange scene on which the moon then shot that night in the old chamber. I see it all before me now: the grim-faced Marthe; the gray-bristled father; the poor idiot girl, twining her long fingers in her sister's hair; and, bright centre of it all, Josephine, white-robed, shining in her beauty, and head clasped in that of the sun-burned soldier.

There remains little to be said. Ere I quitted Nemours, Josephine became—Darron being the name, as I have said, which she had assumed on entering her profession—became the wife of Colonel de Mole, lion. Our intimacy, commenced so strangely, continues to this day, and, until the progress his children may know to me, I little dreamed of the beauty and heroism Josephine's life had displayed. Bound by a promise to her dying mother never to forsake her twin-sister, nor to leave her to the care of others, she had nobly fulfilled that charge. Aided by their old servant, Marthe, she had watched over her with a devotion that was sublime in its sacrifice of self. She had been present at the docile affection of the idiot girl. In her wildest moods Louise was obedient to Josephine's voice; and often, when some cruel fancy or wild excitement preyed on the poor sufferer, the gentle sister would rouse her by song, and sing the maniac girl to sleep.

When these and other things were made known to me in the days that followed, I felt that beautiful as the life of the young singer had seemed in my eyes, viewed in the light of her genius and her rewrapt, yet its truest beauties had been those known only to her own household on the Grande Place of Nemours.

A Good Fight.

CHAPTER X.

MARGARET cut off a huge piece of venison, and ran to the window, and threw it to the green eyes of fire. They darted on it with a savage snarl; and there was a sound of mending and crunching; of this wonderful meal turned utterly a nay to near and loud it rang through the house, and the three at the window shrank together. But as they did not feared for his support, and glided swiftly and stealthily away with it toward the woods, and the very next moment heroes and men and dogs came bitter-shelter peal the window, and followed her full cry. Martin and his companions bestowed again: the leopard was swift, and would not be caught within a league of their house.

To table once more, and Gerard drank to woman's wit: "Is stronger than man's force," said he.

"Ay," said Margaret, "when those she loves are in danger; not else."

Tooth-picked Gerard with her longer than usual, and went home prouder than ever of her, and happy as a prince. Some little distance down home, under the shadow of some trees, he encountered two figures: they almost barred his way.

It was his father and mother.

A cold chill fell on him.

Fife-sergeant looked at them: they stood grim and silent. He stammered out some words of inquiry:

"What brought them out so late?"

"Why ask?" said his father; "you can guess why we are here."

"Oh, Gerard!" said his mother, with a voice full of reproach and yet of affection.

Gerard's knees shook: he was silent.

Then his father pitied his confusion, and said to him:

"Nay, you need not to hang your head. You are not the first young fool that has been caught by a red cloak and a pair of silver eyes."

"No, no!" put in Catherine: "it was witchcraft. Peter the Magician is well known to be one."

"Come, Sir Priest," resumed his father. "You know you must not meddle with women-folk. But give us your promise to go no more to Sevenbergen, and none all ends: we won't be hard on you for one fault."

"I can't promise that, father."

"Not promise it, you young hypocrite."

"Nay, father, I will not tell me not to: I locked courage to tell you what I know would vex you; and right resolved am I to that good friend, and to that maidfather let you know."

"Oh, dear, I love Margaret: and she is not to be priest, for a priest I will never be. I will die sooner."

"Hast we shall see, young man. Come, gainsay me no more; you will learn what 'tis to offend a father."

Gerard held his peace; and the three walked home in gloomy silence, broken only by a deep sigh or two from Catherine.

From that hour the little house at Tergen was no longer the abode of peace. Gerard was taken to task next day before the whole family; and every voice was loud against him, except little Kate's and the dwarf's, who was apt to take the lad's part, but without knowing why. As for Cornelis and Sybrandt, they were bitterer than their father. Gerard was dismayed at finding so many enemies, and looked wistfully into his little sister's face: her eyes were brimming at the harsh words showered on one who but yesterday was the universal pet. But she gave him no encouragement: she turned her head away from him, and said;

"Dear, dear Gerard, pray to Heaven to cure you of this folly! What, are you against me, too," said Gerard, sadly, and he rose with a deep sigh, and left the house and went to Sevenbergen.

The beginning of a quarrel, where the parties are bound by affection though opposed in interest and humanity, is comparatively innocent; both are in the right at first starting, and then it is that a calm, judicious friend, capable of seeing both sides, is a gift from Heaven. For the longer the dissension endures, the wider and deeper it grows by the fallibility and irascibility of human nature: these are not confined to either side, and finally the invariable end is reached—both in the wrong.

The combatants were unequally matched. Gerard's sister was angry, Cornelis and Sybrandt soldier; but Gerard, having a larger and more cultivated mind, saw both sides where they saw but one, and had of necessity more, and more subtle, but unhappy. He was lonely too in this struggle: He could open his heart to no one. Margaret was a high-spirited girl: he dared not tell her what he had to endure at home: she was capable of siding with her family, and of resenting his slights at the cost of her own happiness. Margaret Van Eyck had been a great comfort to him on another occasion; but now he dared not make her his confidante. Her own history was well known. Lysbeth she had many offers of marriage; but refused them all for the sake of that art to which her mother's duties are so fatal: that she remained single and painted with her brothers. How could he tell her that he declined the benefice which, on the one hand, promised ill for the sake of that which at his age she had despised and sacrificed so lightly?

Gerard at this period bade fair to succumb. But the other side had a horrible ally in Catherine Senior. The good-hearted but uneducated woman could not, like her daughter, act quietly and firmly: and her love could she act upon a plan. She irritated Gerard at times, and so helped him, for anger is a great sustainer of the courage: at others she tormented him with anxiety and made onslaughts on her own forces. To take a single instance out of many: one day that Gerard was at home, Catherine and all, Cornelis said: "Our Gerard is not himself at all. He is not the same boy he was. He is changed."

"Not what it will be when you marry?" cried Catherine. "Gerard can paint, Gerard can write, but what can you do to keep a woman, I'm sure I don't. Naught but wait for your father's shoes. Oh, we can see why you and Sybrandt would not have the poor boy to marry. You are afraid he will come to us for a share of our substance. And suppose he does, and suppose we give it him, it isn't yours to say nay, and mayhap never will be."

The sheer accusation Gerard would slyly, and picked up heart: and temporary confusion fell on Catherine's unfortunate allies. But at last, after a pause, she was moved to irritation, and the climax. The father told the son before the whole family that ordered the burgomaster to imprison him in the Stadthouse rather than let him marry Margaret. Gerard turned pale with anger at this, but by a great effort held his peace. The father went on to say, "And a priest you shall be before you wed a man, silly wife!"

"It is so?" cried Gerard. "Then hear me all. By God and St. Bavon I swear I will never be a priest while Margaret lives. Since force is to decide it, and not love and duty, try force, father; but force shall not serve you, for this day I vow to the Burgomaster come for me I leave Tergen forever, and Holland too, and my father's house, where I am not loved as I have been used to be, and not for myself, but for what is to be got out of me."

And he burst out of the room while with anger and desperation.

"There!" cried Catherine, "that comes of driving young folk too hard. But men are crueler than tigers, even to their own flesh and blood. Now, Heaven forbid he should ever leave us, married or single."

As Gerard came out of the house, his cheeks pale and his heart panting, he met Richt Heynes: she had a message for him: Margaret Van Eyck desired to see him. He found the old lady cordial grim as a judge. She wasted no time in preliminaries, but inquired coldly why he had not visited her of late; before he could answer, she said, in a sarcastic tone, "I thought we had been friends, young Sir?"

At this Gerard looked the picture of doubt and perplexity.

"It is because you never told her you were in love," said Richt Heynes, divining his confusion.

"Silence, wench! Why should he tell us his affairs? We are not his friends: we have not deserved his confidence."

"Alas! my second mother," said Gerard, "I did not dare to tell you my wish!"

"What folly? Is it folly to love?"

"I am told on every day of my life."

"You are told you have been afraid to tell my mistress; she is always kind to true lovers."

"Madam—Richt—I was afraid, because I was told—"

"Well? you were told—"

"That in your family you scorned love, preferring art."

"I did, boy; and what is the end of it? Behold me here a barren stock, while the women of my youth have a troop of children at their side, and grandchildren at their knee. I gave up the sweets joys of widehood and motherhood for what? for my dear pictures: they have gone and left me long ago—for my art; it has left me too. I have the knowledge still, but what avails that when the hand trembles? No, Gerard; I look on you as one of my son. You are good, you are handsome, you are a painter, though not like mine I have known. I will never let you throw your youth away as I did mine: you shall marry this Margaret. I have inquired, and she is a good daughter. Richt here is a gossip. She has told me all about it. But that was a kindness not to tell me."

"Nay, I know not that; but it has been the desire of my heart to tell you all. But you know of all the arts. Oh madam! but the journey, and we are all so poor."

"Find you the heart to go, I'll find the means. I know where to lay my hand on ten golden angels to take you to Rome; and the girl will go with you if she loves you as she ought."

They sat till midnight over this theme. And, after that day, Gerard received his epistles, and seemed to carry some secret talisman against all the gripes and the harsh words that flew about in earshot.

Besides the money she procured him for the journey, Margaret Van Eyck gave him a letter to Vivarini. Said she, "I will tell you secrets that I learnt from masters that are gone from us, and have also no fellow behind. Even the Italians know not every thing; and what I tell you now in Tergen you may add hear in Rome. Note my best colors and my pictures: time, which fades all other paintings, leaves but a richer bright to the day they left the easel. The reason is, he did nothing blindly, nothing in a hurry. He trusted to no hireling to grind his colors; he did it himself, as I saw it done. Bright oil was prepared, and prepared again—I will show you how—and then he laid not a picture on, but one of them are quite content to have their work rocked up and lest sooner than not be in a hurry—[nil admirari nisi qui in a hurry]. Above all, work hard, I warn you never boil your oil; boiling it melts that vegetable fat into its very heart and soul, and it will turn muddy: that is much from the oil. Put the dipp water candidly away, and let the oil cook. When that is poured away, you will fancy the oil is clear. You are mistaken. Richt, fetch us that?" Richt brought a glass trough with a glass lid fitting tight. "When your oil has been boiled in paste, put it into this trough with water, and put the trough in the sun all day. You will see the water turbid again. But mark, you must not expect to see it clear, or the sun will bring your oil to varnish. When it is as clear as crystal and not too thick, drain carefully and cook it a little longer. Grind your primes colors, and lay them on with this oil, and they shall live. Haleen will say that I have got it all from Italy; but I have not: my father would not go to Italy. Nothing remained me but to inherit his knowledge. Breathe of his wisdom, and to publish the bees as quickly as possible. He went to Sevenbergen earlier than usual on both these occasions. Again with Margaret; told her of the Dame Van Eyck's goodness, and she manifestion he had come to at last, and invited her co-operation.

She refused it plump.

CHAPTER XI.

"NO, Gerard; you and I have never spoken of your family, but when you are in Italy you must paint your own again. Nay, I do think your father has no objection to me more than to another. He told Peter Claessens so much, and Peter told me. But no long as he is so bent on your being a priest (you ought to be, Gerard, and you shall be, if you love me), I will not marry you, Gerard, dearly as I love you."

Gerard strove in vain to shake this resolution. He found it very easy to make her cry, but impossible to make her yield. Then Gerard was impatient and unjust.

"Very well" he cried; "then you are on their side, and you will drive me to be a priest, for the must end one way or another. My parents hate me in earnest, but my lower only loves me in fun!"

And with this wild, bitter speech he flung away home again, and left Margaret weeping.

Soon there were two pair of wet eyes over his story, and when the house boy saw him, there were three.

Women are justly famous for courage. Theirs is not exactly the same quality as manly courage; that would never do, hang it all; we should have to give up trampling on them. No; it is a religious courage. They never take part in a bullfight by any chance; but it is remarked that they sit at one unshaken by those tremors and apprehensions for the combatants to which the male species is—feeble-minded wretch!—is subject. Nothing can exceed the resolution with which they have been known to send forth men to battle a nome witty dog says, "Les femmes sont très braves vers le peau d'autrui."

By this trait Gerard now profited. Margaret and Richt were agreed that a man should always take the bull by the horns. Gerard's only course was to marry Margaret Brandt off-hand; the old people would come to after a while, the deed once done. Whereas, the longer this misunderstanding continued on its present footing the worse for all parties, especially for Gerard.

"See how pale and thin they have made him among them."

"Indeed you are, Master Gerard," said Richt.

"It makes a body sad to see a young man so eaten out of house. Mistress, when I must look in the street to-day, I had like to have burst out crying—he was so changed."

"And I by the sight of his others keep their colour, Richt? such as it is."

"Oh, I see no odds in them."

"Of course not. We painters are no match for lovers. We are glass, they are stone. We can't stand the worry, worry, worry of little minds; and it is not for the good of mankind we should be exposed to it. It is hard enough, God knows! to design and paint a masterpiece, without having gnats and flies stinging us to death into the bargain."

Exasperated as Gerard was by his father's threats of violence, he listened to these friendly voices telling him his most prudent course was rebellion. But though he listened, he was not convinced.

"Margaret is afraid of violence," he said "but I do fear his anger. When it came to the point he would not imprison me. I would marry Margaret to-morrow if that was my only fear. My father would disown me. I should take Margaret from her father, and give her to a poor husband, who would never thrive, weighed down by his parent's curse. No, Richt, I cannot sometimes think I could but marry her secretly, and then take her away to some country where my craft is better paid than in Italy; and when my father's wrath was warm has blown over, you know, could come back with money in my pocket, and—and—Oh, Richt, indeed, we do not seek your substance; we but ask you to leave us as once more as you used, and as we have never ceased to love you."

Richt was touched by this appeal, and from these are the dreams of an inexperienced young man.

The old lady's eyes sparkled.

"It is no dream, but a piece of wonderful common sense, and I will tell you why. Because whether you have spirit to carry out your own thought, Master Gerard, or not, Providence has decided for you, awaits you at this moment. Here the arts fresh, but there they flourish, as they never yet flourished in any age or land.

"It is Italy!" cried Gerard. "It is Italy!"

"Yes, Italy—where pensioned and honored by princes, and services are paid three hundred crowns for copying a single manuscript. Know you not that Jan Eyckens was sent by Duke Philip to copy land for skilful scribes to copy the hundreds of manuscripts collected by that magnificent prince, delivered land from Constantinople, whence learning and learned men are driven by the barbarous Turks.

"Nay, I know not that; but it has been the dream of my youth to see it, and the hope the dream of all the arts. Oh madam! but the journey, and we are all so poor."

"Find you the heart to go, I'll find the means. I know where to lay my hand on ten golden angels to take you to Rome; and the girl will go with you if she loves you as she ought."

They sat till midnight over this theme. And, after that day, Gerard received his epistles, and seemed to carry some secret talisman against all the gripes and the harsh words that flew about in earshot.

Besides the money she procured him for the journey, Margaret Van Eyck gave him a letter to Vivarini. Said she, "I will tell you secrets that I learnt from masters that are gone from us, and have also no fellow behind. Even the Italians know not every thing; and what I tell you now in Tergen you may add hear in Rome. Note my best colors and my pictures: time, which fades all other paintings, leaves but a richer bright to the day they left the easel. The reason is, he did nothing blindly, nothing in a hurry. He trusted to no hireling to grind his colors; he did it himself, as I saw it done. Bright oil was prepared, and prepared again—I will show you how—and then he laid not a picture on, but one of them are quite content to have their work rocked up and lest sooner than not be in a hurry—[nil admirari nisi qui in a hurry]. Above all, work hard, I warn you never boil your oil; boiling it melts that vegetable fat into its very heart and soul, and it will turn muddy: that is much from the oil. Put the dipp water candidly away, and let the oil cook. When that is poured away, you will fancy the oil is clear. You are mistaken. Richt, fetch us that?" Richt brought a glass trough with a glass lid fitting tight. "When your oil has been boiled in paste, put it into this trough with water, and put the trough in the sun all day. You will see the water turbid again. But mark, you must not expect to see it clear, or the sun will bring your oil to varnish. When it is as clear as crystal and not too thick, drain carefully and cook it a little longer. Grind your primes colors, and lay them on with this oil, and they shall live. Haleen will say that I have got it all from Italy; but I have not: my father would not go to Italy. Nothing remained me but to inherit his knowledge. Breathe of his wisdom, and to publish the bees as quickly as possible. He went to Sevenbergen earlier than usual on both these occasions. Again with Margaret; told her of the Dame Van Eyck's goodness, and she manifestion he had come to at last, and invited her co-operation.

She refused it plump.

CHAPTER XI.

"NO, Gerard; you and I have never spoken of your family, but when you are in Italy you must paint your own again. Nay, I do think your father has no objection to me more than to another. He told Peter Claessens so much, and Peter told me. But no long as he is so bent on your being a priest (you ought to be, Gerard, and you shall be, if you love me), I will not marry you, Gerard, dearly as I love you."

Gerard strove in vain to shake this resolution. He found it very easy to make her cry, but impossible to make her yield. Then Gerard was impatient and unjust.

"Very well" he cried; "then you are on their side, and you will drive me to be a priest, for the must end one way or another. My parents hate me in earnest, but my lower only loves me in fun!"

And with this wild, bitter speech he flung away home again, and left Margaret weeping.

THE RAIN.

BY EGBERT PHELPS.

Hear the rain, how it patters
On the roof!
How each tiny globule clatters
On the roof!
With its watery, rushing song,
Painter now, and now more strong,
Making music all night long
On the roof!

How it varies in its noises
Overhead!
With its thousand tiny voices
Overhead!
And I can not lose the rhyme,
For I listen all the time
To its never-ceasing chimo
Overhead!

On the good and on the evil
Still it falls;
Angel, sprite, or human devil,
Still it falls!
Merrily singing as it yields
Blessings to the thirsty fields,
What a fondly power it wields
As it falls!

Mountain, valley, brook, and river,
Bless the rain;
And the dancing leaflets quiver
With the rain:
Save the sparkling, crystal drop
In the silver lily's cup,
How the thirsty earth drinks up
All the rain!

How the floods to-night are falling
On the graves!
With their weirdly voices calling
O'er the graves!
Where the friends we loved of yore,
Now that weary life is o'er,
Weep its cares and ills no more
In their graves.

But as seeds that in the earth
Buried lie,
Ripening for the spring-time birth
Where they lie,
After winter's gloomy reign,
Neath the pellings of the rain,
Shall spring up to life again
Where they lie;

So the forms we bury low
'Neath the sod,
While the living tear-drops flow
O'er the sod,
Are but kernels hid from view,
Soon to spring in joy anew,
And eternal youth renew
With their God.

There are graves in every heart,
Hid from view;
Silent, lonely, and apart
From the view:
Where the funeral rites are said,
And the bitter tears are shed,
O'er the spirit's cherished dead,
Hid from view.

There is gloom in every soul,
Dark and drear;
Harrowing grief beyond control,
Doubt and fear:
But in sorrow's dark decline
Flashes of a light divine,
In their radiant glory shine,
On us here.

Softly fall, gentle rain!
Overhead;
There are voices in thy strain
Overhead;
That recall old memories dear,
And I love to listen here
To the burden that they bear
Overhead.

ALEXANDRIA, LOUISIANA.

GOVERNOR WISE, OF VIRGINIA.

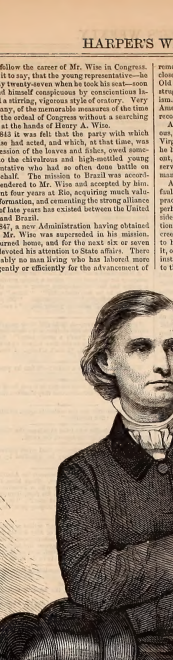
We present our readers this week with a portrait of Governor Henry A. Wise, of Virginia, one of the most prominent politicians of the Union. The portrait, we should mention, was printed on wood at Mr. Brady's photographic establishment in this city.

Mr. Wise was born at Drummond Town, Accomac County, Virginia, on 3d December, 1806, and is, therefore, at the present time, only fifty-two years of age. His family were enabled to give him a good education; he graduated at Washington College, Pennsylvania, and subsequently studied law. On his admission to the bar he removed to Nashville, Tennessee—a town which has witnessed the maiden efforts of not a few of our prominent statesmen. After two years' residence at Nashville, however, the people of Accomac offered to send him to Congress if he would return to his early home. He did so; the promise was kept; and Henry A. Wise made his début, in 1833, in Congress at a time when that body was singularly rich in eloquent and thoughtful men.

It would be foreign to the purpose of this journal to follow the career of Mr. Wise in Congress. Suffice it to say, that the young representative—he was only twenty-seven when he took his seat—soon rendered himself conspicuous by conscientious labor and a stirring, vigorous style of oratory. Very few, if any, of the memorable measures of the time passed the ordeal of Congress without a searching review at the hands of Henry A. Wise.

In 1843 it was felt that the party with which Mr. Wise had acted, and which, at that time, was in possession of the loaves and fishes, owed something to the chivalrous and high-settled young representative who had so often done battle on their behalf. The mission to Brazil was accordingly tendered to Mr. Wise and accepted by him. He spent four years at Rio, acquiring much valuable information, and cementing the strong alliance which of late years has existed between the United States and Brazil.

In 1847, a new Administration having obtained power, Mr. Wise was superseded in his mission. He returned home, and for the next six or seven years devoted his attention to State affairs. There is probably no man living who has labored more intelligently or efficiently for the advancement of



GOVERNOR WISE, OF VIRGINIA.—[PHOTOGRAPHED ON WOOD BY BRADY.]

Virginia, or the development of her material resources, than Henry A. Wise. No one is more thoroughly a master of her various agricultural, manufacturing, and industrial concerns than he. His letters on the oyster trade; on the finances of Virginia, especially those which followed the crisis of 1857; on the railroad system of Virginia, and kindred topics, should be collected in a volume, and published for the instruction of statesmen and the enlightenment of the people of the Old Dominion.

In 1855, it will be remembered, the Know Nothing party, which had suddenly sprung up, was riding victory after victory throughout the Union, and achieving results which appalled the Democracy. It is probable that many of the Know Nothing leaders expected the aid of all who, in former times, had acted in the Whig ranks against the Democracy. If so, they were disappointed in regard to Mr. Wise. Know Nothingism had made prodigious strides in Virginia; to meet its progress, the Democrats perceived that they must run their strongest man for Governor, and the man they chose to be their standard-bearer on the occasion was Henry A. Wise. The canvass will long be remembered—not only as the most bitter and closest gubernatorial contest ever known in the Old Dominion, but as the final and conclusive struggle between Democracy and Know Nothingism. As every one knows, Wise was victorious; Americanism, as it was sometimes called, never recovered from the blow.

As Governor, Mr. Wise has been active, laborious, and useful. Long after he has passed away, Virginia will derive advantage from the measures he has projected, and the measures he has carried out, for the development of her resources. He deserves emphatically to be known as a practical man.

As a politician, Mr. Wise has both merits and faults. He is honest, whole-souled, eloquent, practical; but he is also ambitious to a degree, and perhaps too fond of writing long letters to be considered safe by the political canvasses and conventions which are so potent in our day. An indiscreet utterance by Governor Wise has been used to his injury when its author had long forgotten it, or had changed his opinions entirely. Such, for instance, was the famous saying ascribed to him to the effect that he thanked God there was not a newspaper in his County. The letter to Mr. D. Donnelly, which we published in our last number, is another example of the fatal fluency of his pen. This letter, it is now apparent, was drawn from him insidiously; it was written in the strictest confidence; and though its publication places the Governor in an awkward position, we confess that we know not where to look for a leading politician who could afford to have his private and confidential correspondence thus treacherously exposed to the public eye.

In person Governor Wise is striking; his eye burns with the fire of genius, and his action in speaking is singularly electrical. In debate he is courteous and intrepid; probably no Southern orator of the present day possesses in so high a degree the power of fascinating an audience. In all the relations of life, Governor Wise typifies in a very admirable manner true Southern chivalry.

Two of Governor Wise's sons are known to the public. One of them, Rev. Henry A. Wise, Jun., as an eloquent and learned preacher; and the other, Mr. O. Jennings Wise, as the Editor of the Richmond Enquirer, and a powerful and sagacious journalist.

CLIFFS HOUSE, NEWPORT, Aug. 13.

It is as we supposed; we are quite full here now. The appalling hosts of other places have proved Newport's opportunity; and here it has really been nothing to complain of—only warmth enough to suggest how dreadful it must be elsewhere, and to prompt a thought of gratitude that we comfortably out of it.

In consideration of this languid state of the atmosphere, and which still continues, we shall leave the gay doings of cottage and chateau alike unnoticed this week, and rush out into the Bellevue, and recall its sea-breezes, and review its brilliant company. There has been a good beach most afternoons, which means that the tide of waters has been at its lowest, and the ebb of fashion at its highest point. There is, it is well known, nothing so exhilarating as rapid exercise in the open air, and on the beach the very horses seem to participate in the excitement, and, meeting with pleasure at the sea-breeze, trot off exultingly.

Here comes tearing down the hill B—— I——'s four-in-hand. We designate this gentleman as others do, the rather that we often noticed that when a man is thus called by a familiar name it is because he is popular with his acquaintances. The ladies in the carriage on the right and left look out alarmed as the team dashes by; but fear nothing, Madam, the cattle are admirably managed, and you may see your coachman is looking at them not in uneasiness but in admiration, and he knows better than you do what good driving is.

A light carriage and a smart pair of horses glide in among the others, and we recognize by his vail, or in spite of his vail, De I——, Esq. He complains of his eyesight; but we have often thought that his selection of the companion of his afternoon drive did not indicate any defect of vision, since whenever our carriages have met on these occasions we have seen him accompanied not only by the prettiest but the youngest ladies of our society. This privilege is said to be well merited by the agreeable qualities as well as the perfectly appointed equipage of the Monsieur vidi el cavaliero, as we heard a Frenchman call him the other day.

And here comes a nice equipage, a sort of double phaeton and duc hence; and we recognize in the charioteer the pleasant countenance of A. B——, Esq., and the graceful form by his side, shrouded in deep mourning, looking so fair and young, is Mrs. B——, and the mother of that fine spirited little boy who is now trotting his pony by her side, and laughing gleefully at his apparent race with mamma.

And here come some of our fair equestrians. We have already named some of these as riding well, and were we to speak more plainly of others (and the majority) who ride ill, we should tell no new truth to themselves or others, for every one has a self-consciousness of what they do well, particularly riding on horseback. Let us hope these young ladies will all manage to keep in their saddles. And here comes Mr. A——'s goodly person on a goodly horse, and one was perhaps the handsomest which drew the other. Fortunate youth! One may come to worse grief than a good marriage and a charming wife.

There are many, many pretty faces smiling and nodding to us from splendid barouches and comfortable rockaways, and there are some must lovely children, but, poor innocents! why are they thus victimized with finery in this hot weather? What a trial of their patience it must have been the putting them into these embroidered and tucked and braided and be-buttoned dresses; and how hot and uncomfortable those scarlet or yellow nodding plumes seem to be on their foreheads! The mammas (some of them) seem to have learned for themselves the charm of sunshades, but will they be so for their offspring? We have nothing to say of "the fast" young men or their fast equipages. They are not here, and we trust that we will not even look at them, with their odious beards and cigars and pipes and cocked-up hats and "horses" has gone by; and all we will say is,

"Come out of that," if you can, and be men.

The first "ball" of the season was held last week at this hotel; but as it is so long ago, and, as it were, too early, we think it more civil to go at once to the party at the Fishhouses last evening. It was given in the dining-room, which was prettily decorated for the occasion with pink and white hangings, and lighted by wax-candles, which shed a more becoming radiance upon fair faces than can ever be attained by the quinquet glare of gas. There is one lady one always thinks of first in going to the Fishhouses House, since she has been for so many years a steady adherent of its fortunes, and is so associated with its many attractions, and she is one, too, so justly beloved, so gracious, so kind to all, that in saying this it is almost unnecessary to name Mrs. W. F.

We shall have so many of these parties during the season, and the description of one must be so much like another, that not to weary our readers with gauze and satin, wreaths of roses, and angels in white muslin, upon every occasion of the kind, we shall select a few, from time to time, more in some way seem to call for notice. How could we, for instance, forbear to speak of the Baltimore belle, Miss Hyde-Lyon, with her peculiar gifts of coloring, looking unlike any one else, and yet charming in every one, yet hardly ever like her self?

"It is perhaps only the attraction of youth and freshness." So you say until you look again, and decide that freshness is beauty—positive beauty; and then again you think it is only the pretty, winning manner. But it does not matter much. Miss —— is a most affectionate creature. There are many pretty women, but many we think very much overrated; and we think that many more are felt so themselves, with their silks and their natures, their Brussels lace trimmings and even jewels, beside some of the exquisitely fresh and appropriate toilets of their more judicious sister-beauties. How lovely was mucoilke-Lucy Stevenson! Mrs. S——s, in a muslin dress of delicate green and white tints, and a wreath of Parma violets around her hair! How soft and graceful—graceful she looked! We hope for their sakes that others that lingered around them did not feel the spell as potently as we acknowledge to have done.

In rich contrast to this moonlight lady was handsome Mrs. ——, of Baltimore, superbly and brilliant, with fine dark eyes, darker hair, and a round splendor form, like la Divine Montalbanese. Mrs. G——d, of New York, was very well dressed and is very handsome, with superb raven-wing hair, eye to match, and transcendental neck and shoulders. There are many of the young ladies we should like to speak of, but it is not necessary that we hesitate to draw them forth to the public gaze, but think they are, perhaps, better left, in the first freshness of their white muslin and blue, as much seclusion as what is so pretty and attractive can expect.

There were several ladies present who presented other attractions. Miss S——, of Boston, with her inconceivable gifts of conversation; Miss ——e, of the nine places, so refined, so elegant, and so courteous; female one dislikes to find fault with, and how well that stately brow would have become a coronet of strawberry leaves! But enough for to-day. Need to have descriptions of parties be kept from this gracious company, these fair scenes, by the vague remonstrances of duty or of business, but you will admit that we have drawn a captivating, aloof a true, picture of "Newport the Pleasant."

Who cares for the grumblers who say "they are weary of it"? Which is always the case, and why do So are they always the same things, with their vapid minds and worn-out senses. You hear some assert—as "If that is entertainment full" "full of what?" we fill the hotel society, and the hotels the cottages," but this only proves how much they are out of element and enjoyment in all, and for all. We shall return to these "grumblers" again, for we have not time to-day fully prove how unreasonable and how absurd they are. And another day we must return, too, to a fresh history of our "Pleasant" and their inmates; the chain has been broken by the press of other matters. DANE GRENVIL.

GRAVES OF THE INNOCENTS.

We stood before the "Graves of the Innocents."

As we turned reluctantly to pursue our journey, I inquired from Darley was there any legend or story connected with this sweet and pathetic little ridge-place? Regarding me with an indescribable look, he bowed forth:

"There's an odd manner in these parts, called the Manor of Frisco, belonging to the rank odd stock. They got half the country round by the law, but the odd Friscites were gallows auld chaps for wine and women, and horses, dogs, and hawks, rain and shootin, and spendin their money in foreign parts. Och! mushi! 'twas a great auld place in times gone by and the auld castle of Frisco stood still, yur honor, an would do yer heart good to look at it; every stone as perfect as the day it was built—divil a fut less than thirteen feet of it—the stone-work is in every wall of it—and you might maneuver a regiment in the auld courtyard. The last of the Friscites that was in the country-seat—he was a rale, true—shocking, and had always a wild clan about him; but there was one desperate scoundrel that used to set him on for all sorts of mischief. No good could come of it, and so the neighbors and tinants said; but this blackhearted rascal drew him so from bad to worse until he had to have the country, and this time he was made agint over the property. Och! wirra-wirra! that was a sad day for the auld stock, I'm ernel—for they never know bad thratement until then.

"I see that brake up in the mountains, there, yer honor?

"I do, Darley!"

"That's called Tubberacre?" continued he. "And my cabin stood a thirsty gunshot from the finist of the Friesrle, by the name of Con Flaherty. Can had the best farm on the estate, for he was own foreman to great Friesrle, and a man of his ways at his elbow, until this black-livered hound of an agint put him against him. Con had just been married to the prettiest Colleen Dhas in all Berry; and many an achin heart there was among the boys the day she became Mrs. Flaherty.

"Now the agint, Minthur Dan O'Mara he was called, a Dublin attorney—had took to the likes of thim—but as liquorish a tooth, and was as bad a boy as ever walked the hall or the floor entry; and many a poor father and mother's curse was upon his head, for many was the poor misfortunate girl even he left without name or character, deluded and deserted; and sure, yer honor," appealed Darley, "a man that id take an innocent girden on to ruin and destruction, and a nameless grave among strangers, to satisfy a few hours of his own bad passions, is no man at all—he's a brute-baste! Well, this was the sort of chap that had the whole of the manor of Friesrle outthher him. But the man meet his dapped his eyes on Norean Flaherty, and he was fairly illuminated about her. Now, Captain, jewel, it's very much throuble and sin to have more virtuous than another, ids an Irishwoman's to convey a beauty there's not a one now and again, but in the mane they bate creation. Norean was one of them. Norean up as she tould Minther O'Mara that if he dares to lay hands agin on her character or to make her husband lave marks upon him that he'd carry to his grave, that he loved as, and was more than a match for him, and that he'd see him—or bether-hearted couple in the counthry round; the poor never left their door empty-handed, and the strangers never went wellkins. A year rovelled on, and ther first child was born—a darlint, such a beautiful crathur—Norean would jump and clap its dawsby hands, and crow at every body, shwim it had the leg, giureon heart of father and mother in it. Con was a fine-looking young gilcen, too, and 'twas like a wee spring-flower that shwims among the grass. But the black-hearted O'Mara was working his evil plans—and he persecuted the life and soul out of poor Con Flaherty, until things became so bad that Con was forced to get himself and he shtruck the agint one day at the door of Castle Frisco with his fist, and he was finely thrashed, so poor Con was clapped into jail and kep there, and poor Norean undthervent such a persecution and had been obliged many times to throw the people said, that to save poor Con from the hulks, she did more even than she ought for him. And so that as it may, the day poor Con got out of jail and kem home, Norean died shessin' him and the purty darlint. The agint was at the bottom of and seized every thing on the farm for the rint and license due the whole 'Year of the Famine' and days after Con Flaherty rowled up his poor little gideon in his frieze coat-more and left the home that had been his and Norean's, for the miserable, ther's before him, a desperate and a ruined man, and, in a half-fit of madness, swore a deep revenge, that he would have a deep and bloody revenge on Minther Dan O'Mara.

"Well, yer honor, the agint heard that Con was goin about threatnin his life, and he went and had a pistol in his belt, and a dirk in his boot, he would make yer heart bleed if I was to tell you the way they hunted that poor fellow through the counthry, like a big black dog after a hare. Ov coorse, until the neighbors began to cry shame on him; the people had a right to their own opinions, and might or day he never left the little, dawsby, darlin Norean, the glory yer grace of his lot, ruined house and the empty firaplin in his cabin, and never kept her wrap up in his big coat, and no matter how the storm blasted, little Norean was sheltered as well bin. The neighbors at last missed him for a day or two, and when they wint to look after him they found him dead in one of the fields, with the poor little body of his little darlint clasped to the jewel of his poor broken heart. They buried the poor darlin there and then, and many is the night the people of poor Con could see a shadow sittin up upon her little grave, for his all was there.

"Con told every one he agint had to go through the Black Pass, as it was then called, and his cruelly hart quailed within him as he remembered havin heard of poor Con Flaherty's threats, and he had marthered was buried there; bud he couldn't go back, for that was certain death and destruction. So he got fairly opposite the mound his heart lepped up in his mouth as he saw a tall, dark figure walking about, as if it was the diver, and hairs did rise in his way.

"'Who's-he-s-there?' says he, with a voice that he dant stannin of an ind.

"'Me!' says a voice, that sounded more like one from under than any thing else.

"'Who are you?' says he, the voice makin him behind.

"'Con Flaherty!' was the answer.

"'Oh, you black villian!' shouts O'Mara, 'would you come for a dishclout?'

"'My wife was dishculess, and so was my child!' said O'Flaherty. 'And you murthered thim.'

"'No—no—no!' says the villain, his teeth knocking together and the hair standing on end, 'they die natural!'

"'You murthered O'Flaherty, 'twice-to-night,' says he, 'I had you covered, and the waving of a blade of grass would have sent your soul to its long all round the country, and on the anniversary of their deaths, if the father or mother are able to travel at all, they come to the grave to pray, and dress it with fresh flowers and garlands: and they think that the spirit of their child is watchin and prayin for them, and would go to glory for the honor, while I tell you that many a black and foul deed has been prevented by a pilgrimage to the VALLEY OF THE INNOCENTS!"

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A LAWYER, who was sometimes forgetful, having been engaged to plead the cause of an offender, began by saying, "I know the prisoner at the bar, and he bears the character of being a consummate and most impudent scoundrel!" Here somebody whispered to him that the prisoner was his client. "I mean," continued the lawyer, "the other prisoner at the bar." But what great and good man ever tried who was not astonished by many of his contemporaries?

MARRIED THE NURSE OF IT.—"Talking of getting a good deal out of a little piece of land," said Simeon, "why, I bought an acre of old Mr. Jones, planted it all over with potatoes and the other with corn." "I thought you and you bought only one acre, Simeon," remarked the listener. "How could you plant two?" "Very easily, Sir; I stood it up on end, and planted both sides of it."

A pedagogue had two pupils, Dick and Tom. To one he was very partial, and to the other very severe. One morning it happened that both were late, and were called to account for it, and each made the following reply, here—why did you not come?" "Please, Sir," said his favorite, "I overslept myself." "And you, you rascal?" said I thought the school bell was the cloanbell but that I was goin to," was the reply. "Why, if any genius of excuse like yourself;" "and now, Sir," turning to the other, "what excuse have you to offer?" "Why, Sir," the puzzled boy, "I—I was waiting to see Tom off."

"I rejoice," said a sage of the tribe of Penobscot, "but these things to make me happy." "Why, Sir?" inquired a pale-face. "Because," was the reply, "I am a man." "Bum." "Well, what is the child?" "Why," said the philosopher, "a little more rum."

A jester in the court of Francis I. complained that a favored lord treated him with scorn. The king at once began joking about him. "If he does so," said the King, "I will make him do it in five minutes before." "Your majesty could hang him five minutes before," replied the jester.

A NEW DARDE.—"Shall I have the pleasure of your company for the next set?" asked a gentleman in front of a pretty but not well-educated young woman at a ball. "What is to be danced?" she replied. "The Lancers," the young man, referring to his programme. "Oh, you must excuse me, Sir," said the young lady; "I can't dance Latin!"

LITTLE DIGBY.—A little girl, three years old, was riding in a train with her mother, a few days since, when a lady stranger, Miss ——'s guest, got on the cars, and Digby's aunt fished for as she drew herself up to her full height, and replied, "I ain't a lady. I wear boots and hoops."

When is a lover like a tailor?—When he presses his suit.

How is it that the trees can put on a new dress without opening their Privies?—Because they inter-out their summer clothing.

Did any one ever see the umbrella again which he had lent for the "benefit of humanity?"

The Funnnbulum who tried to balance the North Pole, got seriously cut by the axes of the earth.

The Cincinnati Commercial says: "Among gunsmiths are two short, the difficulty may be remedied by wearing thick soles."

The battle of Koke, fought between the Austrians and Prussians, was lost by the latter. Their king, immediately after the battle, published a proclamation in which he had received a wound in his face, inquired, "Is there any general who has got his nose cut off?" and replied the soldier, "where your majesty paint the redcoats."

"A worthy but poor minister," writes a friend from the country, "has received a loan of fifty dollars from a cashier of our bank; and in the note requesting the favor, he says he would 'pay in as soon as the first of next January.'" The cashier returned word, that by the rules of the bank the dividends must come in by July.

A farce was produced in Bannister's time under the title of "Fire and Water."

The critics in the pit said he.

"What fate?" whispered the anxious author in his ear.

"Why," replied the manager, "unfortunate: "why, what can fire and water produce but a hiss?"

A COMPREHEND.—A few days since an old tiger died and was buried. Some of the clergymen in the vicinity listened to the testimony of the surgeon, and suggested that perhaps the tiger was not dead. The surgeon had no object. "Mr. Coroner," said he, "I have known the animal to breathe after he was dead, and I have known a noise uncount all that time. To say that such a man can die and come to life again is a contradiction of terms. It can't be done." Those who—he never has any time to lose—will be glad to learn that the Coroner's jury, in their verdict on the tiger, found no fault with the surgeon's verdict I am willing to sign the difference—got the tiger's death, and that he had died "from the effects of brandy and water on the brain." The verdict was unanimous, was so returned.

A stranger from the country observing an ordinary ruler rule on the table, took it up, and inquiring its use, remarked, "I know a rule for counting money, which is well bred, as to assisted politeness, to ask unnecessary questions, which last, is rare and even, and an unusual occurrence, often in the harness of bullied curiosity, inquired, "Where is the rule?" "Number, do you count money with that?" "Yes."

"Pray, madam, what do you charge for recovering an umbrella?" said Mistress O'Flaherty, from Tipperary, the other day, stopping into an umbrella shop.

"Let me see it," was the reply.

"Why, what's the use of that? just what I want to do: for I've lost one, and I see you stick to your umbrellas for a very small charge." "Step this way, madam, and you to recover mine."

"Why don't you ask your street-beat to marry you?" "I have asked her."

"You did and she refused you?"

"Oh, I've the refusal of her."

Fatality is sometimes unusual, as well as gentleness. Many a man has many ideas in his head, and many a wife wives in sheep's clothing.

Many a man's eyesight is so poor that you may see as much as is to be seen; by the use of another kind of glasses you may see twice as much.

An inordinate desire to obtain possession of secrets is an unerring indication of inability to keep them.

"Don't your teeth leak, captain, when it rains?" "No, madam, they always pitch overboard."

In the Talmud there is a terrible figure descriptive of the fate of lying and its liars. "Once upon a time," it says, seven years ago, a carpenter dropped his axe, and it fell, and not only reached the bottom.

A decent man in Hawick was telling his wife of the war, and that in consequence the price of meat was rising; "I'll tell you what, replied the woman, "I'll not pay it; I will raising the price of meat do to the war?"

A French regiment, at the battle of Solferino, had orders to give no quarter. A German officer being taken, begged for his life. "Sir," replied the commanding officer, "I may ask me any other favor; but as to quarter, I may as well as impossible for me to grant it."

A New Novel by Lever.

Dr. Mackay's Travels in America.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.
Just published:

Life and Liberty in America;
Or, Sketches of a Tour in the United States and Canada in 1857–8. By CHARLES MACKAY, LL.D., F.S.A. 2 vols., 12mo. Muslin, $1.75.
"Life and Liberty in America" is a bright, fresh, and hopeful book, presenting a picture of society as it could not be seen or described by a native. Dr. Mackay writes as himself and as "Dr. Bull" would have done, so that "Life" as well as "Liberty" is the studied in both in the North and South, in the East and West.
We commend it to the attention of our readers as the result of careful and diligent observation, assisted by the experience of a man of letters, and qualified by habit to the attainment of truth.—Leader.

SOMETHING NEW.—B. T. BABBITT'S BEST
SALERATUS.
Is manufactured from common salt, and is composed entirely different from other Saleratus. All the deleterious matter extracted in such manner as to produce Bread, Biscuits, and all kinds of Cake, without subjecting a particle of stomachion when the Bread or Cake is baked; thereby producing wholesome results. Every particle of Saleratus is turned to gas and passes through the Bread or Biscuit while Baking; consequently, nothing Poisonous is left in the Bread or Cake. This article will be sold by the trade of the Saleratus that is entirely different from other Saleratus.
It is packed in one pound papers, each wrapper bearing, "B. T. Babbitt's Best Medicinal Saleratus;" also, picture, bridal and of bread, with a glass of effervescing water on the top. When you purchase one paper you should preserve the wrapper, and be particular to get the next to this, that the fresh—bread so shows.
Full directions for making Bread with this Saleratus will be found in each package. Each package will accompany each package also, directions for making all kinds of Pastry cake, for making Soda Water and Seidlitz Powders.

A HOUSEHOLD WORD.

Says
HENRY WARD BEECHER,
"Sam Slick has run his race. Mrs. Partington now is the American humorist; original, genial, laughable, and not uninstructive. We wish it to be understood that 'Jack' is included in these remarks. No one should buy the new Mrs. Partington's shrill to laugh."

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES
has said that "Humor must have fooling in it, wit needs it not. Mrs. Partington has only fun. Nothing's more sensation with the excutive driver has more feeling and humor than even his wit."

KNITTING WORK,
By MRS. PARTINGTON,

is not wholly a humorous book, but a happy combination of philosophy and mirth, in which the most fruitful thoughts and sentiments are scattered among Partingtonian crayons and quips.
It is elegantly illustrated by whose own appreciation of humor has been well applied to MRS. PARTINGTON and KNITTING WORK.

GUSTUS HOPPIN,

As the present indications are, that the sale of the book will even surpass that of the old lady's previous volume, of which over

Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 10 to 80 pages—and from one third to one half—more reading than any other Monthly publication.

A Splendid Number.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
FOR SEPTEMBER.

Whoever has had occasion to consult the past volumes of the MAGAZINE would have been struck with the multiplicity of papers embodying important geographical, historical, and scientific facts, so that, apart from its merits as a storehouse of entertaining reading, it is of no small value as a work of general information, and as a great variety of subjects. The "Monthly Record of Current Events," in particular, though presenting little immediate interest at the date of its publication, increases in importance from year to year, as new furniture a sort of chronological summary, the convenience and satisfactory character of which will be the most highly appreciated by those who have the most frequent occasion to refer to the events of the day.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE is, emphatically, the American people's magazine. Sound in religion, conservative in politics, elegant in taste, varied in matter, entertaining with sympathy and humor, and gilded all the time by a purity unknown to any rival. It will be even more so hereafter. It will live as soon. We rejoice in its prosperity.—New Orleans Christian Advocate.

NAVY YARD, WASHINGTON, Nov. 24, 1858.

SIR—

Agreeably to your order of the 1st inst., we have witnessed a series of satisfactory experiments made with T. A. DELANO'S Life-Preserving Vest, and have the honor to report that we consider it a valuable invention, well adapted as the means of saving human life, from its convenient form, and the readiness with which it can be inflated, and slight liability to get out of order.

With respect, your obedient servant,

CHARLES C. TURNER,
Commodore U. S. Navy.
WM. S. MAURY, Lieutenant.
T. W. PATTERSON, Lieutenant.
GEORGE W. WILLIAM TH, Lieutenant.
W. H. HAMILTON, Gunner.

To ISAAC TOUCEY, Secretary of the Navy.

SACKETT, R. I., October 6th 1858.

Delano Life-Preserving Vest Company:

GENTLEMEN—I have examined the improved Life-Preserving Vest, invented by T. A. Delano, and find that it is put to many severe tests, six of which it has so admirably stood that I consider it a perfect protection against drowning. The elastic straps prevent a large amount of inflation without incumbering or fatiguing the body, and, as far as I am aware, are an entirely new device and a very useful invention.

Yours, very respectfully,
GEO. W. CULLUM,
Capt. U. S. Engineers.

HEALTH OF AMERICAN WOMEN.

The great value of the GRAEFENBERG MEDICINES, including their splendid remedy, Murdock's Uterine Catholicon, is guaranteed by testimonials from the most distinguished men in the country, whose name and the evidence of genuine character, are at the service of any person interested. Among them are Instructions of the GOVERNORS OF TWO STATES, the Chairman of the BOARD OF HEALTH OF NEW YORK, one of the Surgeons-in-Chief of BELLEVUE HOSPITAL, many Clergymen, including the Rev. N. Bangs, D.D., the HEAD OF THE METHODIST CHURCH, THE STATE CHEMIST AND ASSAYER of the State of Massachusetts, THE MAYOR OF NEW YORK CITY, UNITED STATES COMMISSIONER to Great Britain, the PROPRIETOR of BARNUM'S MUSEUM, and many other public men, together with Editorial Notices from the leading Journals in the country.

To Dr. Valentine Mott, President and Professor of Surgery.

To Dr. G. S. Bedford, Professor of Diseases of Women, New York University.

To Dr. Willard Parker, President of Academy of Medicine.

To Dr. J. Marion Sims, Head of Women's Hospital, New York.

To Dr. John C. Cheeseman, Professor of Diseases of Women, New York:

GENTLEMEN: Your position in the medical profession is very high. You claim for yourselves great medical and surgical abilities, and profess to teach others how to cure disease. Can you do it yourselves?

The consulting physicians of the Graefenberg Company make no professions of position. They only claim to cure disease, and are willing to rest their case upon the testimony of those they have cured, and not upon any position or honors awarded by a self-constituted medical board. From each of you, gentlemen, patients have come to the consulting rooms of THE GRAEFENBERG COMPANY. In some instance, you have received your skill, and given them up as incurable. In other instances, you have nearly killed them, and made their cure very slow and difficult, by injudicious mystic operations. Yet, under the beneficent and judicious operation of the Graefenberg treatment, a LL of those apparent sufferers are in a fair way to be cured; MOST of them are cured already.

☞ The Graefenberg Family Medicines will always cure all diseases for which they are recommended with certainty and safety.

The Graefenberg Manual of Health and their celebrated series of medicines should be in every family.—Scientific American, New York.

The Graefenberg Medicines are better than silver, and their Manual of Health is an able work.—Hanover Argus.

The Graefenberg Manual of Health is a capital little book, full of useful medical information, so plain that "he who runs may read," and with the Graefenberg Medicines applied, a common sense principle to practice.—Pennsylvanian, Philada.

The Graefenberg theory varies from all newfangled notions, but it will preserve and restore health.—Sun New York News.

The Graefenberg Medicines and the Manual of Health are invaluable, and should be in every family.—N. Y. Sun.

ECKART THE TRUSTY.

[FROM GOETHE.]

"How dark it is growing—I wish we were back!
They are coming, they're here, the hobgoblins, shark!
The band of the Sorceress Sisters!
See, see, where they come! If they light on us here,
They'll be certain to drink every drop of the beer
It has cost us such trouble to fetch here."

So saying, the children push on in affright,
When up from the heath starts a grizzly old wight.
"Stop, stop, child!—my children, be quiet!
They are thirsty and hot, for they come from the chase,
Let them drink what they like without squall or grimace,
And the Gretmore Ones they will be gracious."

And up come the goblins that moment, and they Look ghostlike and gruesome, and ghastly and gray,
Yet they revel and riot it roundly.
The beer it has vanish'd, the pitchers are bare,
Then whooping and hooting away through the air,
O'er hill and dale clatter the Weird Ones.

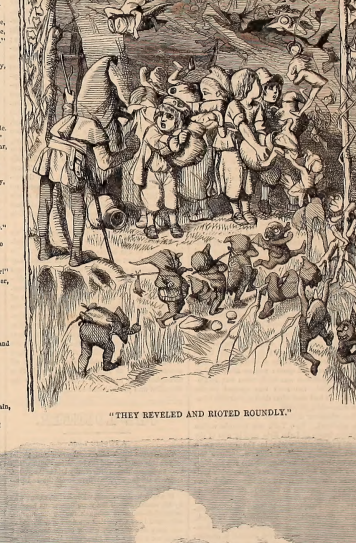
Of homeward, all quaking, the children they hied,
And the kindly old graybeard trops on by their side.
"Do not weep so and whimper, my darlings."
"They'll scold us and beat us for this!" "Never fear,
All yet will go famously well with the beer,
If you'll only be mum as young mice, dears.

"Mind you follow my bidding, and surely you may,
I am he who delights with small children to play:
You know me—Old Eckart the Trusty.
Of that wonderful wight you've heard many a lay,
But never had proof what he is till to-day:
Now you hold in your hands a most rare one."

Arrived at their home, each small child, with a face
Of terror, his pitcher sets down in its place,
And waits to be beaten and scolded.
When the old folks they cry: "Oh, what excellent beer!"
Twice, four times they take a strong pull at the cheer,
Yet still do the pitchers brim over.

The miracle lasted that night and next day:
And if you should ask, as you very well may,
What became, in the end, of the pitchers?
The little mice titter, enjoying the joke,
But at length, Sire, they stammer'd and stutter'd and spoke,
And the pitchers immediately dried up!

And, children, if e'er, looking kindly and true,
An old man, or father, or mother touch you,
Give heed, and do all that he bids you.
Though to bridle your tongues it may cost you some pain,
Yet to chatter is bad, to be silent is gain,
And it makes the beer brim in the pitchers!



"THEY REVELED AND RIOTED ROUNDLY."

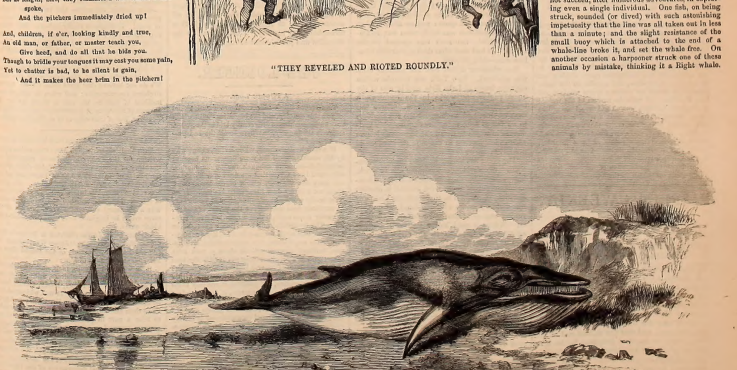
THE WHALE FOUND NEAR FLUSHING, L. I.

EARLY on Wednesday morning, August 10, two fishermen, near Willett's Point, on the north shore of Long Island, wandering down to the beach, were astonished at seeing a fish of extraordinary size fast between two rocks which the receding tide had left dry, and faintly floundering with its tail and fins. The prize proved to be a whale of the Razor-back species, especially interesting to naturalists because its kind are never taken by whalemen, and but few opportunities occur, therefore, of examining it; and of interest to the general observer because it belongs to that branch of the whale family which is, on all hands, proved to be the largest, the mightiest, and the only one which has hitherto successfully baffled the ingenuity and bravery of man exerted for its capture. Dr. Robert Hamilton calls the Rorqual, to which variety this whale belongs, "the mightiest giant of them all, and probably the most powerful and bulky of created beings."

The illustration to be found herewith will give the reader an accurate idea of the appearance of the stranded whale. It was a young one, and probably strayed into Long Island Sound in search of food, and getting bewildered among the eddies and currents, was carried, unknowingly, to the inlet, where the receding tide left it high and dry. Its length is not quite twenty-five feet; the flukes or tail measured six feet across; the head was about one fourth the bulk of the body, and into the mouth, when opened, a man could easily crawl on his hands and knees. The plaits or folds which extended along the under jaw and belly, would, when fully extended, form a sack which would hold five or six hundred gallons of water, containing the medusæ, shrimp, and fish which form this whale's food.

But vast as are the parts of even so young an animal as this, what are they compared with those of a grown specimen, such as was washed ashore on the coast of Scotland in 1693, and measured 78 feet in length; or another found dead by Mr. Scoresby, in Davis' Straits, which measured 105 feet? In 1831, one 83 feet in length was dissected by Dr. Knox, on the Scottish coast, and the vast skeleton was exhibited for some years in England.

Mr. Scoresby—than whom there have been few more enterprising whalemen—once ordered a general attack on Razor-backs whenever seen; but did not succeed, after numerous adventures, in capturing even a single individual. One fish, on being struck, sounded (or dived) with such astonishing impetuosity that the line was all taken out in less than a minute; and the slight resistance of the small buoy which is attached to the end of a whale-line broke it, and set the whale free. On another occasion a harpooner struck one of these animals by mistake, thinking it a Right whale.



THE WHALE FOUND NEAR FLUSHING, LONG ISLAND.

"It dived obliquely with such velocity that 2800 feet of line were drawn from the boat in a minute of time. This time also the line broke." Dr. Samuel, a French naturalist, who observed this species of whale, says, "The male and female seem united by the strongest bands of affection." In one case taken which were swimming along together. One was "struck" first; whereon the other, which remained free, exhibited much uneasiness, swam to the boat, and with one stroke of its tail killed three men and precipitated them into the sea. The author includes instances of loss by company, and "when the one was killed the other uttered lamentable and terrible cries."

Ten years ago an enterprising trade of a Greenport whale ship, whaling on the coast of New Holland, venture to run still evening in search of one of these whales. The sea was smooth, and there was just breeze enough to carry the boat on the whale, who remained quite unsuspicious of an enemy's presence. No sooner was the harpoon darted though, than the whale started off, and at such tremendous speed that the line not running out fast enough, the boat was dragged ahead at such a rate as a few minutes to have nearly completely water-logged. As soon as possible the line was cut, and when the breathless whalers had gathered themselves up to repair the damage, it was found that oars, boat's mast and sail, and hats, were entirely missing articles, while the dried cedar planks of which a whale boat is made had in the furious rush become so saturated with salt, the boat was useless forever after. Another story shows the surprising strength of even the young of this species. A very small whale, about the whale had been swimming about a Sag Harbor whaleman, bound for the Indian Ocean, for the greater part of a day. Toward evening, no sperm whales showing themselves, the captain determined on a little excitement by capturing the young Razor-back. The boat was lowered, and the unsuspicious calf presently felt a harpoon in its skin. Off he started, to the surprise of his would-be captors, dragging the heavy boat at the rate of about eight miles an hour. They could only submit perforce to lance, but waited in momentary expectation of the mammal's exhaustion. But he was not to be so till he had carried them at least ten miles from the ship, when at last he succumbed to a well aimed lance. He was a big, healthy, and powerful and nettlesome little whale measured but sixteen feet! and the happy boatsmen of his size were more than three inches long. He could not have been even a yearling. Marten, an old chronicler of the Greenland whale fishery, speaks of the capture of a small whaling sloop having inadvertently fastened to one of these whales, were dragged along with such extreme velocity that they lost all presence of mind, and, neglecting to cut the line, which had been made fast, were drawn under a vast body of heavy ice, where they all perished.

But though the whale possesses and to leave this powerful animal unmolested, the natives of Greenland do not hesitate to attack it in their rude kayaks. They harpoon it, and dart their keen knives into its huge sides, till at length, often after many hours in the fight, it sinks; whereupon it is towed or loaded with its flesh, which these people consider a great delicacy.

We append the dimensions of the stranded whale, from our own careful measurement:

	Ft.	In.
Greatest length	34	0
Breadth of head	8	0
Length of jaw	6	0
Height of forehead over the back from the fin	5	0
Circumference near dorsal fin	6	0
Size of mouth, from gullet to end	4	0
Apparent diameter of gullet	1	3
Length of tail	6	0
Length of longest blade of baleen		5½
Spade-bone, length		2
Pipe-sockets, length		3½
Kyshall web, length		2

The head is flat and somewhat pointed; the eyes are situated in a projection immediately at the corners of the mouth. The side fins, which are finely curved and pointed, hang below the line of the eyes, and measure six inches behind. The dorsal fin is small, pointed, and curved back. The body is not cylindrical, like the right or sperm whale's, but compressed at the sides, and angular on the back. The tail is shaped not unlike a sperm whale's, and lies, of course, with the surface of the water. The color black, and skin smooth and firm, looking like India rubber. The tongue is a large mass of fat and muscle, and the entire upper jaw apparently double at the end, and quite free toward the end. The two spout-holes are divided by a fleshy web, which also is curiously depressed in the middle, giving the appearance of three orifices. They are situated near the termination of the head, and diverge abaft, somewhat in the form of the letter V.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 27, 1859.

THE ERIE RAILROAD IN THE HANDS OF A RECEIVER.

THE NEW YORK and Erie Railroad Company passed, a few days ago, under an order of Court, into the hands of a Receiver. It may be as well to explain at once that a Receiver is a custodian appointed by law to property in litigation; that pending the receivership such property can not be brought to execution or sold for debt; and that the natural end of the receivership is the final judgment in the lawsuit in which the appointment of the Receiver was a preliminary proceeding. A Receiver was appointed, in this case, on the application of the fourth mortgage bond-holders, who were apprehensive that the property would be brought to execution under judgments obtained against it by creditors posterior to themselves: the Receiver will continue to hold the property and administer it until a decree of foreclosure is obtained and the road is sold out under the fourth mortgage.

That the Erie Railroad Company would come to this end, sooner or later, was long since foreseen by every one. The vices of its organization were incurable: it was plain enough, years ago, that no one but the Sheriff could afford any relief to the overgrown, mismanaged, and plundered corporation. But the long postponal of the catastrophe has not mitigated the shame and indignation with which honest men have contemplated the scandal. From first to last, the history of the Erie Railroad—the greatest enterprise of the greatest State in the Union—is a shameful, disgraceful, and humiliating to New Yorkers.

Twenty-five years will soon have elapsed since the State Legislature granted the first survey of a broad road through the wilderness between New York City and Lake Erie. Railroads were then almost unknown. In the year 1832 that the idea of a railroad on the line of the State road was suggested. The vigor with which it was taken up forces credit on the enterprise of that day. In the year 1832 the New York State Legislature chartered the New York and Erie Railroad Company, with a capital of ten millions of dollars. The next question was to raise the money. In 1833, one million was ordered and paid in. In 1834, another million and a quarter were raised and spent. In 1835, about half a million went the same way. In 1836, three more millions were added to the list and squandered. Six years afterward the road was not built, the money was all gone, and the Company—made up of men who, then as now loud, and probably just, complaint of corrupt management and fraudulent speculation in connection with the enterprise—was, every one at this stage, to exhale that flavor of roguery which hangs round it still.

The honest, far-seeing men, however, who perceived that at any cost the road must be built. They prevailed upon the State to forgive the Company its debt of three millions. They prevailed upon the people of New York to advance more money. A committee called into requirement measures which were to specify to solicit subscriptions, offering to pay 7 per cent on the stock taken; they succeeded in raising the money, and in the year 1841 $7,500,000 was all that the complete work would cost: such was the estimate of George Griswold, Jacob Little, and other men of note.

The money, as we have said, was raised and spent. Three millions more were raised by an issue of bonds; they were swept into the maelstrom and disappeared. The road was not built. In 1850, people had begun to despair. Mr. President Loder now declared positively that $11,178,000 would be the cost. Mr. Loder had set out with the estimate of George Griswold, Jacob Little, and other men of note.

The money, as we have said, was raised and spent. Three millions more were raised by an issue of bonds; they were swept into the maelstrom and disappeared. The road was not built. In 1850, people had begun to despair. Mr. President Loder now declared positively that $11,178,000 would be the cost. He then set to end, and equip it for business; as to returns, it was plain to see that, after paying the interest on its bonds, the Company would divide 10 per cent. per annum on the stock. People were not very sanguine; but California had just begun to yield gold, and the times were buoyant, and more money was contributed. By New Year 1851, Mr. President Loder admitted that three millions more would be required to finish the road; they, too, were raised and spent; by mid-summer of that year the Company borrowed other three millions, and, yet, were borrowed and spent: and so, at last, when the public patience was fairly worn out, in December, 1851, the road was opened to the Lakes. It had cost what then appeared a fabulous sum—$23,750,000.

But whatever it had cost the glorious work was achieved. New York was brought within eighteen hours of Lake Erie, and by one of the most magnificent works in the world.—A broad gauge, well-built railroad. There was now, we were told, nothing for the stockholders to do but to look themselves into wealth: hereafter no one was to spend the luxurious leisure which their ancestors in the Erie Railroad could not fail to secure them.

The event has hardly justified these expectations. Six thousands, including one in stock, have been paid to the Erie stockholders: neither all or any of them were earned is another question. What it is, that while the Company was dividing profits with one hand, it was borrowing money at usurious rates with the other. Twelve and a half millions, one thousand $2,000,000; to pay its six dividends it increased its debt from $13,750,000 to $28,000,000, and its stock from seventeen to $11,000,000. The accounts which it had before its stockholders from time to time defied the penetration of the most experienced accountants: their ingenuousness became less surprising when it was discovered by Brown Brothers in 1855, that, somehow or other, a million of dollars had come to—we use the French as the more polite term—by some one in authority.

In that year—1855—many sagacious railroad men declared that the Company would go into the hands of a Receiver. It would have been better that it had. That it did not is mainly due to Mr. Charles Moran; who, from a successful Wall Street banker, became the most conspicuously unsuccessful railroad manager of these days, and piloted the Erie into the jaws of destruction. Perhaps it is not fair to blame him. Probably the concern was past salvation when the management fell into his hands. There were sound ideas in his system; errors too, of course, most costly and even fatal; but some of his notions will by-and-by prevail. At any rate, when one thinks of the settlement he must make with the friends whom he persuaded to buy the later securities of the Erie, one has not the heart to censure him.

Thus our history reaches the present day. It may be briefly summed up: blunders and ignorance at the start; extravagance, mismanagement, and roguery throughout; hopeless insolvency at last. From first to last been the career of the Erie Railroad. One sickens at the everrecurring record of fraud, folly, and fraud. From estimates so wide of the truth that one can hardly believe they were honest, one passes to expenditures so reckless and unlimited as to be positively criminal; the offer to pay interest on the stock of a road which was not built is paralleled but by the promise to pay the amount of dividends when the road was losing money daily; the Fiermont speculation was of a piece with the mysterious disappearance of a million of dollars in 1854-55; while the notoriously successful efforts of the treasurer of the road to break down the stock, in order to obtain money by his private speculations in the stock, constitute, with the imbecile policy of the last administration, a fit subject for a page of Secret History. It is by such means that the Erie Railroad has been ruined, and families throughout Europe and the United States robbed of their property.

And what now? What is to become of the road—what of the creditors—what of the stockholders? Half a dozen schemes for the reorganization of the property have been the light in the papers for the last week. Whether Mr. Brown has his; each of the financial doctors has a panacea. But it is not worth while describing any of them, for it is highly likely that any will avail one iota to prevent the quiet operation of the law. All these schemes presuppose the raising of a million or more of dollars to satisfy the immediate necessities of the Company, and no such sum can be raised for that purpose. The Receivership, though, may think not, it may be a year or two before the decree of foreclosure is carried into effect, and the road is sold. But that the foreclosure can be prevented, or that it can be a friendly proceeding, we are not ready to believe. There will be much discussion about the matter, meaning, many lawsuits will be commenced, no doubt, but the end of the whole must be a sale of the property, which will utterly annihilate about twenty millions worth of the present Erie Railroad securities.

We hope and believe that there will be no attempt made by any party to contest the legality of any of the liens of the Company. No New York Court would be likely to sustain any such nefarious endeavor; but the mere attempt would damage the credit of the State and disgrace every citizen. At the same time, we candidly confess that we should be glad to hear of a proposal to annul the original charter of the Company for the past twelve or fifteen years before a criminal tribunal. Rightly or wrongly, the public believe that things have been done by persons connected with the Erie which the penal code would punish if they were brought to light. If such a charge could be made, at all events, operate to frighten railroad swindlers throughout the country; it might lead to the detection and punishment of rogues.

THE LOUNGER.

A PUBLIC LOSS.

THE recent death of several prominent publicmen in this country, and the laudations with which they have been almost universally honored, gives, suggests the inquiry, "Where be all the bad people buried?"

If a man be denounced, while living, as one who by his teachings—all the more dangerous because delightful—leads to the ruin of the public morals, why should the selves that are fired over his grave not have the same glorious form of condemnation? He is not a better man because he is dead. If he were really worthy the denunciation of yesterday, he certainly does not deserve the praise of to-day. It surely is not enough that a man has great powers. The human mind must necessarily be used to use them well or ill for mankind? Ripe scholarship, wide experience, rare opportunities, rich humor, brilliant eloquence—all these a man may have; and yet all these may not justify the tone of eulogy pure or of fictitious virtue which deems his death as a national calamity. Genius is either positive or negative. If positive, it actively helps or harms mankind. If negative, it is merely a private possession as a vast fortune spent upon the poor. The common-place, unimaginative does not tend to purify the national character—or is merely moribund, in relation to the world—may be great genius still, but its age is not a national calamity. Its longer continuance might have fostered still further national corruption.

But when that genius, taking a lofty aim, pursues it with all its power, illustrates it by life, and works, and works—sacrifices to it wealth, opportunity, ease—and cheerfully perils its fame and all that a man can love, except characteristic virtue, that genius ceases among men the nation has lost one of the influences that helped to secure its perpetuity and development. For it has lost a man whose life presented to the world the highest and purest principle. A thousand ripe scholars, with brilliant oratory and humorists might die, and only the loving circle of their private friends be poorer. But when a public man dies, whose life was a long self-sacrifice, an unwearied, hopeful and effective effort—whom old men regret as if a friend were suddenly silent—whom the whole body of serious, resolute, faithful citizens have always trusted, and whose death, therefore, every man suffers, for every man has lost a friend.

How many such men the country must have left this when they learned that Horace Mann was dead!

TOSSING TUBS TO WHALES.

THERE IS a perennial pudding-headedness in what are called "political campaigns," during which nothing disturbs. The quality in the Executive mansion is the same whether it be Mary John Bull—and by the stocky, agricultural, massy, top-booted and spat-butted individual in the pictures of Punch—or the spindle-legged, pretending the belief that France is always hungry for England, and at war with her, can hardly restrain herself from crossing the Channel and marching in a sack of London.

Lord Lyndhurst, aged eighty-eight, and a singularly vigorous old gentleman, has recently stated that he has never known a time when war was not imminent between every which, by implication, he glad has not heaped upon Louis Napoleon, which was not the case when Louis Philippe or Louis Napoleon had not come over and kissed the Queen at Windsor, and when Louis Napoleon was not dined with Louis Napoleon at Cherbourg. It might not be at all surprising if France were to the present time to declare war with England.

Fortunately in the latter country, while the public mind is always ready for excitement, and what is better, uncommon sense. Therefore, Mr. Colden rose the other day in Parliament and said, in the Queen's name, that the British Ministers were telling us that they had confidence in the Emperor, they presented to the country a list of five millions (pounds sterling) for the increase of our armaments to protect us against him." Of course, he meant to say against his policy of Foreign Secretary, and he proves it. Then he sits down to tell the Emperor of the pleasant wishes of the people, and insists that England was not be guilty of the absurdity of supposing that France [illegible] Napoleon was not a man, filling certain ration.

Mr. Colden's speech is luminous with good sense. He is no friend or admirer of Louis Napoleon. He says that if he had had to speak of him, he "should not have failed to have done justice to the great compliment as had been used." But he evidently feels that the Emperor of France is not fool, and that he has some other central political idea than "revenging Waterloo." He shows that the English and French people are not governed by the strong, national consent of mutual interest; and he shows that not only is the English navy very much larger and more powerful than the French, but that it has increased much more rapidly, and that England could only to keep pace with English fortifying.

It is remarkable that on the day preceding Mr. Colden's speech the Paris Constitutionnel had said: "Now that the mass of English journals, losing all moderation and dignity, have ceased to deserve toward the Emperor the respect which the French press has never failed to show toward the Queen, what is to be done? We will, in good sense, to the public intelligence against such excesses and [illegible] is done.

How utterly ridiculous the periodical English panic is in contrast with such command of temper as that! [illegible] Napoleon, and France, if there is going to fall to, upon the first opportunity, the whole central power of the French nation, and upon her surface as will serve at least to scratch the French throat well as she goes down. If she does not believe it, she is a fool. Louis Napoleon is not of eighty-eight to set the country by the ears! We do not believe that he has himself had the slightest apprehension; and when he asks for five millions of pounds, the call is made not for the purpose of defense but of aggression. Louis Napoleon, but of throwing tubs to English whales.

JULIUS SLINKTON AND JANUS WEATHERCOCK

THE little sketch which Mr. Dickens has lately written for the Ledger is obviously suggested by the story of Thomas Griffiths Wainewright, who the reader of Talfourd's life of Lamb and of the old London Magazines will remember. He was received into the literary circle when Bulwer's novel of "Lucretia" was published, the heroine of which is Marian Wainewright, the sister-in-law of the same crime in England have still perpetuated his black name.

Dickens' Mr. Julius Slinkton is Bulwer's Herod Gabriel Varney—the "Janus Weathercock" of the Lord Chamberlain's Office of the bright days of Elia. Talfourd says of him:

"He was then a young man, on the bright side of thirty, with a sort of careless, military air, and the conversation of a smart, lively, clever, hardhitting young officer. He spoke of a regiment that he had been an officer in the Dragoons; had spent more than one fortune; and he was understood to take a part in the periodical literature, with the careless grace of an amateur who now felt himself above it. He was an artist also; sketched boldly and graphically; exhibited a port-folio of his own drawings of female beauty, in which the voluptuous trembled on the borders of the indelicate, and seized on the critical department of the Fine Arts, both in and out of the Magazine, undisturbed by the presence or pretension of the finest critic of all who ever wrote—William Hazlitt. On this subject he composed for the Magazine, under the signature of 'Janus Weathercock,' articles of daring assumption, in which disdainful notices of living genius were set off by fascinating references to the personal appearance, accomplishments, and household arrangements of the writer, even the first here and there upon the reader's table. It was the creation of his essay. He created a new sensation in the letter-circle and only by his braided sentence, powdered diapers, and various mock-heart-kerchiefs, but by ostentatious exposure of every thing in the world but elegant employment."

Bulwer's preface to "Lucretia" is dated November 1, 1846, and he says it is that the crime recited in it "took place within the last seventeen years." He does not pretend to vouch for the exact details, but only the general character of the crimes; having in view, he says, "two criminals existing in our own age, who, separated from each other by extent and darkness of the guilt committed, have risen from their dungeons to the platforms and lively temper of the age," etc.

The production of "Lucretia" was followed by such a clutter cry of disgust and indignation, that, in the collected edition of his works, Bulwer speaks of it as a work in the "first flush of the reaction" from which he softens the catastrophe of the novel. In "A word to the Public" he says, "Spots of blackness." The person whose guilt he certainly not exaggerated in Varney was an artist, a musician, a critic, and a connoisseur in the arts and versatility. In his correspondence he appears to have skimmed the surface of a book, and various reading, with the similarity of Knox and hints at a translation of Schelling."

Wainwright died in Italy, whither he went to escape the punishment of a criminal career so dark and diabolically secret as hardly to be surpassed in criminal annals. The story is told and thus the more recent cases in England, illustrates the fact that a terrible homicide rules our civilization, and that new forms of social advantages only develop new forms of crime.

THE POET SHELLEY.

TICKNOR has just republished the memorials of Shelley, by his son's wife, Lady Shelley. They have been prepared to correct what she considers the misstatements of the Life of the poet, of which the volumes were published by Lord Houghton, Mr. Thomas Jefferson Hogg.

There is something extremely droll in this association of names: a Life of Percy Bysshe Shelley by Thomas Jefferson Hogg. The work was to be completed in four large volumes, but Lady Shelley intimates that the Shelley family have been so displeased with Mr. Hogg's performance that only the first moiety of the material has been withdrawn. This is a great pity, for there are few more vivid, faithful, picturesque, and delightful personalities in literature than Hogg's Shelley. We do not remember to have seen a single review of the book in this country, and the London journals evidently did not know what to make of it.

Mr. Hogg was one of Shelley's earliest friends. He was at Oxford with him, and when Shelley was expelled for his famous little tract, Hogg was also expelled for defending him; after that time they lived together frequently, and were always in correspondence, and since Shelley's death Hogg has published various papers about him to the magazines. Who Mr. Hogg is, and why he bears the name of Thomas Jefferson, he does not tell us. He volumes already published, tell us. We gather that he is the son of an English country gentleman, and that his name we assume that the English country gentleman was a man of liberal principles. Supposing him to have been a friend of the young poet Shelley, he would now be about sixty-eight.

Mr. Hogg tells a great deal of himself, and, consciously or not, for it is hard to say, he has a vein of quite original humor. We have hardly laughed over any book since Peter Pindar's Public. Shelley, in his boyhood, was such a grotesque, unrestrained figure, full of such simple and eccentricities—such an immortally innocent and indignant boy in the midst of a world of hard and selfish men. And yet the picture of Shelley at Oxford is perfect. The tragedy and comedy have the same source. His genius was of that kind which is as near as dame in the wind. And with a masterly delicacy of descriptive skill its waywardness is represented for us in Hogg's Life.

Of course, it is so honest, so faithful in the least detail, whether flattering to family pride or not, that it is not surprising Lady Shelley and the living relatives of the poet felt as if the revelation were too absolute. The writing out of such a character laid more entirely bare; and whoever has seen a faithful sketch of Shelley's world and the vague sketches of his life which have been published, will find his impressions of the poet's personality fully confirmed by this extraordinary book. Lady Shelley's attempt to supply a biography is of no value. She manifestly possesses only certain facts of his life; but there is no portrait of the man or the poet in her work; nothing which illustrates the harmony between his character and his existence. This is done with singular felicity in Hogg's Life of him, and therefore we hope may not be cut short by the official memorials.

It is a curious fact in literary history, that the poet who has been most passionately and absolutely stood than any English author of fame should be the subject of one of the best biographies in the language. We ought to repeat that Hogg's book is full of quaint and queer anecdotes of himself, and his own adventures and thoughts. But they all illustrate the time and country; and they are all so racy that no worthy reader will quarrel with him. The interest in the poet is hardly sufficient to warrant the republication in this country of so large a work; but it is, probably, to be found at the larger libraries—or ought to be.

THE NEW GOLD AND THE OLD CIVILIZATION.

MR. BUCKLE, in his "History of Civilization," laments with great force the theory which has been not infrequently suggested as a question of political economy, that the discovery of gold in California would substantially the same as that of Asia. He fortifies his position very strongly; and the recent discoveries of gold in Australia and the mines in New Grenada will be good news to the historian. They have an East Indian and even an Egyptian aspect. There is among them the skeleton of the Sarabares, and there are curious resemblances which observers will detect as indicating the same condition of civilization as the mountains of the Nile and where the gold in many cases is as pure as can be worked, and the casting is as skillful (so we are assured by adepts) as Is practiced in the mints of the world. Perhaps the origin, of course, are crude.

Then the question of correct historic generalization are being exhumed all the time, and the theories of historians are perpetually on trial. Buckle's proposition is to give a purely scientific basis to the laws of civilization, which he affirms are as intelligible and as certain as any other laws. His natural exclamation when he hears of the Chiriqui gold will be, "Of course." The discovery of gold in Asia is not a great generalization. Most of the so-called religious assaults upon Buckle's theory are mere impertinent misconceptions. For since the idea of law, in its very essence and of whatever kind, proceeds from the idea of order, the assertion, confirmation and confirming law in nature, which is altogether merely the method of the Creator, can not be a heresy, though accused of atheism or irreligion.

There are many now living who will doubtless see many results in the course of natural discoveries, of the justice or the injustice of his views, and when any man can help us to clearer light of the world, the meanest thing we can do is to fling dirt at him.

FROM A TRAVELING CORRESPONDENT.

DEAR MR. LOUNGER,—Instead to let you know that your old friends the Hogs, are going to their summer travels. Last week I was going by the early train to Jersey City, observed a gentleman and Lady sitting alone, and sound asleep. We stopped at Garrison's, and four hogs entered the car, from West Point. There were the usual grunts, the escapist, and the oldest hoop planted itself near the gentleman and lady, and said, in decided tone: "Some of these people have got to move, to let us sit down."

My drowsy neighbor was roused, and rubbing his eyes, looked up and saw four hogs standing in a line, and seeming to be in a hurry to be accommodated. He jumped up and said, "I beg your pardon; here is a seat," and moved out with his wife and child. Then the hogs sat down, and the hoop and one companion, while the gentleman and lady took their seats.

I knew what he was waiting for, but the hoop did not. I am sure he was waiting to hear "Thank you, sir," but he did not. And he refused to be offered the seat which he had found just behind him, and continued to stand in front of the hoop. keepsie, she said, "No, I thank you; I shall find a seat somewhere—

In a few minutes, upon the Central Road, a young gentleman had put his bag and paper and book on a seat in front of him, and walked to another passenger came, looking for a seat. "Is this seat engaged?" asked he, courteously. "No," said the young gentleman. "I will be here, then," returned the other. Whereupon the young gentleman began very quickly to put his paper and book in his luggage, as if he were conferring the greatest possible favor upon the intruder.

The gentleman told me afterward that he had no trouble about seats—" if the people are gentlemen."

I hope you will continue to expose this selfishness and tell us stories of the Hogs.

Very truly,
OLIVER OCULUS.

A RISING STAR.

A YOUNG American, a Philadelphian, we believe, of German parentage, Herman Vezin, has made some sensation in London as an actor of the poetic drama in the highest degree; but—we say it with the profoundest deference to the crafts—a mere dramatic newspaper experience listens to the warm praise of singers and actors very much as he hears a London fog or a Jersey mist. It may be very true. The horse shall have the benefit of the doubt. So the critic may be very innocent when he says that Vezin is not the character laid more entirely bare; and whoever has seen a faithful student

REV. DR. BELLOWS.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]

REV. DR. BELLOWS.

HENRY WHITNEY BELLOWS was born in Boston, June 11, 1814. His father was John Bellows, a merchant of that city, and grandson of Colonel Benjamin Bellows, who was a man of considerable note in the last century, the founder of the town of Walpole, New Hampshire, where his name is a household word—not only from his numerous descendants, but from the picturesque Falls that bear his name.

Considering the somewhat emphatic individuality of our high-spirited neighbor, the Doctor, he came into the world under circumstances peculiarly social. His twin-brother was Edward S. Bellows, who studied law at Cambridge, and starting in his profession with rare promise, died in Michigan at the early age of twenty-three. We remember this young man, as he was when at the law-school, a model of manly strength, full of enthusiasm, and with not a few of the characteristic traits that mark his surviving brother, especially a large share of impulse and self-reliance. Henry studied for college at the famous Round Hill School, under the instruction of Dr. Cogswell and George Bancroft. He entered Harvard University in 1828, and graduated in 1832, in the same class with Charles T. Brooks, Charles Mason, Samuel Osgood, John Parkman, George F. Simmons, Charles K. True, George T. Curtis, and others. In the early part of his college life—having entered at fourteen—he was a playful boy, without any marked aspiration; but as he shot up toward manly stature he seemed to become a different person, so that his class-mates could hardly look upon the earnest young man of eighteen as the same being with the sportive stripling whose blue cap and round jacket were less juvenile than his speech and manners. The class was somewhat distinguished for its religious and theological interest; and one fourth of the members chose divinity as their profession. Bellows in his Senior year shared strongly in this interest, and when but eighteen years of age he joined a private religious society of students; and we well remember with what fervor he offered a prayer and read a devout essay when it was his turn to conduct the service.

He did not, however, begin the study of his profession immediately with the large number of his class-mates, who at once entered the Divinity School at Cambridge, but spent two years in teaching—one year in Cooperstown, New York; the other in Louisiana. In 1834 he began his professional studies at that school, and completed his theological course there in 1837. He preached with considerable éclat in several pulpits in New England, and spent the following winter at Mobile, Alabama, in charge of the new Unitarian Church in that city. Returning to the North, he was soon invited to the post which he still holds; and January 2, 1839, he was ordained pastor of the "First Congregational Church," as it is legally styled, being successor to the gifted William Ware. He was married August 18, 1839, to Eliza, daughter of Elihu Townsend, a merchant of New York, and has had five children, two of whom, a son and daughter, survive.

By his influence in the main, The Christian Inquirer, the weekly newspaper of the New York Unitarians, was established in 1846, and he was editor and principal writer until the middle of 1850, when impaired health obliged him to lighten his labors. Since then he has been at times compelled to spare himself some of the cares of his profession, yet has abated nothing of his early zeal; but has, on the other hand, done his most conspicuous work. He took the lead in securing to the Meadville Theological School its endowment and direction; and but for his influence Antioch College must, to all appearance, have been crushed by its debts. He has, from time to time, given characteristic public addresses outside the routine of the pulpit, the most memorable of which were the oration before the Phi Beta Kappa Society at Cambridge, in 1850, on the "Intellect and the Legicon;" and his noted Address on the Drama, at the Academy of Music, New York, in 1857. He gave in Boston, in 1857, before the Lowell Institute, an elaborated and attractive course of lectures on Exspection on Crime, a part of which were afterward repeated in this city. In 1854 he received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from Harvard University.

Considering his public note and various literary labors, Dr. Bellows has not given the public any one work which fully embodies his gifts and fitly records his name among American authors. He has spoken and written for the demands of the time and the occasion, and has been too much under the spur of fresh themes and interests, or too impatient of task-work, to revise and publish, as frequently requested, selections from the voluminous and elaborate papers which have come from his pen. He has, indeed, published twenty or thirty sermons and addresses, but these have been too fugitive and miscellaneous to give him his due place among our thinkers and writers. He has written copiously for four years as editor; and during that time, and since, he has expressed his views in the columns of the Inquirer upon the chief topics of civil, moral, and religious interest. Yet his sermons are probably the best products of his mind; and for twenty years he has been an earnest and laborious sermonizer, varying, indeed, very much in opinions at various times, yet always true to the same leading dispositions, and as conspicuous for devout fervor as for bold statement. Among Unitarians he has been usually ranked among the Liberals, or Progressives; yet he has never identified himself with the Rationalists, who deny a supernatural revelation, with its miraculous sanctions; and in some of his preached and printed arguments he has carried his evangelical views near the borders of orthodoxy. His position, however is, in the main, with the Channing School of Unitarian Christians, alike in the assertion of the Divine mission of Christ, the dignity of humanity, and the application of religion to daily life.

After all that we may say, however, of the opinions and productions of Dr. Bellows, we have a very inadequate idea of him apart from his personal character and presence. He is not an eccentric, but a very peculiar personality; and we describe him about as adequately by a criticism of his writings as we describe the grapes of Burgundy or the Rhine by a chemist's statement of their constituent elements, or a botanist's description of their size and looks. Bellows is a character; and, as such, he makes his mark far more than as a scholar or even as a thinker. There is a geniality in him that opens at once the hearts of friends and hearers, and seats you as a guest at his bountiful table, where you tell your secrets and share his confidence. No man carries more of this graciality into the pulpit; and his past success seems to us to have been mainly owing to his breaking down the old barrier between the pulpit and pew, and virtually taking the pews with him into the pulpit. Yet he does not let the pulpit down, but is rather conspicuous for his assertion of its dignity, and sometimes carries very far his clerical prerogative, so as to try not a little the humility of his hearers; not hesitating to offend their political and social convictions, or to pull lightly at their pet-strings in favorite charities and projects, in spite of their stout and often vain determination to keep them rigidly tied up. In fact, he has a deal of a certain lofty pride in his composition; and were he not kindly and sympathetic—to his friends, indeed, the best fellow in the world—his love of having his own way would make him at times something of a despot. He however strains his prerogative, generally, not for personal but for public aims, and there is a dash of generosity about his occasional touches of imperialism that wins plaudits from the many and a good-natured nods from the few. In justice to him, however, it must be said that he oftener declines than assumes the purple, and in the essentials of humility he surpasses many more despending men. Not by any conceit or self-taking, but by a certain motion of the blood, a necessity of temperament, that wins quite as much acquiescence from friends as from himself, he tends to takes the lead; and a bright talker has hit off the spontaneous leadership which in this country upon him somewhat happily in styling him "Boss Bellows." Certainly, if he had been bred to mechanic arts, he would have been chosen Boss by acclamation of his workmen. He certainly has rare gifts as leader; and decided as his influence has been in his own parish and denomination, his intimate friends are aware that he has but half used his powers; and that, by following his unbidden moods of his own mind, and from want of a sufficiently concentrative and consistent method of thought and action, he has often electrified hearers or readers for the hour instead of organizing a fellowship or inaugurating a policy. In some respects he is more the Murat than the Napoleon; the leader of a dashing charge rather than the general of a far-seeing campaign. Yet in passages of his life he has given proofs of great generalship both in his plans and achievements. In the organization, especially in electric power, he is probably the most marked man in his denomination; and with more caution and persistency, he might do a great deal to unite and organize his unbounded associates into a strong and effective fellowship. If, however, he has something of Wesley's command, he has less of his patient labor and careful detail; and many who old Methodism would have been nowhere without an organizing method, and Whitefield's fire would have burned out had not Wesley's foresight devised a furnace for keeping it always alive in the churches. Of late Dr. Bellows seems to have been obviously conscious of the impulsive and fragmentary nature of his earlier labors, and his attention has been given, in accordance with his literature and catholic spirit, to subjects of church order and devout discipline. While his charity more reverential for overstocked toil, and vindicates the drama from its revilers, he asserts most earnestly the worth and authority of the Bible, and summons to win his brethren to a better understanding and practice of Liberal Churchmanship. He evidently wishes to have fair play for the whole of humanity, sibs its festive and its devout side. At to the report of Dr. Bellows' approval of the Rome, it is absurdly itself. He is in the very grain one of the Liberals and the Liberators of history; and if his Holiness the Pope should receive him at the Vatican as an alleged convert, after a short interview he would pronounce him a sturdy Protestant even in his Catholicity, and would entreat him to depart without wasting his time, thought, and romantic visions in the ears of his excitable young clergy. In fact, he would not give Bellows lodging for a night!

To not a few Dr. Bellows is a puzzle—a strange mixture of dogmatism and argument and impulsive enthusiasm; a devotee in prayer, and a jovial companion in society; a radical and a conservative, a dissenter and an ecclesiast, a transcendentalist and a churchman, a man of the world and an evangelist. They who know him well see in him, through out, the same genial, earnest heart, and keen, electric intellect; in fact, the same consistent character; if not always the same consistent thinker and leader. He has revolved pretty loyally about one centre; and a fair retrospective of his career, for more than his own enthusiastic interpretations of the separate stages of his experience, must substantiate the integrity of the man and his labors. His disposition to treat the present impression as final, and to urge the mood of the hour as the controlling motive, comes more from his blood than his brain. His brain of itself is quite cool, with his blood is soon heated; and he might be a good metaphysician if it were not for his impulsive temperament. Sometimes he is an orator. This by ancestry being of William the Conqueror's race, and there is a good deal of the Celtic enthusiasm—certain French blood on his vessel. This gives him at times a rare eloquence; and brings also, sometimes, its hectic to his style and thought. His eloquence—for fury, fire, and effectiveness—is quite unique; and the hearer of his best efforts is at loss to understand why he is not at the head of sensation preachers, as he surely would be if he suppressed more to the common heart, avoided redundancy of material and language, dealt less in intellectual niceties, and more in homely morality and everyday religion, and based his whole appeal more upon the wants of our common lot than upon the ideas and habits of a cultivated and prosperous caste. His humanity is broad and earnest, and no preacher feels more for men than he; yet it is not easy for one who has known so little of the necessity of struggle for bread and home to write and speak always with due feeling with men, or to realize that it is very hard to get a living; and that all of us tend to be taught, and comforted, and strengthened in our everyday work, instead of being led to the heights of daring meditation, or fed upon the rarities of speculative invention. He is, we are aware, thoroughly a gentleman, and therefore can not deal in the vulgarisms that enter so largely into the usual sensation oratory; yet a little more fellowfeeling with our people and every day life might give his eloquence more popular zest, without any taint of vulgarity. He feels for the unfortunate and the poor, has most philanthropists, and he has written ably upon the condition of the people, but he does not always put them, or do some of the popular writers and speakers, who, having been obliged to rough it in their own early days, stand upon a level with the many, and so come home more to the common heart.

We say, in conclusion, that Dr. Bellows seems to us to belong to the order of Dunyan's Mr. Greatheart, and is one of our public men whose genial and humane spirit brings to all within the circle of his fellowship. He is like a gushing fountain, whose waters all may drink, and feel refreshed by the draught. Long may the waters flow, and distant be the day when the fountain shall be sealed up!

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER XLVIII.

THE DAY AFTER THE WEDDING.

"On the 23d instant, Alcide Dunlap, Esq., of Boston, to Fanny, oldest daughter of Boniface Newt, Esq., of this city."

Fanny wrote the notice with her own hands, and made Alfred take it to the papers. In this manner she was before the mode-time knew in spreading the news. In this manner, also, of Boniface Newt, Esq., sat at breakfast the next morning, he learned of his daughter's marriage. His face grew almost purple. He looked apoplectic as he said to his wife,

"Nancy, what in hell's name, does this mean?"

His frightened wife asked what, and he read the announcement aloud.

"Didn't you know that Fanny was out last night?" asked Jim, sharply, as if he suspected for a moment that his wife knew of the marriage.

"She sent me word that she was going to pass the night with Laura Magot," replied Mrs. Newt, feebly, as she saw her husband's face.

He had risen from table, and walked up and down the room.

"Did you know any thing of this?" inquired he. "What does it mean?"

"Dear me! I, thought he was engaged to Hope Wayne," replied Mrs. Newt, crying.

There was a moment's silence again. Mr. Newt said, with a sneer,

"It seems to me that a mother whose daughter gets married without her knowledge is a very curious sort of mother—an extremely competent kind of mother."

He resumed his walking. Mrs. Newt went on with her weeping. Jim Bunce stood was aware of the possibilities in the case of Alfred, and therefore tried to recover himself and consider the chances.

"What do you know about this fellow?" said he, peremptorily, to his wife.

"I don't know any thing in particular," she sobbed.

"Do you know whether he has money, or whether his father has?"

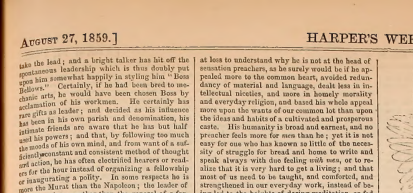
"No; but old Mr. Burt is his grandfather."

"What! his mother's father?"

"I believe so. I know Fanny always said he was Hope Wayne's cousin."

Mr. Newt pondered for a little while. His brow contracted.

"Why on earth have they run away? Did Mr. Burt's grandson suppose he would be unwelcome to me?



BONIFACE NEWT'S FIRST KNOWLEDGE OF HIS DAUGHTER'S MARRIAGE.

Has he been in the habit of coming here, Nancy?"

"No, not much."

"Have you seen them since this thing?"

"No, indeed," replied the mother, bursting into tears afresh.

Her husband looked at her darkly.

"Don't blubber. What good does crying do? Good patience, if any thing happens in this world, a woman fails to crying her eyes out, as if that would help it."

Boniface Newt was not usually affectionate. But there was almost a ferocity in his address at this moment which startled his wife into silence. His daughter May turned pale as she saw and heard her father.

"I thought Abel was trial enough!" said he, bitterly: "and now the girl must fail to cutting up shines. I tell you plainly, Nancy, if Fanny has married a beggar, a beggar she shall be. If there is reason for a private marriage that we don't understand. It can't be any good reason; and, daughter or no daughter, she shall be in no bed nor bed-room."

He scowled and set his teeth as he said it. His wife did not dare to cry any more. May went to her mother and took her hand, while the father of the family walked rapidly up and down.

"Every thing comes at once," said he. "Just as I am most bothered and driven down town, this infernal business of Fanny's most needs happen. One thing I'm sure of—if it was all right, she would not be a private wedding. What fools women are! And Fanny, whom I always thought so entirely able to take care of herself, turns out to be the greatest fool of all! This fellow's a beggar, I believe, Mrs. Newt. I think I have heard even you make fun of him. Bet he is poor, too! To run away with a pauper-boy! Heaven, it's too absurd!"

Mr. Newt laughed mockingly, while the tears flowed fast from the eyes of his wife, who said at intervals, "I vow," and "I declare," with such utter weakness of tone and movement that her husband suddenly exclaimed, in an exasperated tone,

"Nancy, if you don't stop rocking your body in that inane way, and shaking your hand and your handkerchief, and saying those imbecile things, I shall go mad. I suppose this is the kind of sympathy one gets from a woman in his misfortunes!"

May Newt looked shocked and indignant. "Mother, I am sorry for your Fanny," said she.

She said it quietly and tenderly, and without the slightest reference in look or tone or gesture to her father.

He turned toward her suddenly.

"Hold your tongue, miss!"

"Mamma, I shall go and see Fanny to-day," May continued, as if her father had not spoken. Her mother looked frightened, and looked at her deprecatingly—a look that said "For Heaven's sake, don't!" Her father regarded her for a moment in amazement.

"What do you mean, you little vixen? Let me catch you disobeying me and going to see this ungrateful, wicked girl, if you think fit."

There was a moment in which May Newt turned pale, but she said, in a very low voice,

"I must go."

"May, I forbid your going," said Mr. Newt, severely and loudly.

"Father, you have no right to forbid me."

"I forbid your going," cried her father, pacing himself in front of her, and quite white with wrath.

May said no more.

"A pretty family you have brought up, Mrs. Nancy Newt," said he, at length, looking at his wife with all the contempt which his voice expressed. "A son who runs to me by his extravagance, a daughter who runs away with —with"—he hesitated to remember the exact expression—"with a pauper booby, and another daughter who defies and disobeys her father. I congratulate you upon your charming family, upon your distinguished success, Mrs. Newt. Is there no younger brother of your son-in-law whom you will introduce to Miss May Newt? I beg your pardon, she is Miss Newt, now that her sister is so happily married," said Boniface Newt, bowing ceremoniously to his daughter.

Mrs. Newt was stung to the soul. She clasped her hands in an utterly helpless despair, and unconsciously raised them in a beseeching attitude before her.

"The hand's duty takes him away from home," continued Mr. Newt. "While he is engrossed with heavy cares for the maintenance of his family he supposes that his wife is caring for his children, and that she has, at least, the smallest speck of an idea of what is necessary to be done to make them tolerably well behaved. Some husbands are doomed to be mistaken."

Boniface Newt bowed and smiled sarcastically.

"Yes, and as if it were not enough to have my wife such a model trainer—and my son so careful—and my daughter so obedient—and my younger daughter so affectionate—I must also have trials in my business. I expected a great loan from Van Boozenburg's bank, and I haven't got it. He's an old driveling fool. Mr. Wern, too must curtail expenses. There's one mouth less, and one Stewart's bill less, at any rate."

"Father," said May, as if she could not bear the cool cutting adrift of her sister from the family, "Fanny is not dead."

"No," replied her father, sullenly. "No, the more's the—"

He stopped, for he caught May's eye, and he could not finish the sentence.

"Mr. Newt," said his wife, at length, "perhaps Alfred Dinks is not poor."

That was the chance, but Mr. Newt was skeptical. For he had an instinctive suspicion that no rich young man, however much a booby, would have married Fanny clandestinely. Men are forced to know something of themselves, and Boniface Newt was perfectly aware that it was generally understood he had no aversion to money. He knew also that he was reputed rich, that his family were known to live expensively, whom you might introduce to Miss May Newt? I beg your pardon, she is Miss Newt, now that her sister is so happily married," said Boniface Newt, bowing ceremoniously to his daughter.

Mrs. Newt was stung to the soul. She clasped her hands in an utterly helpless despair, and unconsciously raised them in a beseeching attitude before her.

"The hand's duty takes him away from home," continued Mr. Newt. "Father," said May, as if she could not bear the cool cutting adrift of her sister from the family, "Fanny is not dead."

"No," replied her father, sullenly. "No, the more's the—"

He stopped, for he caught May's eye, and he could not finish the sentence.

"Mr. Newt," said his wife, at length, "perhaps Alfred Dinks is not poor."

That was the chance, but Mr. Newt was skeptical. For he had an instinctive suspicion that no rich young man, however much a booby, would have married Fanny clandestinely. Men are forced to know something of themselves, and Boniface Newt was perfectly aware that it was generally understood he had no aversion to money. He knew also that he was reputed rich, that his family were known to live expensively, and he was quite shrewd enough to believe that any youth in her own set who ran off with his daughter did so because he depended upon her father's money. He was satisfied that the Newt family was not to be a gainer by the new alliance. The more he thought of it the more he was convinced, and the more angry he became. He was still storming when the door was thrown open and Mrs. Dugon rushed in.

"What does it all mean?" asked she.

Mr. Dugon looked in his wife, and contemptuously, and pointed to his wife, who sat with her handkerchief to her eyes.

"Pooh," said Mrs. Dugon, "I knew 'twould come to this. I've seen her hugging him the whole winter, and she has had every body's eye on her eyes."

And she shook her plumage as she settled into a seat.

"Mrs. Boniface Newt is unfortunately blind; that is to say, she sees every body's affairs but her own," said Mr. Newt, tauntingly.

Mrs. Dugon, without heeding him, talked on.

"But why did they run away to be married? What does it mean? Fanny's not romantic, and Dinks is a fool. He's rich, and a proper match enough, for a woman can't expect to have every thing. I can't see why he didn't propose to you, Jerry, and behave like other people. Do you suppose he was actually engaged to his cousin Hugh Wayne, and was only during Fanny his convitted the Boston beauty, and the Boston beau too, for that matter? It looks like it, really. I think that must be it. It's a pity a Newt should marry a fool—"

"It is not the first time," interrupted her nephew, making a low bow to his wife.

Mrs. Dugon looked a little surprised. She had seen little jars and rubs before in the family, but this morning she seemed to have happened in upon an unusual case. She continued:

"But we must make the best of it. Are they in the house?"

"No, Aunt Dugon," said Mr. Newt. "I knew nothing of it until, half an hour ago, I read in the paper with all the rest of the world. It seems it was a family secret." And he bowed again to his wife.

"Don't, don't," sobbed she. "You know I didn't know any thing about it. Oh! I don't see, I never can see how unjust and wicked a lie is to-day. He treats me cruelly." And the poor woman covered her red eyes and wept her handkerchief, and rocked herself feebly. Mr. Newt went out, and slammed the door behind him.

"Now, Nancy, tell me about this thing," said Mrs. Dugon, when the husband was gone.

But Nancy had nothing to tell.

"I don't like his running away with her—that looks bad," continued Mrs. Dugon. She pondered a few moments, and then said:

"I can see one good thing, Nancy, which I wasn't worth while to mention to Boniface, who seems to be nervous this morning—but I am sure Fanny prevented the running off. Afred Dinks is too great a fool. He never would have thought of it—and he would never have dared to do it, if he had."

"Oh dear me!" responded Mrs. Newt.

"Fool! it isn't such a dreadful thing, if he is only rich enough," said Aunt Dugon, in a consoling voice. "Every thing depends on that; and I haven't much doubt of it. Alfred Dinks is a fool, my dear, but Fanny Newt is not; and Fanny Newt is no girl to be nasty a fool, except for reasons. You may trust Fanny, Nancy. You may depend there was some foolish something with Hope Wayne, on the part of Alfred, and Fanny has cut the knot she was not sure of untying. Pooh! pooh! When we are as old as I am you won't be distressed over these things. Fanny Newt is fully worthy. She wants an establishment, and she has got it. There are plenty of people who would be very glad to marry daughters to Alfred Dinks. I can tell you there are some great advantages in having a fool for your husband. Now, since Fanny never would have been happy with a man she couldn't manage. It's quite right, my dear."

At this moment the bell rang, and Mrs. Newt, not wishing to be caught with red eyes, called May, who had looked on at this debate, and left the room.

While Mrs. Dugon had been so volubly talking she had also been busily thinking. She knew that Alfred Dinks was a fool in more than not—at least, not in the way she meant. There had been no love between the young pair, and Mrs. Dugon was disposed to criticise the other's conduct very closely. She saw, therefore, that if Alfred Dinks were not rich—and that was only a question whether he were so really, or only in expectation from Mr. Dinks senior—he he might not be engaged to Hope Wayne. But the story of his wealth and his engagements might very easily have been the result of which the skilful Mrs. Dinks meant to conduct her campaign in New York. In that case, what was more likely than that she should have improved Fanny's evident delusion in regard to her son, and, by suggesting to him an elopement, have secured for him the daughter of a merchant so universally reported wealthy as Boniface Newt?

Mrs. Dugon was clever—so was Mrs. Dinks; and it is the homage that one clever person always pays to another to believe that it is capable of every thing that occurs to himself.

In the matter of the marriage Mrs. Budlong Dinks had been defeated, but she was not dismayed. She had lost Hope Wayne, indeed, and she could no longer hope, by the marriage of Alfred with his cousin, to consolidate the Burt property in her family. She had been very indignant—very deeply disappointed. But the meditation of a night refreshed her. She still loved her son. It is only fashion—sometimes, in the superior sex, whose just indignation never sleeps against daughters who marry the men they love instead of those whom the fathers wish.

Upon a survey of the field, Mrs. Dinks felt that under no circumstances would Hope have married Alfred; and he had now actually married Fanny. So much was done. It was useless to wish impossible wishes. She did not wish her son to starve or come to social shame, although he had married Fanny; and Fanny, after all, was rather a belle, and the daughter of a rich merchant, who would have to support them. She knew, of course, that Fanny had supposed her husband would share in the great Burt property, and that Mrs. Dinks herself believed the same thing, that did not surprise her. In fact, they would all be gainers by it; and nothing now remained but to apply herself to securing that property.

For Mrs. Dinks was of a woman who must have an object. Her first had been to marry herself—and her next closed over the Honorable Budlong, who proved to be a man of promise. That marriage was a mistake. We don't see expensive men so often built—but Mrs. Dinks tried to marry Alfred to Hope Wayne. That had failed. The new object must, therefore, be the unfortunate young man. That object proved Domicile life was not an object with her. The Honorable Budlong was a man of taste. He expectorated and talked politics abroad, and pooh-pooh-ed his wife at home, which he frequented little at present. Mrs. Dinks was a woman of able consciousness that the master of the house had a mistress. Then Mrs. Dinks had no other children, nor any tastes or employments that would detain her from society or make her home interesting to her. Domestic benevolence might have been a career, but she compounded with Heaven for her charities by annual subscriptions to well-accredited societies, the management of which was composed of persons of eligible position in society. Shopping and morning calls, also, failed to exhaust her powers entirely; but the latter employment was a good solid object in life which she could pursue with vigilance and discretion.

The first matter the circumstances was clearly a visit to the Newts, and the ring which had sent Mrs. Newt from the room was Mrs. Dinks's.

Mrs. Dugon was closeted when Mrs. Dinks entered, and Mrs. Dugon was by no means sure, whatever she said to Nancy, that Mrs. Dinks had not come there with it. She answered Mrs. Dugon put up her glasses and gazed at her; and when Mrs. Dinks saluted her, Mrs. Dugon knew that Mrs. Dinks was in the way of bowing through a telescope at the planet Jupiter.

"Good-morning, Mrs. Dugon!"

"Good-morning, Mrs. Dinks," replied that lady, still contemplating her visitor as if it were a surprising and incomprehensible celestial phenomenon.

Profound silence followed. Mrs. Dinks was annoyed by the insult which Mrs. Dugon was busily putting upon her, and could not upon revenge. Meanwhile she turned over some illustrated books upon the table, and the engravings were of all things those that afforded her the profoundest satisfaction.

But she was conscious that she could not deceive Mrs. Dugon by an appearance of interest; so, after a few moments, Mrs. Dinks opened and sold in a large easy-chair opposite that lady, who was still looking at her, shook her dress, glanced at her rings, and, finally, at her embroidered shoes, and finally, slowly drawing out her own glasses, looked through her eyes, and, with perfect indifference, surveyed the enemy.

The ladies gazed at each other for a few moments in silence.

"How's your daughter Mrs. Alfred Dinks?" asked Mrs. Dugon, slowly.

Mrs. Dinks continued to gaze without answering. She was resolved to put down the dragon. But she remembered that the dragon was amazingly conscious that she had made a mistake in speaking, and was angry accordingly. She said nothing more; she only glared.

"Good-morning, my dear Mrs. Dinks," said Mrs. Newt, in a troubled voice, as she entered the room. "Oh my! isn't it—isn't it—singular, is it?"

For Mrs. Newt was bewildered. Between her husband and Mrs. Dugon she had been so deeply confused and disturbed that she did not know what to think. She was sure it was Fanny who had acted strangely, for she was not used to all the world, that he had, or was to have, a pretty fortune. Yet she felt, with her husband, that the private marriage was unfortunate. She seemed at least to prove the indisposition of Mrs. Dinks to receive her son's wife, and was conscious she did not wish to alienate the mother of the rich bridegroom.

"Singular, indeed, Mrs. Newt!" rejoined Mrs. Dinks; "I call it extraordinary!"

Mrs. Dinks resumed her gaze, and looked unutterably at Mrs. Dugon. But Mrs. Dinks, from her side, knew that Mrs. Dugon knew Alfred's income and believing in the Newt resources, did not wish to divert from him any kindness of the Dinks family. Mrs. Dugon said, blandly:

"Yes, indeed, it is an outrage upon all our feelings. We must, of course, be mutually shocked at the indiscretion of these members of both our families."

"Yes, oh, yes!" answered Mrs. Newt. "I do declare! what do people do so for?"

Mrs. Dinks cared to take the next step, and make the obvious and necessary inquiries as to the future, for neither wished to betray the thought that was uppermost. At length Mrs. Dinks ventured to say,

"One thing, at least, is fortunate."

"Indeed!" questioned Mrs. Dugon behind the glasses, as if she scoffed at the bare suggestion of any thing but utter misfortune being associated with such an affair.

"I say one thing is fortunate," continued Mrs. Dinks, in a positive decided tone, and without the slightest attention to Mrs. Dugon's remark.

"Dear me! I declare I don't see just what you mean, Mrs. Dinks," said Mrs. Newt.

"I mean that they are neither of them children," answered Mrs. Dinks.

"They may not be children," commenced Mrs. Dugon, in the most implacable tone, "but they are both fools. I shouldn't wonder, Nancy, if they'd both outlived each other, after all, for whatever two people can do in single-hearted apparent reason, run away to be married, it is because one of them is poor."

This was a shot which the two mothers were both vaguely conscious, and which by no means increased the comfort of the conversation. It led to a long pause in the conversation. Mrs. Dinks wished Aunt Dugon on the top of Mont Blanc, and Mrs. Dugon was meditating on nothing to say. Mrs. Dugon, who had rallied, returned to the charge.

"Of course," said she, "that is something that would hardly be said of the daughter of Boniface Newt."

And Mrs. Dugon resumed the study of Mrs. Dinks's face.

"Or of the grand-nephew of Christopher Burt," said the latter, putting up her own glasses and returning the fire.

"Grand-nephew! Is Alfred Dinks not the grandson of Mr. Burt?" asked Mrs. Newt, carelessly.

"No, he is his grand-nephew. He is second cousin to Hugh Wayne, who is the nephew via brother of Mr. Burt," replied Mrs. Dinks.

"Oh!" said Mrs. Newt, relapsing.

"Not a very near relation," added Mrs. Dugon.

"Grand-nephews don't count."

That ended the matter of Mrs. Dinks consolation for Mrs. Newt, who began to take fire.

"But, Mrs. Dinks, how did this affair come about?" asked she.

"Exactly," chimed in Aunt Dugon; "how did it come about, Mrs. Dinks?"

"My dear Mrs. Newt," replied Mrs. Dinks, entirely overlooking the extraordinary fact that Mrs. Dugon, "you know my son Alfred, and your daughter Fanny. So do I. Do you believe that Alfred would run away with Fanny or Fanny with Alfred? Theoretically, of course, the man does it, but you believe Alfred did it?"

Mrs. Dinks's tone was resolute. Mrs. Newt was on the verge of hysterics.

"Do you mean to accuse my daughter to her mother's face?" exclaimed she. "Do you mean to insinuate that—"

"I mean to insinuate nothing, my dear Mrs. Newt. I say plainly what I meant to say, so let us keep at what we have to say to each other in parties. They are married—that's settled. How are they going to live?"

Mrs. Dugon pressed her mouth with amazement.

"I believe the husband usually supports the wife," ejaculated the dragon behind the glasses.

"I understand you to say, then, my dear Mrs. Newt," continued Mrs. Dinks, who was quite disregard of the older lady, who had made the remark, "that your husband contemplates taking my family. Now in this matter, you know, we are going to be perfectly cool and sensible. You must see that I, that Alfred Dinks is a fortune, but that he will by-and-by inherit a fortune from his grand-uncle."

At this point Mrs. Dugon coughed in an incredulous and contemptuous manner. Mrs. Dinks, who understood her, went on, while she patted gently, and waited for Mrs. Dugon to stop.

"As I was saying—a fortune from his grand-uncle. Now until then provision must be made—"

"Really," said Mrs. Dugon, for Mrs. Newt was bewildered into silence by the rapid conversation of Mrs. Dinks—"really, these are matters of business which, I believe, are usually left to gentlemen."

"I know, of course, Mrs. Newt," continued the unmoved Mrs. Dinks, without heeding Mrs. Dugon, for she had fully considered her part, and knew her own intentions, "that such matters are usually settled by the gentlemen. But I think sensible women, like you and me, can discuss, in a quiet manner, and understand in the matter as fathers can be. Our honor is as much involved in the happiness of our children as that of their fathers. So I have come to you in a purely friendly and private manner, that no chance for error may arise in the matter."

"I am sure I know nothing," answered Mrs. Newt; "I only know that Mr. Newt is furious."

"Of course," said Mrs. Dinks, "I anticipate a full view of Mrs. Dinks."

"Fy, fy!" returned Mrs. Dinks, with an air of compassionate unconcern; "because these things can always be so easily settled. I know Mr. Newt won't object, and Jerry is absurd. Every thing will come right."

"What does Mr. Dinks say?" feebly inquired Mrs. Newt.

"I really don't know," replied Mrs. Dinks, with a wave of the hand which said that she didn't care what he thought—which made Mrs. Dugon almost envious of her enemy, and which so impressed Mrs. Newt, who considered the opinion of her husband as the only point of importance in the whole affair, that she turned pale.

"I mean that his mind is so engrossed with other matters that he can't attend to his domestic details," added Mrs. Dinks, who had no desire of frightening any of her new relatives. "Leave you both to me, I suppose."

"No," returned Mrs. Newt, half-sobbing again, "I have only just heard of it; and—and we don't think Mr. Newt would wish me to go."

Mrs. Dinks raised her eyebrows, and again touched her face gently with the handkerchief. Mrs. Dugon rubbed her glasses and waited, for she knew very well that Mrs. Dinks had not yet discovered what she had come to learn. The old General was not deceived by the light-fingered mishing.

"I am sorry not to have seen Mr. Newt before he was down town," began Mrs. Dinks, after a pause, "for I should have said that these matters sooner or later—that is to say, those of us whose business it is"—here she glanced at present at Mrs. Dugon—"Jerry and I, my dear Mrs. Newt, may talk confidently. How much will your son-in-law allow Fanny until Alfred comes into his property?"

Mrs. Dinks leaned back and folded her sharp closely around her, and Mrs. Dugon beamed and smiled a smile of perfect incredulity.

"Genuine, Mrs. Dinks? Why, Mrs. Newt won't give her a cent!" answered Mrs. Newt. As she uttered the words Mrs. Dugon held the enemy in full survey.

Mrs. Dinks was confounded. That they should have any trouble in arranging the matter she had expected. But the extreme declivities of Mrs. Newt had already perplexed her, and the young, simple way in which she answered this question precluded the suspicion of artifice. Consequently she clearly realized the case. She knew that Alfred had six hundred a year from his father. She had no profound respect for a young woman who was a wilful. Suppose he should take a whim to stop it? On the other side, she knew that Mr. Newt was an obstinate man, and that fathers were sometimes implacable. Sometimes, even, they did not relent in making their wills. She knew that she and Miss Van Boozenberg's marriage with Tom Witcher, Esq., had been a case in point. Was it possible her darling Alfred might be in actual danger of such penury—at least until he came into his property—as to be living upon it? and what were the chances that old Burt would leave him a will?

These considerations instantly occupied her mind as Mrs. Newt spoke; and she saw more clearly, at a glance, the state of the unpitying old Burt.

Mrs. Dugon she saked, with an indifferent countenance, and with even a show of smiling:

"But, Mrs. Newt, why do you take so chen-less a view of the matter? Is your husband in the matter?"

Mrs. Newt said that her husband had spoken in a wrath had rung in Mrs. Newt's mind ever since, and they now fell, echo-like, from her tongue.

"He said that he would never speak to daughter, she shall lie in the bed she has made."

Mrs. Dinks could not help showing a little chair. She saw the sign for Alfred to turn into fresh sorrow. Mrs. Dugon was as rigid as a human statue.

"Very well, then, Mrs. Newt," said her victor, rising, "Mr. Newt will have the satisfaction of hearing from Alfred Dinks."

"Oh, her husband will take care of this!" said she interest to Mrs. Dugon, blandly.

"My son Alfred," continued Mrs. Dinks, "has an allowance of six hundred dollars a year, and expects a handsome provision from his grand-uncle. These are his resources. If he has married Fanny Newt, he has taken his own. Perhaps he will. You can mention these facts to Mr. Newt."

"Oh, mercy! mercy!" exclaimed Mrs. Newt. "What shall we do? What will people say?"

"Good-morning, ladies!" said Mrs. Dinks, with a comprehensive bow. She was troubled at the ignorance manifested in the matter, and at the rich Mr. Newt would not, of course, allow his daughter to suffer. But Fanny Newt was pre-foundly persuaded than ever that Mrs. Dinks had managed the whole matter.

Mrs. Dinks had not left the door closed upon Mrs. Dinks, "it is a scheming, artful woman. Her son has not a penny, and I am sure he will have any. Boniface will be implacable. I know him. He is capable of seeing his daughter starve. I am sure that Fanny is capable of take. Poor Fanny! she was not so clever as she thought herself. I am sure that Hope Wayne is in old Burt. I think we had better present that view chiefly to Boniface. We must concede the poverty, but we can arrange upon the prospect. No Newt ought to be allowed to suffer if we can help it. I am sure Mrs. Dinks was always poor, but not quite so smart as she thought herself!"

Mrs. Dugon indulged in a low chuckle of triumph, while Mrs. Newt was overwhelmed with a vague apprehension that all her late husband's wrath at his daughter's marriage would be visited upon her.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

ANOTHER METEORIC PHENOMENON.

THE TROY TIMES of the 11th inst. says that about seven o'clock on the morning of the 10th inst., in the midst of a perfectly cloudless, while hardly a breath of air was stirring, there suddenly appeared, in the direction of the constellation of any sort whatever, there was a terrific explosion, accompanied by a concussion which shook the two sharp echoes. It was as if the sound had come from the sky, but there were no clouds, and a single thunderbolt of the prevalence of electricity, and that explosion could not be understood. The force of the concussion was so great that houses were shaken: that persons standing in the street felt the ground tremble beneath them; that men who had just commenced work upon the roofs of houses dropped their tools, and looked for signs of lightning; that horses in the streets reared, plunged, and acked many companions of their owners. The sound was heard in all parts of the city, and we have been assured by two or three subscribers that the towns of Guilderland and New Scotland, who were now encamping-ground, that the same phenomenon was experienced in those localities, soon after seven o'clock Thursday morning. The heavy rumbling sound of detonation of a powerful character, and the vibration of the ground, proceeding from the southwest and dying away in the northeast. When they gave us this account they were not aware that any one in this island had been subjected any where else."

BLONDIN CROSSES NIAGARA WITH A MAN ON HIS BACK.

We read in the Buffalo Courier of August 19: "Precisely the inguiral crowd was present at Niagara. Blondin Falls was present there yesterday, to witness M. Blondin cross the Niagara Gorge on a rope. The weather was not upon him shrinkers. Above half-past three o'clock the rope was stretched from the Canada to the American side of the rope on the American side, and the performer commenced his journey. The usual cheering, which was responded to from the Canada side, and the rope was lowered, in order to occasions, in silk tights, barebacked, and has on his feet enough-dressed Indian shoes. In a few minutes after his arrival he ascended the rope with his balancing pole, and started for the Canada side.

THE JOURNEY.

"M. Blondin proceeded very slowly over half an hour, and the most of the time being spent in his performances on the rope. He walked backwards, and then sat down, placing himself some fifteen or twenty minutes, and again resuming his journey. When he arrived at the second, Mr. Henry Colcord, a man weighing about two hundred and fifty pounds, and known to fame in his skills. He proceeded down the rope very slowly and cautiously as if feeling every step. In this way he passed one hundred feet from the Canada side, when Mr. Colcord dismounted and Blondin proceeded on his journey unburdened. M. Blondin.

"They have remained to rest probably three or four minutes, when Mr. Colcord again mounted, and M. Blondin proceeded with his burden, slowly, and stopping occasionally to balance himself. He passed over the Falls in safety, and in much time Mr. Colcord dismounted, and he commenced his journey alone. He walked out to the centre of the rope, lowered, and then threw somersaults, and in this way he crossed the deep. After proceeding some distance from the ground he turned, and walked back himself in safety, head. Neither wound was immediately sacrificed, but the fatigue of the day was too much for the ordinary affection appear to have been the leading cause of the tragedy. A minister was present to console the dying and two of them were married. The victims of their rage or passions, as soon as all was over, fled to the woods for the inhuman prevaricate, but to be stop of a blacksmith, near by, who required to shoot the murderers in the arm, and finished her with a rifle ball, to remove the last, and with standing by for her husband.

MOTHER DESTROYED FORTHWITH ACCUSING.

The following letter appears in the Daily Post:

"Baden Lodge, Cheltenham, July 30, 1859.

"Permit me, through the medium of your paper, to address a few words to my brother sportsmen in the United States.

"An opportunity which I have often longed for has been afforded me of paying a visit to the Land of Liberty from Liverpool for the express purpose of fraternizing with the sturdiness of its inhabitants, the beauty of its unrivalled territories, and, with the advice of my brethren, of establishing a Shooting Club, which I trust will meet worthy in the vicinity of Liverpool, and which will be the way all intimacies—scientific, agricultural, and ornithological—it is possible to conceive. I am aware that my in the United States must of necessity be limited; but, under the blessing of God, I hope to be able to spend my Christmas in England, to have achieved and learned enough to retain me in the land of my nativity, and to point out to them the route and the outlay required for shares in the Liverpool Shooting Club.

"My narrative, I need hardly add, will appear in the columns of the London Field.

"I shall bring with me some of my hounds and dogs, which have been pronounced by the Field to be the best breed on this side of the Atlantic, which I shall be glad to the Americans, should they wish for choice. I am convinced that never in a stronger country will the Fox-hound exist as at New York on or about the 1st of September.

AUGUST IN THE COUNTRY—THE SEA-SHORE.

AUGUST IN TOWN AND AT THE SEA-SIDE.

THE engravings on the two preceding pages tell their own story, and need no further explanation. The scene by the sea-side—the dolce far niente—the hunt for creatures—the hour spent in sketching the distant schooner—the delightful bien-être—are they not all written in our memories? Now Virginia-water will readily recognize the scene opposite St. Paul's Church, with the jam of omnibuses, stages, and vehicles of all kinds. One of our contributors has supplied us with the following lines on a prominent member of the group:

THE BREWAY POLICEMAN.

As seen by our Artist.

Tall and handsome fellow!
With his badge and star,
Standing by the gutter,
Watching wear and tear;
Watching for the women
All the bustling day—
Smiling and gallanting
The fair across Broadway.

Now he's in the gutter,
Now he's in the pave,
Now among the horses—
Don't you think him brave?
Boots outside his trousers,
Through the miry clay
Wades the "star," gallanting
The fair across Broadway.

If a pain old woman,
Without crinoline,
Shudders on the pavement,
Waiting for a scow;
Takes her by the shoulder,
Pushes her away;
Tells her, "Step up, now,
If you want to cross Broadway!"

If a mincing damsel,
Hooped and flounced "to kill,"
Pets her little foot out,
Hesitating still;
Forward, to the rescue!
Darts without delay
That "star," and gently hands her
T'other side Broadway.

If a gay young beauty—
Curls and dog-skin gyve—
Raise her taper fingers
Ardently he flies;
Clasps his arm around her,
Hugs—yes, hugs, I say!—
Hugs her, till he gets her
T'other side Broadway.

When the City Fathers
Next in Council sit,
Hope they'll pass an ord'nance
For his hire;
Making him impartial
To ugly, old, and gay,
And cease to beg the beauties
While crossing o'er Broadway.

D. VERNON.

THE DEACON'S WELL.

In all Berkshire County, or, to go further, in all the State of Massachusetts, there was not a better ordered farm than that of Deacon Enoch Sharp. People said the prosperity of the Sharp place did not so much arise from the industry of Enoch Sharp as from other causes. He had inherited the farm with worthy belongings, and the least important of which was believed to be an uncommonly good spring of water, of the first level coin from his father. Whether this last supposition was correct or not—and there can be no reason why it should not have been, when it is considered that lands and places of trust were things unknown a few years ago—it was still a certain fact that Deacon Enoch Sharp was known to be a rich man, as well as were counted a quarter of a century since in Berkshire County.

Twice had Deacon Enoch Sharp advertised upon the sign-boards, and each time, too, a singular coincidence, had the bride elect brought something to add unto the wealth that already blessed the prosperous owner. His first wife Enoch Sharp had no children, but only a twelvemonth after she died there came to the house, as the dying charge from a much-loved but unfortunately married sister, a little white-headed boy. She only child, and to this child did the deacon, along with an earnestness, for the short period ere she followed her sister, she showed it was her intention to acquit herself with truth. On her death-bed she placed the hand of the sobbing boy, then only five years old, in that of her husband, bidding him to act dutifully by the more than orphaned, and promising him that if it were in her power she would watch over him as he did over the boy, and hoped that he might prosper as he obeyed her injunctions.

For many months after his wife's death Enoch Sharp mourned her strictly in accordance with the requirements of his neighbors; there was no hat so fully craped, and no face that wore so staid a look when he spoke of "the dear departed." During these months he sought, as far as was consistent with convenience, to watch over and attend to the welfare of the little John Alden; but as the months flew on that care became less, and the boy was suffered to wander where he would, to eat and sleep at will, and to defy all attempts to subdue the love of Enoch Sharp. It can not be supposed that the wealthy young widower would long remain with the feeling of a serious shade upon his life; spite of all marriageable maids and widows coming within the knowledge of the deacon. It is by no wonder, when it is known, that Enoch Sharp thought once more of marrying, or that in exactly two years from the death of his first he took to wife Lydia Warner, a well-to-do spinster, whose comfortable little property adjoined the Sharp farm, and as this measure was considered as added to it. Lydia Warner, when she married Enoch Sharp, was a very younger young lady. But must be told, Lydia's age at the time of her marriage exceeded that of Enoch's by three years, a circumstance which gave rise to much food for neighbors' gossip, and made a target wherewat many a hard word was cast.

When Mrs. Lydia Sharp took possession of her new home it was supposed that she found things in sad disorder from Enoch's two years' negligence; but of nothing, among all the neglected duties of the household, did she so raise her voice in remonstrance as that of little John Alden. With him she showed no patience, and no sympathies. It did not take long to initiate him into the mysteries of soap and water; periodical clean shirts fallen out of the order of nature; he soon began to understand the importance of eating at regular hours, of going to bed at the same hour, and of rising with the rest of the household. There was a busy, fidgety way about Mrs. Lydia Sharp that struck horror in the boy who had always been accustomed to those motherly attentions so softly administered; but there was a sternness in her voice, and looks that he might learn what other boys learned of his age." So said Mrs. Lydia Sharp, and under such circumstances she commenced whatever John Alden inaugurated.

One pleasant day in spring, less than one year after the coming of the new mistress, there was a great bustle at the Sharp farm, and Dr. Wilson was seen in attendance hurriedly at the door. Within an hour it was announced that Mrs. Lydia Sharp was a mother, a beautiful girl being added to the family. There was a curious struggle in Deacon Sharp's face for the first few days after this event, when congratulations were offered him. A struggle between the gravity which he thought necessary to assume and the desire to look cheerful in one heart of delight over the great fact that for the first time he was a father. Afterward there was a calm settling upon the deacon's face. He began to feel the importance the new event had invested him with. He could see in a score of ways how the coming of little Ira Sharp, for such was added to his own station in the world, and given him a claim upon the neighbors' love that never before possessed. Deacon Enoch Sharp was not inclined at any time to become a great talker, and it was remarked at the time that his reserve had added rather than taken away from the silence of his manner. He could be found in private at those seasons when it was supposed he was busily employed in the barns or the fields—standing quietly over the cradle, that he knew had received from above the broad shirts of his coat, and gazing down upon the face of his heir-apparent. The deacon is known to stand this way studying for over an hour at a time, offering no remark, asking no opinion, but simply sighing out at the end of his serious fit an ejaculation that "the ways of Providence is very mysterious." It was during one of these fits that the Deacon, and marked his subdued, delighted manner, that a new world had broken upon him, and that a great deal had been spoiled in his nature, aiding heart, to hold the little one that had been given to him.

Little Lydia grew rapidly, and it was my empty flattery when the neighbors told Enoch Sharp that the child was the most prettiest baby in all Berkshire County, and as the grew and improved the Sharp farm improved with her. Enoch Sharp's knew turn of late, and it was well said that the same thrifty, bustling management that had marked Lydia Warner's farm had been transferred to Sharp's. At first it was a source of laughter among the neighbors when Deacon Sharp's master marched boldly into the fields and through the barns, and made herself acquainted with their extent, inventory, and worth, a manner that showed she had determined to be obeyed, ordered certain improvements, and, in short, began a short struggle on the part of Enoch Sharp for supremacy; but in the field, as in the house and the dairy, he gave way to the new mistress, and from that day, and from that time the Sharp farm had a certain manager in the person of Mrs. Lydia, and gained much from the accession.

In two years' things went on year after year, wealth flowing in upon Enoch Sharp, while health and beauty blessed little Lydia. John Alden grew from the little white-headed boy to a sizable lad, who stood well in school, and did no discredit to Mrs. Lydia's scrubbing and mending. And even more: as the years went on John Alden came from school a stout lad, clear-headed and industrious, and took part in the farm-work. Enoch Sharp said that wherever he put his hand every thing grew and flourished, and the workmen soon looked up to him with respect, and John Alden became the right-hand man of Mrs. Lydia, gathering in the good-will of all, only excepting Enoch Sharp. For as one and another praised the fact and industry of the boy, Enoch's heart rose up in rebellion, and he remembered how, step by step, the pre-eminence in his household had been taken from him and usurped by Mrs. Lydia, who was now transferring a large part to John Alden. It was well for the welfare of Enoch Sharp that John Alden did not feel that his earnest working was a usurpation, for in his heart of hearts he loved his benefactor quietly, and still went on with his labor. There was to be, when little Lydia Sharp came to be so large, no elder with so fine a flavor, no well that was so cool, no crystal water, as house was all that gave such pure crystal water, as house was all that gave such pure crystal water, as house was all that gave such pure feels have made their bed, let them sleep on it." And then, when he had heard at the neighboring village that late the night before Alden had started upon his way to New York, he bade them never speak of him again, or of the one whom he now called his daughter—that for the future they were both dead. And Deacon Enoch Sharp returned to his cheerless home, and among those things which heavily reminded him of all the past sought to teach himself forgetfulness.

Once more the Sharp farm relapsed into the careless management of old. Jabez Sharp took a sweet delight in doing things should go so utterly astray that his employer and then consulted themselves as to short a time, and then consulted themselves with the reflection that Deacon Enoch Sharp was a rich man, and able to bear his own shortcomings. Never in earlier years had the farm looked after his laborers; his own hands never touched work, as in the days gone by. Alone in his room, day after day, and night after night, and day after day, sat Enoch Sharp. Those who were obliged to go to him would observe that his cheek was shrunken, unshaved way than engaged. He was growing old-er very fast; there was a stoop now to his body, and a hollowness in his cheek. He would talk only with those where he was obliged, of some matter connected with his property or the farm. It was fatal to any friendship that spoke even cautiously of his daughter. He had refused to see Dr. Wilson for at various times on matters of something in the past wherein she was concerned. Even with those who came to him on the affairs of the farm he showed a daily growing disinclination to exchange words: at some periods, for weeks at a time, to succession, Enoch Sharp would send them away without orders, or leave them to idleness. Neglect and improvidence reigned supreme where the open Sharp farm.

One day they came to Enoch Sharp. The well that well celebrated for the beauty and purity of its water through all the country—was foul, wanted cleaning. The water must be pumped, moreover, Enoch Sharp said, would be time enough. For narrow and to-morrow came many times, and still the well remained undisturbed, and the water impure. At last the woman who kept the house for Enoch Sharp said to him that she could use the water no longer. Then when, as it was with all things else, he could delay no longer, he said that the well was foul; that Enoch Sharp relapsed back into the old, rigid stolidity, looking into the smouldering fire opposite his chair.

There was a hurrying and stamping of many feet in the hall, a muttering of voices, and then a rap at the door of Deacon Sharp's room, a hand upon the knob, and the housekeeper entered. The old man is still looking into the fire. The woman has pale and ghastly, with her hands pressed against her ears, as though to shut out some unwelcome sound. She says:

"Miss Lydia, Deacon Sharp; she is here!"

The old man is on his feet in a moment, flashing through his eyes, the old clinch of the hand, the old stamp of the foot.

"Don't let her come here!" he says. "Curse her! The disobedient child shall be cursed forevermore! Don't let me see her. She made her bed—let her lie in it!"

The old woman still pressed her hands against her ears.

"She is dead, Deacon Sharp."

"Dead!" resumed the woman, pressing her hands still closer, and shutting her eyes, as though she were shutting away the remembrance of the word—"Drowned in the well. Oh! God is with us all!"

The old man repeated, "Dead! Drowned!"

They laid the fair young girl who had made her bed in the well on her own snowy counterpane, that had remained undisturbed since she had last smoothed its folds so many weeks before. They laid her there till kind hands could be found in from among the neighbors and decked her for the earth. They laid the old man away from his muttering and playing with the fire, and left him beside to his bed. He had no memory of what had just occurred; his mind wandered back to the days past, when Lydia was a baby and he stood by her cradle-side. And so he lay and muttered over all his memories, while they laid Lydia beside her mother; and one month after Deacon Sharp awakened one morning, when the sun was streaming into his room, and spoke many things that showed light had come again to his brain. It was all clear to him now, he said, that Lydia had died in his forgiveness, and prayed truthfully with his good minister for that of God.

There was ever a way to bring down the iron, obdurate heart. He wished to see John Alden, but none knew where he could be found in that great city.

One week Deacon Enoch Sharp was lying thus between life and death. Whenever strength was given him to speak it was of Lydia he would talk; and so also when his mind was wandering and his dying man stretched forth his arms, and, with her name upon his lips, spoke into the empty air. For five years the lawyers sought John Alden, without success, to tell him that the last act of Enoch Sharp's life was to make a will in favor of to him, reserving only a few legacies to Dr. Wilson and others, the whole of the Sharp property. At the end of this time, when the search had been given up, John Alden came back to his native place to claim his inheritance. He found a stranger in the high land; and since the night when he had hovered about the house there had been no trace, no speech with Lydia, and had gone away unsuccessful, he had no intelligence of her.

John Alden owned and lives on the Sharp farm. He is only thirty, but his hair is well streaked with gray, and he looks prematurely old.

The Deacon's well has been filled, and a small temple stands upon the spot, where, summer and winter, when the labors of the farm spare him, John Alden sits. He will never marry. "All the neighbors' say so, and the only thing fearful that troubles them is, who shall inherit the Sharp farm?

WHAT I SAW.

As I pulse than in my west, my love?
Let me lay your head on my breast;
There is quite truth in your dark-brown eyes,
In the eyes that I love best.
You can twine your arms about my neck,
And believe me all your own.
While I tell the cause of my whitened cheek
To you, my love, alone.

There is sunshine on the crowded street,
And the day is superbly fair;
There are beautiful things in jewels and gold,
Wandering gaudily there.
There's blushful beauty, that spurn the stones,
Tossing their heads to the wind;
Carriages covered with pomp and glare,
Cushioned for thought to find.

There was one I marked for the silken shine
Of its proudly stepping bays,
Till she who sat in its cushioned depths
Broke full on my startled gaze.
It was Madaline—she whom I loved so well—
Drew blushful beauty, that spurn the stones,
When I was a boy, and she was a belle,
And I was a stranger to thee.

She would let me hold her smooth white hand
Till I might press it with modest zeal;
She would press her burning lips to mine,
While I held her beautiful head.
Yes! while I held her head to my breast,
Just where your own now lies.
Twine your arms about my neck
And look me full in the eyes.

She said that she loved me better than life,
But ah! not better than gold.
She was poor, and I was a thousand times,
It is very, very old.
I am not worth even her crimson lips
One single passionate kiss;
He can not blot one burning word
Does he write of this.

Does she ever think of the wonderful love
That held her above the skies?
Does her frozen heart give no response
From its cavern of living ice?
Yes! I watched her eyes as they met my own,
And I knew that I was not dear.
I had bountiful time, as she dashed along,
To compare her beauty with thine.

She will never forget that autumn day
Till her heart is cold and dead,
When my trembling passion was crumbled away
In a moment of contempt.
I had terrible thoughts that autumn day,
As I stood by the waves of the sea,
But oh! how deeply I thank her now
For the words she spoke to me!

Lay your head close to my beating breast,
Madaline married for gold.
Do you feel my heart, how warm it is?
Madaline's heart is cold.
The look I gave that autumn day
Has frozen its every vein;
Madaline never will know what it is
To love or to love again.

Now you may know, my own sweet love,
The reason my cheek grew pale;
I have looked on the terrible path I have passed,
And my terror is the less of the gain.
Madaline—she has jewels and gold,
And silk of a princess's;
I have myself, a beating heart,
And you, my love—and you.

REAL GHOSTS.

There is a vast difference between the real external world and the seeming external world. It is well known that a disease of the nerves will produce, a phantom world within us, which many and very different causes may invest with apparent reality. The certain and constant effect of these obstructions or organic changes of the brain which produce disease, is to call into being some such fellowship of blood-vessels as caused the Berlin lookseller Nicolai to behold outer spectra, may, as well as many other persons, to see and hear plainly about apparent externity of objects which are really within the cranial chamber of the mind. I will recount here a late celebrated physician of Birmingham telling me an anecdote respecting himself, which bears upon this point.

He was sitting writing at a late hour in his study, when, suddenly, he felt a sense of fear. Straightway his maid Betty standing close to his elbow with a lighted bedroom candle in her hand. Supposing that Betty wished to remind him to go to bed, or rather was herself sleepy, he said to her, "Betty, you may go to bed, and I will go to bed. I don't want any thing more to-night."

Absorbed in writing, Dr. L——, conceiving Betty to be gone, did not look up from his occupation; but when he again raised his eyes, there stood Betty still with the candle in her hand. He then command to set it down and to go to bed was repeated; but Betty never stirred. Although, when she had first approached him, she had appeared to the Doctor, surprised at Betty's supposed perversity, and thinking she was afflicted with sudden deafness, put out his hand to push her gently downward the door, thereby more energetically to demonstrate that she was, on this occasion, "Madame do Trop." Then, said Dr. L——, I received an unpleasant shock in discovering that Betty was not there at all.

My hand went through the phantom; but even this did not disperse her presence. I ordered her phantom to go. It was in a raging fever. I drew out a lancet from my pocket-book, and set it flowed from my arm.

Betty, till then an obstinate ghost, bent on not going to bed, was laid in the red of the wash-hand-basin, which I placed to catch the sanguine stream, and with her departed the danger I had run of having a violent illness.

No man, if judicious, will deny what he has no means of disproving: namely, that thought of rare occurrences, there may be impressions on the nerves of sense caused by the mental activity of his fellow-beings.

To prepare my readers for the extreme case of the apparent vision of a friend just as he is dying, I throw together a few familiar instances of common-place occurrence.

Letters from friends arrive soon after we have had those friends strongly present to our thought. Again, the old proverb of, "Talk of the devil and he'll appear," is too constantly verified by the appearance of some one at the wrong moment (we, perhaps, we are making them as only dear friends make one another) to be attributed to the doctrine of coincidence. And observe; this phenomenon happens oftenest where we expect the least, namely, where the person whose inopportune friend is supposed to be a thousand miles away.

Again; it happens often that, as we walk in the street, we suddenly think we see a well-known face and figure, and we are about to bow undoubtedly. But the state of surprise in the person we half salute shows us we were mistaken. We look more narrowly, and we perceive it is not our friend; and, as we approach nearer, we begin to wonder how we could have taken the stranger for him. Then we laugh. Like, in my proceeding onward a few hundred yards, we do really encounter our man by popular arrival. Why should we have an avant-courier—a double so à propos and so pertinent to the occasion? I hazard the solution that the mental atmosphere of our friend had impressed us previous to his personal appearance.

But the vision in which the mental impression may be best studied is each man's own home. Persons who live together acquire mysterious likenesses, not only in voice and face. The resemblance of married people to each other (which began by unlikeness) is proverbial. A homogeneous atmosphere envelops families, and among every domestic circle, if the attention be once drawn to the subject, the most dual of human phenomena, transmission of silent thought, will be every where perceived.

I pass to the consideration of that species of impression on the sensorium of another which is produced by the exclusively excited action of a dying friend's brain: a phenomenon which, though rare, has for myself the concurrent testimony of members of mankind. In such a case the thought-impressing sometimes rises to the simulation of absolute vision. The impressed person believes he sees the absent friend or relative, whose cerebral agitation thus communicates itself to his own brain. The senses or the brain are differently acted upon.

Altogether I divide these kinds of impressions into five:

1. Merely mental.
2. By the mental hearing.
3. By the sense of seeing.
4. By sight and hearing.
5. By dreams.

Of the merely mental impression I will relate two instances. The first was told me not long since when I was yet in careless bachelorhood," said Professor Wilson, "I was living at Oxford, and had taken a very nice in a charming family, where the sons were all brave and the daughters beautiful. With a gay party, in which the element of youth predominated, I went, in the course of this visit, on a picnic excursion to some ruins, not many miles distant from my neighborhood. We were all dotted picturesquely about among the moss-grown stones that lay strewn about the ground, or were sitting, reclining, on the turf formed our table, and on this a snow-white cloth decorously presented its pure whiteness, with its accompaniments. The thick of the dinner being over, we still sat, or lolled in that pleasant and congenial state of repast which is the sequel of a thing of the sort; but as we knew that, according to the programme, our next business was to go to the romantic, but spots which we had yet to visit, I was deputed to see, by a reference to my watch, that we did not overstay the hour. Accordingly, I had placed my watch, a fine old silver warming-pan, for safety's sake, in the crown of the hat in the ruin that was just opposite to me, and in the intervals of conversation I looked at it, though, indeed, not quite so often as at the first of the day. Suddenly—I perfectly remember the hands were pointing to twenty minutes past three—I felt a sensation—the watch arrested my gaze, while a remarkable feeling passed over me. I said to myself, 'Why, let me see! I know not why, but I feel exact time my brother R. is dying in India.' The sensation over, and went with the rapidity of those inscrutable impressions

Which make the present, with the flash doth last,
Seem but the semblance of an idle vision.

Yet, as much was I struck with the circumstance, that, taking out my pocket-book, saying nothing, however, to my body as to why I did so, I wrote down the day and the time strangely visitation of thought. I did not exactly place confidence in the previous, and could not be much marked by my watch when I had my eyes on it. Our correspondent also informed us that my brother had, in his last moments, mentioned me."

Such was Professor Wilson's story. My own is as follows:

Many years ago I had a friend who was in a bad state of health, but not considered to be in any immediate danger. Indeed, I had heard that he was better, and preparing to remove to a milder climate for the winter. His passage to Malta was already taken. I was then living at a village in Surrey; a friend (who had been my patient) was staying at a town in Middlesex, about fifteen miles from me. Though I had been much interested about him, my feelings at the time I speak of were, by the recent death of my father, drawn off in another direction. Perhaps I had not thought of my friend C. S. for some days, when, as I was sitting in a room with a family party, suddenly I felt myself impelled, I might say compelled, to call out, in the very midst, too, of other conversation, "C. S. is dying!" Every one stared. I, myself, to laugh, and to pooh-pooh my own exclamation; but I made a good hand at it. The next day I heard that I had uttered the ominous words was so completely a mystery to myself, to exactly as if some one else had been one of my organs of speech, that I was unpleasantly impressed. However, I did not believe my own prediction, and went to bed without forebodings. I slept soundly, and without dreaming. But I awoke myself with the sound of my own voice. I was calling out loudly, "C. S. is dead!" Having a light in my room, I looked at my watch, and saw that it was between three and four in the morning. Two days afterward I received a letter with a black seal from the friend at whose house C. S. had been staying. "C. S. was dead. On the very day, and at the very hour when I had said that C. S. is dying!"—that is, seven in the evening—he had been suddenly seized, as he also sat at tea (for he had never kept his bed), by the usual effects of breathing. He could no longer support himself, and was carried up to bed. From that time until between three and four in the morning he was dying, and conscious that he was dying. He spoke much of me, and sent me some last words. He spoke much of me, and sent me some last words. He spoke much of me, and sent me some last words thing strange stealing upon us. The voice, too, instead of ending floated about the room more wildly than at first. Never shall I forget that cry! 'Mass George! Mass George!' In every tone of the boy's well-known voice it came upon the perfect stillness of a breathless October evening in a manner which I can hardly attempt to describe. At times it seemed to go off into the distance, retreating and retreating, till it was all but inaudible. Then the faint smothered tones seemed, by degrees, to gather themselves up, and to approach the house again. Sometimes they ceased altogether, then suddenly seemed sounding in our very ears. And there was an impatience, an agony in the sound, which was heart-rending. 'Mas—as —Ge—orge!' in a long, wailing manner, was repeated, as if the boy implored me to come to him, to pity him, to help him. And this not for a few minutes, or for half an hour, but for above two hours. At length the sounds became fainter and fainter, and only sobbed at intervals upon the air, till every thing subsided into silence.

"The next post from Liverpool brought the news of poor little Dicky's death. The letter said, 'He suffered much at the last; and he never ceased to cry, "Mass George!" for two hours before he expired.' Those two hours were the very same time He which the voice was crying out round our house in Yorkshire."

A Good Fight.

CHAPTER XII.

WHEN a man misbehaves, the effect is curious on a girl who loves him sincerely. It makes her pity him. This, in some of us mildews even any thing but logical. The fault is in our own eye, the logic in our spectacles. At least, Agnes thus: "How unhappy, how vexed, poor * * * must be; him to misbehave!"

Margaret was full of this sweet womanly pity, when, to her great surprise, scarce an hour and a half after he left her, Gerard came running back, to her with the fragments of a picture in his hand, and panting with anger and grief.

"There, Margaret! see! see! the wretches! Look at their spite! They have cut your portrait to pieces."

Margaret looked. And, sure enough, some malicious hand had cut her portrait in five pieces. She was a good, tall girl: but she was not six; she turned red to her very forehead.

"Who did it?"

"Nay, I know not. I durst not ask; for I should hate the hand that did it, ay, till my dying day. Shame upon them! The beasts! the rufians! Six months' work cut out of my life, and nothing to show for it. Oh, Margaret, I could eat through your very face—the sweet face that every one loves who knows it. O heartless, mercilless viper!"

"Never mind, Gerard," said Margaret, panting. "Since this is how they treat you at home, you can rob him of my portrait, do you! Well, then I give him my portrait."

"Oh, Margaret!"

"Yes, Gerard; since they are so cruel, I will be the kinder: forgive me for rebuking you. You will be your wife—to-morrow, if it is your pleasure."

CHAPTER XIII.

THE bans of marriage had to be read three times, as with us; but they were read on weekdays, and the young couple easily persuaded the curé to do the three readings in two—and a happy he was new to the place, and their looks spoke volumes in their favor. They were read on Monday at matins and at vespers; and, to their great delight, nobody from Tergou was in the church. The next morning they were all three early, plotting with anxiety, when, to their horror, a stranger stood up and forbade the bans, on the score that the parties were not of age, and their parents not consenting.

Outside the church door Margaret and Gerard held a trembling and almost despairing consultation; but before they could settle any thing, the man who had done them so ill a turn approached, and gave them to understand that he was very sorry to interfere; that his inclination was to further the happiness of the young: but that in point of fact his only means of getting a living was by forbidding bans: what then? The young people give me a crown, and I undo my work handsomely; tell the curé I was misinformed; and all goes smoothly.

"A crown? I will give you a golden angel to do this," said Gerard, gayly. The man contented as eagerly, and went with Gerard to the curé, and told him he had made a violent mistake, which a sight of the parties had rectified. On this the curé agreed to marry the young couple next day at ten: and the professional obstructor of this went home with Gerard's angel. Like most of these very clever knaves, he was a fool, and proceeded to drink his angel at a certain hostelry in Tergou, where was a green deverdd to archer and the common sports of the day. There, being drunk, he bragged of his day's exploit: and who should be there, imbibing every word, but a great frequenter of the sport, the next-to-dowel Sybrandt. Sybrandt ran home to tell his father; his father was not at home; he was gone to Rotterdam to buy cloth of the merchants. Catching his elder brother's eye, he made him a signal to come out, and told him what he had heard.

There are black sheep in nearly every large family; and those two were Gerard's black brothers. Idleness is vilifating: waiting for the death of those we ought to love is vitiating; and those two one-sided cure were ready to-tear any one to death that should interfere with that miserable inheritance, which was their thought by day and their dream by night. Their parents' parsimony was a virtue; it was accompanied by industry, and its motive was love of their offspring; but in these perverse and selfish hearts that homely virtue was perverted into avarice, than which no more fruitful source of crimes is to be found in nature.

They put their heads together, and agreed not to tell their mother, whose sentiments were so uncertain, but to go first to the Burgomaster. They were cunning enough to see that he was averse to the match, though they could not divine why.

Glysbrecht Van Swieten saw through them at once; but he took care not to let them see through him. He heard their story; and, putting on magisterial dignity and coldness, he said:

"Since the father of the family is not here, his duty devolves on me, who am the father of the town. I know your father's mind; leave all to me: and, above all, tell no woman a word of all this, least of all the women that are in your own house: for chattering tongues mar the wisest counsels."

So he dismissed them a little supercilliously: he was ashamed of his confederates.

On their return home they found their brother Gerard seated on a low stool at their mother's knee: she was cutting his hair with her hand, stroking very kindly to him, and promising to take his part with his father and thwart his love no more. The main cause of this change of mind was one that the reader will comprehend, if he has ever known a woman of this kind. It was this. She it was who in a moment of female irritation had cut Margaret's picture to pieces. She had watched the effect with some misgivings, and had seen Gerard turn pale as death, and sit motionless like a bereaved creature, with the pieces in his hands, and his eyes fixed on them till tears came and blinded them. Then she was terrified at what she had done; and next her heart smote her bitterly; and she was sore apart: but, being what she was, dared not own it, but said to herself, "I'll not say a word, but I'll make it up to him." And her bowels yearned over her soft, and her feeble violence died a natural death, and she was transferring her fatal alliance to Gerard when the two black sheep came in. Gerard knew nothing of the immediate cause; on the contrary, her kindness made this novice ashamed of a suspicion he had for a moment entertained that she was the depredator: and he kissed her again and again, and went to bed happy as a prince to think his mother was his mother once more at the very crisis of his fate.

The next morning, at ten o'clock, Gerard and Margaret were in the church at Sevenbergen—he radiant with joy, she with blushes. Peter was also there, and Martin Wittenhauge, but no other friend. Secrecy was every thing. Margaret had declined Italy. She could not leave her father: he was too learned and too helpless. But it was settled they should retire into Flanders for a few weeks until the storm should be blown over at Tergou. The curé did not keep them waiting long, though it seemed an age. Presently he stood at the altar, and called them to him. They went hand in hand the happiest in Holland. The curé opened his book.

But ere he had uttered a single word of the sacred rite, a harsh voice cried "Forbear!" And the constables of Tergou came up the aisle and seized Gerard in the name of the law. Martin's long knife flashed out directly.

"Forbear man!" cried the Priest. "What! draw your weapon in a church! And you who interrupt this holy sacrament—what means this impiety?"

"There is no impiety, father," said the Burgomaster's servant, respectfully. "This young man would marry against his father's will, and his father has prayed our Burgomaster to deal with him according to the law. Let him deny it if he can."

"Is this so, young man?"

Gerard hung his head.

"We take him to Rotterdam to abide the sentence of the duke."

At this Margaret uttered a cry of despair, and the young gentleman, who was not happy a moment ago, fell to sobbing in one another's arms, piteously that the instruments of oppression drew back a step, and were ashamed; but one glance that was good-natured stepped up under pretense of separating them, and whispered:

"Rotterdam? it is a lie! We but take him to our Stadthouse."

They took him away on horseback, on the road to Rotterdam; and, after a dozen halts, and by day dawn, to Tergou. Just outside the town they were met by a rude vehicle covered with canvas. Gerard was put into this, and about five in the evening was safely conveyed into the prison of the Stadthouse. He was taken up several flights of stairs and thrust into a small room lighted only by a narrow window with a verticle iron bar. The whole furniture was a huge oak chest.

Imprisonment in those days was one of the legal roads to death. It is horrible in its mildest form; but in those days it was often a den of unbroken solitude, torture, starvation, and often poison. Gerard felt he was in the hands of an enemy.

"Oh, the dark days, when will they go the road to Rotterdam. There is more here than my father's breath. At least I shall see no more the light of day." And he kneeled down and commended his soul to God.

Then he rose and sprung at the iron bar of the window and clutched it. This enabled him, by pressing his head sideways, to look out. It was but a minute; but in that minute he saw a sight that none but a captive can appreciate.

He saw Martin Wittenhauge's back.

Martin was walking quietly fishing in the brook near the Stadthouse.

Gerard sprang again at the window, and whistled. Martin looked round, and then he was walking much harder than he was fishing. He turned his head sideways and we could see made him a signal, and taking up his line and bow went quickly off.

Gerard saw by this that his friends were not idle, yet he was not relieved in his mind. The very sight of him was a comfort. He held on, however, at the soldier's window form as long as he could, then falling back somewhat heavily, wrenched the rusty iron bar—held only by rust nails—out of the stone-work, just as Glysbrecht Van Swieten opened the door stealthily behind him. The Burgomaster's eye fell instantly on the iron, and then glanced at the window; but he said nothing. The window was eight feet high; and if Gerard had had a way of jumping out, why should he balk it? He brought a brown loaf and a pitcher of water, and set them on the chest in solemn silence. Gerard's first impulse was to brain him with the iron bar, and fly down the stairs; but the Burgomaster being something wicked in his eye, gave a little cough, and three stout fellows, armed, showed themselves directly at the door.

"My orders are to keep you thus until you shall bind yourself by an oath to leave Margaret Brandt and return to the church to which you have belonged from infancy."

"Death sooner!"

"As you please." And the Burgomaster retired.

A PENNY FOR YOUR THOUGHT.

"HUSBAND, you are busy thinking,
Past and present ever linking;
Take a penny for the thought:
Strike a bargain. Is it bought?
Let me know."

"'Tis a fancy over-wrought!
Be it so.
I remember, long ago,
Cupid's dart
Struck my heart;
Cupid caught me unaware;
On the landing of a stair,
Strung his bow.
And I'm still acutely feeling
(For the wound is never-healing)
All the smart
Of the blow.

"And a maiden fresh and fair,
Sitting yonder in the chair,
Bade me him to do it:
Held me by her eyes and hair—
By the magic of her air—
Held me there
While he drew it.
Now you know.
Pay for hearing!—Only this:
But a penny!
Take it back, and give—a kiss,
One of many."

CHAPTER XIX.

AN OPINION.

WORN out by anxious watching, Mr. Lorry fell asleep in his chair. It was the tenth morning of his suspense when he was startled by the shining of the sun into the room where a heavy slumber had certainly not been when it was dark night.

He rubbed his eyes and roused himself; but he doubted, at first, if he had done so, whether he was not still asleep. For going to the door of the Doctor's room and looking in, he perceived that the shoemaker's bench and tools were put aside again, and that the Doctor himself sat reading at the window. He was in his usual morning dress, and his face (which Mr. Lorry could distinctly see), though still very pale, was calmly studious and attentive.

Even when he had satisfied himself that he was awake, Mr. Lorry felt giddily uncertain for some few moments whether the late shoemaking might not be a disturbed dream of his own; for he did not his eyes show him his friend before or after in his accustomed clothing and aspect, and employed as usual; and was there any sign within their range that the change of which he had so strong an impression had actually happened?

It was but the inquiry of his first confusion and astonishment, the answer being obvious. If the impression were not produced by a real corresponding and sufficient cause, how came he, Jarvis Lorry, there? How came he to have fallen asleep, in his clothes, on the sofa in Doctor Manette's consulting-room, and to be dating those points outside the Doctor's bedroom door in the early morning?

Within a few minutes Miss Pross stood whispering at his side. If he had had any particle of doubt left her talk would of necessity have resolved it; but he was by that time clearheaded, and had none. He advised that they should let the time go by until the regular breakfast-hour, and should then meet the Doctor as if nothing unusual had occurred. If he appeared to be in his customary state of mind, Mr. Lorry would then cautiously proceed to seek direction and guidance from the opinion he had seen, in his anxiety, so anxious to obtain.

Miss Pross submitting herself to his judgment, the scheme was worked out with care. Having abundance of time for his usual methodical toilet, Mr. Lorry presented himself at the breakfast-hour in his best white linen, and with his usual neat legs. The Doctor was summoned in the usual way, and came to breakfast.

So far as it was possible to comprehend him without overstepping those delicate and gradual approaches which Mr. Lorry felt to be the safest advance, he at first supposed that his daughter's marriage had taken place yesterday. An accidental allusion, purposely thrown out, to the day of the week and the day of the month, set him thinking and counting, and evidently made him uneasy. In all other respects, however, he was so composedly himself that Mr. Lorry determined to have the aid he sought. And that aid was his own.

Therefore, when the breakfast was done and cleared away, and he and the Doctor were left together, Mr. Lorry said, feelingly:

"My dear Manette, I am anxious to have your opinion, in confidence, on a very curious case in which I am deeply interested; that is to say, it is very curious to me—perhaps to your better information it may be less so."

Glancing at his hands, which were discolored by his late work, the Doctor looked troubled and listened attentively. He had already glanced at his hands more than once.

"Doctor Manette," said Mr. Lorry, touching him affectionately on the arm, "the case is the case of a particularly dear friend of mine. Pray give your mind to it, and advise me well for the sake—and above all, for his daughter's—his daughter's my dear friend."

"If I understand," said the Doctor, in a subdued tone, "some mental shock—?"

"Yes!"

"Be explicit," said the Doctor. "Spare no detail."

Mr. Lorry saw that they understood one another, and proceeded.

"My dear Manette, it is the case of an old and a terrible shock, of great suddenness and severity, to the affections, the feelings, the—the—as you express it—the mind. The mind. It is the case of a shock under which the sufferer was borne down, one can not say for how long, because of a want of any measure to which to trace himself—as I once heard him publicly relate in a striking manner. It is the case of a shock from which he has recovered so completely as to be a highly intelligent man, capable of close application of mind and great exercise of body, and of constantly making fresh additions to his stock of knowledge, which was already very large. But, unfortunately, there has been—I have noticed and took a deep breath—a slight relapse."

The Doctor, in a low voice, asked, "Of how long duration?"

"Nine days and nights."

"How did it show itself? I infer," glancing at his hands again, "in the resumption of some old pursuit connected with the shock?"

"It did."

"Now, did you ever see him," asked the Doctor, distinctly and collectedly, though in the same low voice, "engaged in that pursuit originally?"

"Once."

"And when the relapse fell on him, was he conscious of it in respects—or in all respects—as he was then?"

"I think, in all respects."

"You say he is your daughter. Does his daughter know of the relapse?"

"No. It has been kept from her, and I hope will always be kept from her. It is known only to myself, and to one other who may be trusted."

The Doctor grasped his hand in return.

"That was very kind. That was very thoughtful!" Mr. Lorry grasped his hand in return, and neither of the two spoke for a little while.

"Now, my dear Manette," said Mr. Lorry, at length, in the tone of one who relieves the burden of a confidence, "I am a mere man of business, and unfit to cope with such intricate and difficult matters. I do not possess the power of information necessary; I do not possess the kind of intelligence; I want guiding. There is no man in this world on whom I could so rely for right guidance as on you. Tell me, how does this relapse present itself to you? What seems to be the matter? Could a repetition of it be prevented now? How should a repetition of it be treated? How does it come about at all? What can I do for my friend? No man ever can have been more desirous in his heart to serve a friend than I am to serve mine, if I knew how. But I don't know how, and I am therefore all the more anxious. I can do so little. Pray discuss it with me; pray enable me to see it clearly, and understand it, and teach me how to be a little more useful."

Doctor Manette sat meditating after these earnest words were spoken. Mr. Lorry let him not hurry him.

"I think it probable," said the Doctor, breaking silence with an effort, "that the relapse you have described, my dear friend, was not quite unexpected by its subject."

"Was it dreaded by him?" Mr. Lorry ventured to ask.

"Very much." He said it with an involuntary shudder. "You have no idea how such an apprehension weighs on the mind, and how difficult—how almost impossible—it is, for the sufferer to force himself to utter or to think upon the topic that oppresses him."

"Would he," asked Mr. Lorry, "be sensibly relieved if he could prevail upon himself to impart that secret brooding to any one, when it is by?"

"I think so. But it is, as I have told you, next to impossible. I even believe it—in some cases—to be quite impossible."

"Now," said Mr. Lorry, gently laying his hand on the Doctor's arm again, after a short silence on both sides, to what would you refer this attack?"

"I believe," returned Doctor Manette, "that there had been a strong and extraordinary revival of the train of thought and remembrance that was the first cause of the malady. Some intense associations of a most distressing nature were recalled to him, when in that state of mind, by some external accident. He had been unconscious of the working of his mind during those associations, and only came back to them as he had done after long periods."

"Would he," asked Mr. Lorry, "remember what took place in the relapse?" asked Mr. Lorry, with natural hesitation.

The Doctor looked desolately round the room, shook his head, and answered, in a low voice, "Not at all."

"Now, as to the future," hinted Mr. Lorry.

"As to the future," said the Doctor, recovering firmness, "I should have great hope. As it pleased Heaven in its mercy to restore him so soon, I should have great hope. He, yielding under the pressure of a complicated something, long dreaded and long vaguely forseen and contended against, has recovered. That the cloud had burst and passed, I should hope that the worst was over."

"Well, well! That's good comfort. I am thankful!" said Mr. Lorry.

"I am thankful!" repeated the Doctor, bending his head with reverence.

"There are two other points," said Mr. Lorry, "on which I am anxious to be instructed. I may go on?"

"You can not do your friend a better service." The Doctor gave him his hand.

"To the first, then. He is of a studious habit, and unusually energetic: he applies himself with great success to the acquisition of professional knowledge, to the conducting of experiments, in many things. Now, does he do too much?"

"I think not. It may be the character of his mind to be always in singular need of occupation. That may be, in part, natural to it; in part, the result of affliction. The loss it was occupied with healthy things, the more it would be in danger of turning in the unhealthy direction. He may have observed himself, and made the discovery."

"You are sure that he is not under too great a strain?"

"I think I am quite sure of it."

"My dear Manette, if he were overworked now—"

"My dear Lorry, I doubt if that could easily be. There has been a violent stress in one direction, and it needs a counterweight."

"Excuse me as a persistent man of business. Assuming for a moment that he was overworked, it would show itself in some renewal of this disorder?"

"I do not think so. I do not think," said Doctor Manette, with the firmness of self-conviction, "that any thing but the one train of association would renew it. I think that, henceforth, nothing but some extraordinary jarring of that chord could renew it. After what has happened, and after his recovery, I find it difficult to imagine any such violent sounding of that string again. I trust, and I almost believe, that the circumstances likely to renew it are exhausted."

He spoke with the diffidence of a man who knew how slight a thing would overset the delicate organization of the mind, and yet with the confidence of a man who had slowly won his assurance out of personal endurance and direction. It was not for his friend to shake that confidence. He professed himself more relieved and encouraged than he really was, and approached his second and last point. He felt it to be the most difficult of all; but remembering the drunken morning interview with Miss Pross, and remembering what he had seen in the last nine days, he knew that he must face it.

"The occupation resumed under the influence of this passing affliction so happily recovered from," said Mr. Lorry, clearing his throat, as he still call—Blacksmith's work, Doctor Manette?"

"Touch it, you mean?" said the Doctor, with a grave smile. "It is strange you should ask it. If you will step across the road with me, and will look in at the window, we will see what he is doing."

The Doctor shaded his forehead with his hand, and bent his foot nervously on the ground.

"He has always kept it by him," said Mr. Lorry, with an anxious look at his friend. "Now, would it not be better that he should let it go?"

Still the Doctor, with shaded forehead, beat his foot nervously on the ground.

"You do not find it easy to advise me?" said Mr. Lorry. "I quite understand it to be a nice question. And yet I think—" And there he shook his head, and stopped.

"You see," said Doctor Manette, turning to him after an uneasy pause, "it is very hard to explain, consistently, the innermost workings of this poor man's mind. He once yearned so frightfully for that occupation, and it was so welcome when it came; no doubt it relieved his pain so much, by substituting the perplexity of the fingers for the perplexity of the brain, and by substituting, as he became more practiced, the ingenuity of the hands for the ingenuity of the mental torture, that he has never been able to bear the thought of putting it quite out of his reach. Even now, when I believe he is more hopeful of himself than he has ever been, and even speaks of himself with a kind of confidence, the idea that he might resume that old employment, and not find it, gives him a sudden sense of terror like that which one may fancy might pass to the heart of a child."

He looked like his illustration as he raised his eyes to Mr. Lorry's face.

"But may not—" Mind! I ask for no information, as a plodding man of business who only deals with such material objects as guineas, shillings, and bank-notes—may not the recollection of the thing involve the retention of the idea? If the thing were gone, my dear Manette, might not the fear go with it? In short, is it not a concession to the misgiving to keep the forge?"

There was another silence.

"You see, too," said the Doctor, tremulously, "it is such an old companion."

"I would not keep it," said Mr. Lorry, shaking his head; for he gained in firmness as he saw the Doctor disquieted. "I would recommend him to sacrifice it. I only want your authority. I am sure it does no good. Come! Give me your authority, like a dear, good man. For his daughter's sake, my dear Manette!"

Very strange to see what a struggle there was within him!

In her name, then, let it be done; I sanction it. But I would not take it away while he was present. Let it be removed when he is not there; let him miss his old companion after an absence."

Mr. Lorry readily engaged for that, and the conference was ended. They passed the day in the country, and the Doctor was quite restored. On the three following days he remained perfectly well, and on the fourteenth he went to pay a visit to Lucie and her husband. The precaution that had been taken to prevent his seeing Mr. Lorry on the first day previous, explained to him, and he had written to Lucie in accordance with it, and she had no suspicion.

On the night of the day on which he left the house Mr. Lorry went into his room with a flapper, saw, chisel, and hammer, attended by Miss Pross, carrying a light. There, with closed doors, and in a mysterious and guilty manner, Mr. Lorry hacked the shoemaker's bench to pieces, while Miss Pross held the candle as if she were assisting at a murder—for which, indeed, in her grimness, she was no unsuitable figure. The burning of the body (previously reduced to pieces convenient for the purpose) was commenced without delay in the kitchen fire; and the tools, shoes, and leather were buried in the garden. So wicked is destruction and secrecy appear to honest minds, that Mr. Lorry and Miss Pross, while engaged in the commission of their deed, and in the removal of all traces, almost felt, and almost looked, like accomplices in a horrible crime.

CHAPTER XX.

A PLEA.

When the newly-married pair came home, the first person who appeared to offer his congratulations was Sydney Carton. They had not been at home many hours when he presented himself. He was not improved in habits, or in looks, or in manner; but there was a certain rugged air of fidelity about him, which was not to the observation of Charles Darnay.

THE AUTO DA FE.

He watched his opportunity of taking Darnay aside into a window, and of speaking to him when no one overheard.

"Mr. Darnay," said Carton, "I wish we might be friends."

"We are already friends, I hope."

"You are good enough to say so as a fashion of speech; but I don't mean any fashion of speech. Indeed, when I say I wish we might be friends, I scarcely mean quite that, either."

Charles Darnay—as was natural—asked him, in all good-humour and kindness, what he did mean?

"Upon my life," said Carton, smiling, "I find that easier to comprehend in my own mind than to convey to yours. However, let me try. You remember certain famous occasion when I was more drunk than usual?"

"I remember to have heard something of the kind from you." said Darnay, gravely.

"I remember it too. The cure of those occasions is heavy upon me, for I always remember them. I hope it may be taken into account one day, when all days are at an end for me!— Don't be alarmed; I am not going to preach."

"I am not at all alarmed. Examination in you is any thing but alarming to me."

"Ah!" said Carton, with a careless wave of his hand, as if he waved that away. "On the drunken occasion in question (one of a large number, as you know) I was insufferable in liking you and not liking you. I wish you would forget it."

"I forget it long ago."

"Fashion of speech again. But, Mr. Darnay, oblivion is not easy to me as you represent it to be to you. I have by no means forgotten you, and a light answer does not help me to forget it."

"If it was a light answer," returned Darnay, "I beg your pardon for it. I had no other object than to turn a slight thing, which, to my surprise, seems trouble you too much now. I declare to you, on the faith of a gentleman, that I have long dismissed it from my mind. Good Heaven! what was there for me to remember? Have I had nothing more important to remember in the great service you rendered me the day?"

"As to the great service," said Carton, "I am bound to accept it, when you speak of it in that way, that it was mere professional claptrap. I don't know that I cared what service, of you when I rendered it. Mind! I say when I rendered it; I am speaking of the past."

"Your reason, sir, for saying which, returned Darnay, "but I will not quarrel with your light answer?"

"Genuine truth, Mr. Darnay, trust me! I have gone aside from my purpose; I was speaking about our having been friends. You know me; you know I am incapable of all the higher and better flights of men. If you doubt it, ask Stryver, and he'll tell you so."

"I prefer to form my own opinion without reference to his, sir."

"Well! As any rate you know me as a dissolute man, a man never done any good, and never will."

"I don't know that you 'never will.'"

"But I, sir, and you must take my word for it. Well! If you could endure to have such a worthless fellow, and a fellow of such indifferent reputation, coming and going at odd times, I should ask that I might be permitted to come and go as a privileged person here; that my name might be regarded as a useless (and I would add, if it were not for the queerness I detect lurking between you and me, an unornamental) piece of furniture, tolerated for its old services, and taken no notice of. I doubt if I should make the permission. It is a hundred to one if I should not sink back into habits that would render me worse than useless; but, if you say the word, I'll try."

"Will you try now?"

"That is another way of saying that I am placed on the footing I have indicated. I thank you, Darnay. I may use that freedom with your name?"

"I think so, Carton, by this time."

They shook hands upon it, and Sydney turned away. Within a minute afterward he was, to all outward appearance, as unobstainable as ever.

When he was gone, and in the course of an evening passed with Miss Pross, Lucie and Mr. Lorry, Charles Darnay made some mention of this conversation in general terms, and spoke of Sydney Carton as a problem of carelessness and recklessness. He spoke of him, in short, not harshly or inconsiderately to bear hard upon him, but as any body might who saw him as he showed himself.

He had at once seen that this could dwell in the thoughts of his fair young wife; but when he afterward joined her in their own room, he found her waiting for him, with the old pretty lifting of the forehead strongly marked.

"We are going home to-night?" said Darnay, drawing his arm about her.

"Yes, dearest Charles," with her hands on his breast, and the inquiring and attentive expression fixed upon him; "we are rather thoughtful to-night, for we have something on our mind to-night."

"What is it, my Lucie?"

"Will you promise not to press one question on me, if I beg you not to ask it?"

"Will I promise? What will I not promise to my Love?"

What, indeed, with his hand putting aside the golden hair from the cheek, and his other hand against the heart that beat for him!

"I think, Charles, poor Mr. Carton deserves more consideration and respect than you expressed for him to-night."

"Indeed, my own? Why so?"

"That is what you are not to ask me. But I think—I know—he does."

"If you know it, it is enough. What would you have me do, my Lucie?"

"I would ask you, dearest, to be very generous with him always, and very lenient on his faults when he is not by. I would ask you to believe that he has a heart very, very seldom revealed, and that there are deep wounds in it. My dear, I have seen it bleeding."

It was a painful reflection to me," said Charles Darnay, quite astounded, "that I should have done him any wrong. I never thought that of him."

"My husband, it is so. I fear he not to be considered; there is scarcely a hope that any thing in his character or fortunes is reparable now. But I am sure that he is capable of good things, gentle things, even magnanimous things."

She looked so beautiful in the purity of her faith in this lost man that her husband could have looked at no face so true for beauty.

"And, oh my dearest Love!" she urged, clinging nearer to him, laying her head upon his shoulder, and raising it to his ear, "remember how strong we are in our happiness, and remember that he is his misery!"

The supplication touched him home. "I will always remember it, dear Heart! I will remember it as long as I live."

He bent over the golden head, and put the rosy lips to his, and folded her in his arms. No one forlorn wanderer, then pacing the dark streets, could have heard her innocent disclosure, and could have seen the floor of her little nest all swept away by her husband from the soft blue eyes so loving of that husband, he might have fallen to the right—and the words would not have parted from his lips for the first time—

"God bless her for her sweet compassion!"

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE UNDERTAKER DISPENSES WITH HIS SERVICES.

"Is there was a great excitement in college; the students had taken possession of an old revolutionary cannon belonging to the town, and planted it in the college campus, which it was watched night and day for a month, the student in charge carrying a pistol from the armoury. One night when the sentinel was walking around the cannon he heard some one around the cannon attack to the touch-hole. Then one of the old college servants, an Irishman, Larry by name, appeared, armed with a club, ready to assist the student. The student, however, had prepared himself. 'The lanky, gintlemen, as the mobs do come for the cannon to-night, sure they'll all go away scrpent!'"

Here I died by a collision.
Twenty more died by the same!
Verdict—Nobody to blame."

Sister, mother, aunt, and me
Were run down. Alas we be
We should have had time to mistake
Had they blown the engine's whistle."

Whose outer features bordered an abyss,
The cars were ended in the precipice,
And even of us killed. But what of that?
'Twas the safety slid it. Let the engineer,
Being upon a header, was executed."

Train-borne traveler, rushing by,
As thou passest my place thou mayest
Here a cat, and blind with fear,
Which I killed with the left eight.
For a moment, friend, be merciful,
As you pass the railroad sleepers.
You may strike our fate—not you!
Ere you reach the next depot."

"Here are deposited the bones
Of the flesh being torn off
Of an unknown man,
Who, being dead, found rest lame,
Neglected to obey the customary signals,
And was run over as a locomotive."

For his command
The engineer was arrested the engine
And it had not killed a body in two.
And, with most exemplary humanity,
Conveyed the remains to an adjacent wood-shed,
Where all means of resuscitation were tried;
But in vain!
The vital spark had fled!
For the humanity they displayed,
The engineer and signal men
Were promoted by the company
With a reverse of place,
One to fire and to lubricate.

"Ah, William! leave them for the wars! Where is the brother who went with you?" "Ah me! we left our mother dying. One of us was killed. How can I bear to tell her which one was it?"

HEALTH OF AMERICAN WOMEN.

The great value of the GRAEFENBERG MEDICINES, including their splendid remedy, Marshall's Uterine Catholicon, is guaranteed by testimonials from the most distinguished men in the country, whose names and the evidence of genuine character, are at the service of any person interested. Among them are testimonials of the GOVERNORS OF TWO STATES, the Chairmen of the BOARD OF HEALTH OF NEW YORK, of the Surgeons-in-Chief of BELLEVUE HOSPITAL, many Clergymen, including Rt. Rev. Bishop D., THE HEAD OF THE METHODIST CHURCH, THE STATE CHEMIST AND ASSAYER of the State of Massachusetts, THE AUTHORS OF NEW YORK CITY, UNITED STATES COMMISSIONER to Great Britain, the Proprietor of BARNUM'S MUSEUM, and many other public men, besides the Editorial Notices from the leading Journals in the country.

To Dr. VALENTINE MOTT, President and Professor of Surgery.

To Dr. G. S. BEDFORD, Professor of Diseases of Women, New York University.

To Dr. WILLIAM FARRE, President of Academy of Medicine.

To Dr. J. MARION SIMS, Head of Women's Hospital, New York.

To Dr. JOHN C. CHEESEMAN, Professor of Diseases of Women, New York.

GENTLEMEN,—Your position in the medical profession is very high. You claim for yourselves great medical and surgical abilities, and profess to teach others how to cure disease. Can you do it? (signed) A. B.

The consulting physicians of the Graefenberg Company make no profession of genius. They are content to rely on common sense, and are willing to rest their case upon the testimony of those they have cured, and not upon any position or honors awarded by a self-constituted medical board. From each of you, gentlemen, patients have come to the consulting rooms of THE GRAEFENBERG COMPANY. In some helpless and pitiable condition, bound your suit, and given them up as incurable. In other instances, you have visited them, and made their cure very slow and difficult, by injudicious surgical operations. Yet, under the broadcast and judicious operation of the Graefenberg Company's Medicines, the sufferers are in a fair way to be cured; MOST of them are cured already.

☞ The Graefenberg Family Medicines will always cure all diseases for which they are recommended with certainty and safety.

The Graefenberg Manual of Health and their celebrated series of medicines should be in every family.—Scientific American, New York.

The Graefenberg Medicines are better than others, and their Manual of Health is an able work.—Waterville Argus.

The Graefenberg Manual of Health is a capital little book, full of useful medical information, and is sold "to who runs may read," and with the Graefenberg Medicines apply its common sense principles to practice. —Pennsylvanian, Philada.

The Graefenberg theory varies from all newfangled notions, but it will preserve and restore health.—New York Sun.

The Graefenberg Medicines and the Manual of Health are invaluable, and should be in every family.—N. Y. Sun.

WITH A LETTER FROM THE AUTHOR TO

HORACE GREELEY, Esq.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

NEW ORLEANS DELTA.—"Remarkably free from sectional prejudice and acerbity. The author knows negro character thoroughly, intimately—from the point of view of ethnological science, but in the warm, enkindling recollections of a humorous friend and youth.

RICHMOND (VA.) DISPATCH.—"One of the few accurate and natural pictures of negro character that we have ever seen. Nearly all of them, including Uncle Tom's Cabin, and most of the replies thereto, are mere caricatures. Here is the genuine nigger, as he is seen in the Southern States by all every day."

THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE.—In the course of a column of editorial notice, the Tribune says of one of the passages of the Book: "It has been distinguished from the days of Herodotus. Pliny, Tacitus, every character of an Elegant Extract, is now making a fashionable tour through the magazines."

MRS. PARTINGTON'S
NEW BOOK.
KNITTING WORK,

Is now ready and for sale everywhere. The advance orders, announcing to over

10,000 Copies,

and the great rush for the book, fully prove the immense popularity of Mrs. Partington. Everybody says

A HOUSEHOLD WORD.

HENRY WARD BEECHER,

"Sam Slick was the first to make the Partington now in the American humorist; original, genial, laughable, and not unsuggestive. Why will he be so understood. Sidney Smith's last is included in these remarks. No one should buy the book who is not ashamed to be seen.

OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES

has said that "Humor must have feeling in it, wit needs the sparkle of steel." Mrs. Partington's Knitting Work is wet with the sensitive driver has more feeling and humor than ever he showed before.

KNITTING WORK,

By MRS. PARTINGTON,

is not wholly a humorous book, but a happy combination of pathos and humor, in which the most beautiful thoughts and sentiments are scattered among Partingtonian mirth and nonsense.

It is elegantly illustrated by

ALFRED B. HOPPIN,

whose own appreciation of humor has been well applied to MRS. PARTINGTON and HER.

The publishers are sure that the sale of the book will even surpass that of the old lady's previous volume, of which over were sold in a few months after its issue.

30,000 COPIES

☞ Persons who have had occasion to consult the past volumes of the Magazine must have been struck with the multiplicity of papers of permanent and engrossing biographical, historical, and scientific facts, so that, apart from its merits as a storehouse of entertaining reading, it is of as much value as a work of general reference, and on a great variety of subjects. The "Editor's Easy Chair" and "Editor's Drawer," in particular, though promising little immediate interest to the reader, will be found, in the course of a few years, and now rapidly becoming, a mine of chronological summary, the convenience and satisfaction of which it is impossible to let the most highly appreciated by those who have the most frequent occasion to refer to the events of the day.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE is emphatically, the American popular magazine. It is the best family magazine, as to politics, elegant in taste, varied in matter, overwhelming with attractive pictures, and honest, and pure in tone. In a sturdy common sense, it has no rival. Nor will it have while it applies its influence as it has hitherto done.—Christian Advocate.

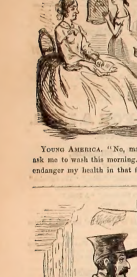
THE CROTON WATER PANIC IN NEW YORK.



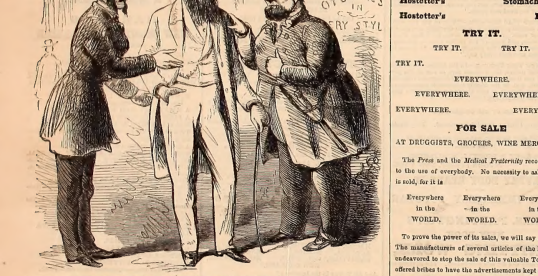
YOUNG AMERICA. "No, mamma, you needn't ask me to wash this morning. I ain't goin' to endanger my health in that filthy Croton."

MR. JONES (to indignant Wife of his bosom). "You see, Mrs. J., 'taint wholesome, th' Cro'n, so Bill's T's h'n obliged (bic) t'drink (bic) brandawnat' (bic) all day! Shocking, isn't it?"

POOR DRUGGAN OF A BACHELOR. "Do you mean to say, Mrs. Soapsuds, that you consider this shirt clean?"

WASHERWOMAN. "Faith, an' it's as clane as I can make it, in the prisent state of the Croton."

CONSCIENTIOUS PLUMBER. "'Tain't my fault, m'm, that the pipes won't work; its all owing to the Croton, which bu'sts 'em and rusts 'em."



OUR POLICE AND OUR BROADWAY RASCALS.

FIRST OFFICER. "Where will it please you to go to-night, sir? They give Lalls Rookh at Wallack's; or would you like to visit the Opera?"

RASCAL (who is vulgarly supposed to be in the Tombs). "Confound the Opera! It bores me!"

SECOND OFFICER. "PUMP, sir, you would like a drive through the Central Park. I'd like to have your opinion of the new improvements there."

RASCAL (deliberating). I guess I'll go to Delmonico's first and dine; then, yes—then I'll go and get drunk where we was last night."

BOTH OFFICERS. "All right, sir!"

[Exeunt.

NAVY YARD, WASHINGTON, Nov. 24, 1858.

SIR—

Agreeably to your order of the 1st inst., we have witnessed a series of satisfactory experiments made with Y. A. DELANO'S Life-Preserving Vest, and have the honor to report that we consider it a valuable invention—and calculated, in the event of casualties to vessels from intemperate weather, and the dangers attending them, it can be inflated, and slight liability to get out of order.

With respect, your obedient servants,

CHARLES C. TURNER,
Commandant, U. S. Navy.
WM. S. MAURY, Lieutenant.
T. W. PATTERSON, Lieutenant.
GEORGE WILMARTH, Boatswain.

NEWPORT, R. I., October 6th 1858.

Delano Life-Preserving Coat and Vest Company.

GENTLEMEN—I have examined the improved Life-Preserving Vest, invented by Y. A. Delano, and have not in get by many severe tests, all of which it has so admirably stood that I consider it a perfect protection against drowning. The elastic straps prevent a large amount of inflation without incommoding or fatiguing the body, and, as used in the vest, acts as entirely new device and a very useful one.

Yours, very respectfully,

BRIGHAM YOUNG'S RELIGION, WEALTH, WIVES, ETC.

THE accompanying illustration will convey to the beholder some idea of a very remarkable interview which took place a few days since between Brigham Young, the chief of the Mormons, and Horace Greeley, the Editor of the New York Tribune. Mr. Greeley, on his way across the continent by the overland route, stopped at Salt Lake City, and there fell in with an old acquaintance, Dr. Bernhisel, who was for some time Mormon delegate in Congress. The Doctor proposed to introduce Mr. Greeley to Governor Young, and the offer, as may be imagined, was gladly accepted. We give the rest in Mr. Greeley's own language, simply observing that Brigham Young's statements are the latest and most authentic expositions we have of the Mormon doctrine:

We were very cordially welcomed at the door by the President, who led us into the second-story parlor of the largest of his houses (he has three), where I was introduced to Heber C. Kimball, General Wells, General Ferguson, Albert Carrington, Elias Smith, and several other leading men in the Church, with two full-grown sons of the President. After some unimportant conversation on general topics, I stated that I had come in quest of fuller knowledge respecting the doctrines and polity of the Mormon Church; and would like to ask some questions bearing directly on these, if there were no objection. President Young assured his willingness to respond to all pertinent inquiries. The conversation proceeded substantially as follows:

THE RELIGION OF MORMON.

GREELEY. "Am I to regard Mormonism (so-called) as a new religion, or as simply a new development of Christianity?"

BRIGHAM. "We hold that there can be no true Christian Church without a priesthood directly commissioned by, and in immediate communication with, the Son of God and Saviour of mankind. Such a Church is that of the Latter-Day Saints, called by their enemies Mormons. We know no other that even pretends to have present and direct revelations of God's will."

GREELEY. "Then I am to understand that you regard all other Churches professing to be Christian as the Church of Rome regards all Churches not in communion with itself—as schismatic, heretical, and out of the way of salvation?"

BRIGHAM. "Yes, substantially."

GREELEY. "Apart from this, in what respect do your doctrines differ essentially from those of our orthodox Protestant Churches—the Baptist or Methodist, for example?"

BRIGHAM. "We hold the doctrines of Christianity, as revealed in the Old and New Testaments; also in the Book of Mormon, which teaches the same cardinal truths, and those only."

GREELEY. "Do you believe in a personal devil—a distinct, conscious, spiritual being, whose nature and acts are essentially malignant and evil?"

BRIGHAM. "We do."

GREELEY. "Do you hold the doctrine of Eternal Punishment?"

BRIGHAM. "We do; though perhaps not exactly as other Churches do. We believe it as the Bible teaches it."

GREELEY. "I understand that you regard Baptism by Immersion as essential?"

BRIGHAM. "We do."

GREELEY. "Do you practise Infant Baptism?"

BRIGHAM. "No."

GREELEY. "Do you make removal to these valleys obligatory on your converts?"

BRIGHAM. "They would consider themselves greatly aggrieved if they were not invited thither. We hold to such a gathering together of God's people as the Bible foretells, and that this is the place and now is the time appointed for its consummation."

GREELEY. "The prediction to which you refer here usually, I think, here understood to indicate Jerusalem (or Judea) as the place of such gathering?"

BRIGHAM. "Yes, for the Jews; not for others."

HOW THE BISHOPS AND PRIESTS LIVE.

GREELEY. "Let me now be enlightened with regard more especially to your Church polity. I understand that you require each member to pay over one-tenth of all he produces or earns to the Church?"

BRIGHAM. "That is a requirement of our faith. There is no compulsion as to the payment. Each member acts in the premises according to his pleasure, under the dictates of his own conscience."

GREELEY. "What is done with the proceeds of this tithing?"

BRIGHAM. "Part of it is devoted to building temples and other places of worship; part to helping the poor and needy converts on their way to this country; and the largest portion to the support of the poor among the Saints."

GREELEY. "Is none of it paid to bishops and other dignitaries of the Church?"

BRIGHAM. "Not one penny. No bishop, no elder, no deacon, or other Church officer, receives any compensation for his official services. A bishop is often required to put his hand in his own pocket and provide therefrom for the poor of his charge; but he never receives any thing for his services."

GREELEY. "How, then, do your ministers live?"

BRIGHAM. "By the labor of their own hands, like the first Apostles. Every bishop, every elder, why he daily earn at work in the field or the shop, like his neighbors; every minister of the Church has his proper calling by which he earns the bread of his family; he who can not or will not do the Church's work for nothing is not wanted in her service; even our lawyers (pointing to General Ferguson and another present, who are the regular lawyers of the Church) are paid nothing for their services.

BRIGHAM CONSIDERS HIMSELF A MILLIONAIRE.

"I am the only person in the Church who has not a regular calling apart from the Church's service, and I never received one farthing from her treasury. If I obtain any thing from the tithing-house, I am charged with and pay for it, just as any one else would; the clerks in the tithing-store are paid like other clerks, but no one is ever paid for any service pertaining to the ministry. We think a man who can not make his living aside from the ministry of Christ unsuited to that office. I am called rich, and consider myself worth $350,000; but no dollar of it was ever paid me by the Church, or for any services as a minister of the Everlasting Gospel. I first nearly all I had when we were broken up in Missouri and driven from that State; I was nearly stripped again when Joseph Smith was murdered and we were driven from Illinois; but nothing was ever made up to me by the Church, nor by any one. I believe I have been to acquire property, and how to take care of it."

COMPARES THE MORMONS TO THE APOSTLES, AND BUCHANAN TO PONTIUS PILATE.

GREELEY. "Can you give me any rational explanation of the aversion and hatred with which your people are generally regarded by those among whom they have lived, and with whom they have been brought directly in contact?"

BRIGHAM. "No other explanation than is afforded by the crucifixion of Christ, and the kindred treatment of God's ministers, prophets, and saints in all ages."

HOW ABOUT POLYGAMY?

GREELEY. "With regard, then, to the grave question on which your doctrine and practices are avowedly at war with those of the Christian world—that of a plurality of wives—is the system of your Church acceptable to the majority of its women?"

BRIGHAM. "They could not be more averse to it than I was when it was first revealed to us as the Divine will. I think they generally accept it, as I do, as the will of God."

INTERVIEW BETWEEN BRIGHAM YOUNG AND HON. HORACE GREELEY AT SALT LAKE CITY.

CHRISTEY. "How general is polygamy among you?"

BRIGHAM. "I could not say. Some of those present (heads of the Church) have each but one wife, others have more. Each determines what is his individual duty."

BRIGHAM HAS FIFTEEN WIVES.

CHRISTEY. "What is the largest number of wives belonging to any one man?"

BRIGHAM. "I think fifteen; I know no one who has more; but some of those seated to me are old ladies whom I regard more as mothers than wives. I think I have taken home to cherish and support."

CHRISTEY. "Does not the Apostle Paul say that a bishop should be the husband of one wife?"

BRIGHAM. "So we hold. We do not regard any but a married man as entitled to the office of bishop. But the Apostle does not forbid a bishop having more wives than one."

CHRISTEY. "Does not Christ say that he who puts away his wife, or marries one whom another has put away, commits adultery?"

BRIGHAM. "I see; and I hold that no man should ever put away a wife except for adultery—but always even for that. Such is my individual view of the matter. I do not say that wives have never been put away in our Church, but that I do not approve of the practice."

Mr. Greeley adds:

Governor Young spoke readily, not always with grammatical accuracy, but with no appearance of hesitation or reserve, and with no apparent desire to conceal anything, nor did he regard any of my questions as impertinent. He was very plainly dressed in his summer clothing, and with no air of assumption or fastidiousness in appearance, he is a portly, good-looking man, not at all thick-set man of fifty-five, seeming to enjoy life, and be in no particular hurry to get to heaven. His associates are plain men, evidently born and reared to a life of labor, and looking to it that they shall continue to subsidize as any body of men I ever met. The absence of rank or wealth from their manner was marked and general; yet I think I may fairly say that their Mormonism has not impoverished them, since they very generally pour men when they embraced it, and are now in very comfortable circumstances—not surrounding three or four wives apiece certainly need to be.

Mr. Greeley was struck with the entire ascendency of Brigham Young over his associates. Elder Stephen A. Douglas once told us a good story, showing that this ascendency was acquired at a very early day also.

In 1846 the excitement against the Mormons at Nauvoo reached its height. The people had set out resolving counter determined to drive them away. The Saints resolved to defend themselves. A civil war seemed imminent. Governor Ford dispatched a regiment to put down both belligerents. This regiment, consisting of 450 men, was under the command of Colonel John J. Hardin, the old political opponent, but warm personal friend of Mr. Douglas, who held the post of Major.

At this little body of troops approached Nauvoo they saw Mormon troops, 4000 strong, ready to oppose their advance. Every man of them was known to be armed with a "seven shooter" and a brace of Colt's "revolvers"—twenty-one shots in a man, besides a bowie-knife.

Hardin halted his troops just out of rifle-range and addressed them:

"There are the Mormons, too on against us. I intend to attack them. If there is a coward here who wishes to go home, he may do so now. Let no one who wishes to go stay for fear of me."

Not a man came forward. "There were, I dare say," said Douglas, "just 151 men left to fight, including our Colonel, who would have been glad to have retired; but not one of us had the courage to own that he was a coward."

"Major Douglas," said the Colonel, "I will take 100 men, will proceed to Nauvoo, arrest the Twelve Apostles, and bring them here!"

"Colonel Hardin," asked the Major quietly, so that no one else heard, "is this a peremptory order?"

"It is."

"Then I shall make the attempt to execute it. But I give you warning that not a man of us will ever return."

"The Apostles must be taken, Major Douglas," replied the Colonel.

"Very well, Colonel. If you will send me alone you will be much more likely to get them."

"But you will lose your life!"

"I will take the responsibility. If you may see alone I will endeavor myself to escape the mob. As to bringing in the Twelve, or getting back myself, that is quite another question. I will try."

"Do you assume the responsibility?"

"I do."

"Major Douglas," said the Colonel, after reflecting a few moments, "will proceed to Nauvoo, taking such men as he sees fit."

The order was hardly given when the little Major—for he was not then a "Little Giant"—dashed off at full speed. As he approached the Mormon legion General Wells came forward to meet him; and after a short but animated conversation through the hollow square of troops into the city.

Not long in finding Brigham and the Twelve. All of them were old acquaintances of Douglas. He then had, in fact, been before him for trial, as Judge, upon some charge or other.

The Judge is famous for his taking manners; and in a very brief time he succeeded in inducing Brigham and his associates to accompany him. They all packed themselves into the "Apostolic Coach," drawn by eight horses, and presented themselves in the camp.

The fighting was postponed, and negotiations for the removal of the Mormons were entered upon. Judge Douglas being chief negotiator on one side. Brigham himself said but little; and at length said he would go out for a while, directing his associates to settle the terms. These were soon informally agreed to by the Twelve, and they were committed to paper.

Brigham returned, and asked how matters had succeeded. He was told that every thing had been settled.

"Let me look at the terms," said Brigham, quietly.

He read them over hastily.

"I'll never agree to them; never!" he exclaimed.

The vote was formally put, and the whole Twelve, without a dissenting voice, declared against them, though they had so unanimously accepted them but five minutes before.

The negotiations were then renewed between Brigham and Douglas. New terms were settled; and when the vote was taken the Twelve agreed to them at once. The treaty was duly signed, and the Mormons prepared to leave the State.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1859.

THE EMANCIPATION QUESTION AGAIN.

THE agitation by some Southern politicians of the revival of the slave-trade, and the undoubted fact that African negroes are constantly landed in the Southern States and sold to the planters, impairs new interest to the inquiry which is made by political writers men into the working of emancipation in the British West Indies. We took occasion in a recent number to allude to the cool and startling view set forth by Mr. Sewell, of the Times, in his letters to that paper from Barbadoes and Trinidad; and we observed that negroes are now a more speedy fulfillment of his predictions than was anticipated by that cautious writer.

It is true that the facts which come from us doubted authority, is only kept quiet by the presence of large bodies of British troops. Barbadoes and Trinidad are not islands overawed by British men-of-war. The newspaper organs of the colored race—some of which, edited and printed by men of color, are exceedingly able—make no secret of their conviction that, if those constraints were removed, the blacks would rise and assert what they consider their rights. So long as the troops and the frigates are there, the blacks are too intelligent to expose themselves to a bloody defeat; but the moment they are removed—and Great Britain will not keep a European force in those fiery ever in the West Indies, for no benefit to herself—the universal opinion of the colored race is that the blacks will rise, and that there will be enormous strength to require the whites for the wrongs they believe they and their ancestors have endured at their hands.

Simultaneously with the development of this state of feeling the English authorities, jealous of the excuse set up by Southern politicians in the late war in Italy, have ordered the enrollment of three new regiments of colored troops from the British West Indies. They are to form an efficient body of men; disposed, like the Zouaves and Turcos, to be unruly and ferocious, but no doubt very well adapted to endure the hard work of fighting. With the three new regiments the West Indian corps will form a little army. One is not in little contact to know where the new army will win its laurels.

In Barbadoes, during the late panic, when the whites prepared for a general rising of the blacks, it was well understood that the native regiment could not be depended upon for the whites relied on. How will it be when the time comes —as it must sooner or later—that the entire defense of the West India Islands is left to these Zouaves?

Events point—and we entreat the advocates of the reviving the slave-trade to answer this question—to the outbreak of a war of races in the British India Islands. The result of such a war would be doubtful. Victory would rest at first rest with the blacks, who outnumber the whites as ten to one. They would probably abuse it, and England be a second time conquered by the whites, to whose succor England would send avenging legions. These would do their work as at Jamaica in 1865. Then the blacks would then be a pause, during which—as now in India—the British public would be called upon to consider whether it will or will not consent to spend several millions a year in protecting a tribe of ignorant, besotted, and helpless barbarians, united only in their hatred of their race. The decision of that question is certain: the English would, sooner or later, abandon the place, and the whites would either be driven to leave the islands, or, like the Europeans of Hayti, would accept the domination of the black race.

This is the destiny of the British West Indies. This is the inevitable consequence of emancipations and decay were the first-fruits; extermination of the whites will be the ripe harvest.

We have dwelt on these considerations to the lessons of history on the blending of races. The world is about to witness a new illustration of the great truth, that two oppositely constituted races can not live in harmony on equal terms in the same land. Peace is possible where one race is dominant, and the other subservient. But if the dividing line be effaced, and a social and political equality established, peace is impossible until one or the other race is entirely crushed. It does not require a seer to discern in the future the establishment of a great negro empire or confederacy in the West Indies; with aims which can readily be conjectured, with a power which can be computed, and at whose proportions the white man shudders; with a destiny which the promoters of the slave-trade should lose no time in contemplating.

SENATOR DOUGLAS ON POPULAR SOVEREIGNTY.

THE article on Popular Sovereignty contributed to the September number of Harper's Magazine by Senator Douglas is attracting the attention it deserves. From his position as Chairman of the Senate Committee on Territories, Senator Douglas has had opportunities of becoming more familiar with the subject than any other statesman of the day; his legal mind and lucidity are admirably adapted to set the question in the clearest light.

A careful perusal of his article will, we think, lead all honest intelligent minds to agree that the people of each Territory have a right to regulate all their local affairs—slavery included. At what period the settlers acquire this right, that is to say, at what moment of time they become an independent political community with individuality and of sovereignty—it remains for Congress to determine.

What effect the publication of this article may have on the political prospects of Senator Douglas remains to be seen; the essay itself is rather the work of a statesman than a politician, and bears no trace of party prejudice.

Mr. Bancroft the historian has been heard to say that he will not carry his history further than the establishment of the Constitution, because, in his opinion, all since then has been experiment. It is certain that the eighty years of national life which the Confederacy has enjoyed have not sufficed for the elaboration of the American system; many of our most important legal and political problems remain still unsolved. Among these, the rights and duties of Territories are prominently conspicuous. Upon Secession Rights, in our view, the Union seems to devolve of discovering or inventing a system of law applicable to them, and consonant with the spirit of the Constitution and the progress of the age. The Magazine article marks a prominent epoch in this task.

COLLAPSE OF THE CROAKERS.

ANOTHER six weeks have elapsed since we appealed to the common sense of the public against the furious abuse of which the French Emperor was the object. At that time the British were fired in the idea that Napoleon contemplated the invasion and conquest of their island; the London Times thundered for more coast defenses; the poor Emperor was lifted perpetually on the American organs of frantic democracy in Europe quashed their teeth and foamed at the thought that Napoleon had always lied. We implored our readers not to be led away by these hot-headed persons, but to wait for the facts before passing judgment on the crisis.

The delay which we asked has not yet elapsed. The conference at Zurich has not been adjourned. The treaty of Peace is not before us. But enough is manifest already to show that Great Britain is in no danger of invasion, and that no more coast defenses or rifle-clubs are required to save London from attack and conquest; that Napoleon has not deceived us, and that the Italians have already won quite as much as they could have expected when the war was undertaken. The London Times and the Tribune follow the example of the London Times, and manfully retract the foolish calumnies which they so unscrupulously published respecting the Emperor of the French.

No one can help being pleased to hear of the release of the Austrian Archduke Maximilian with the French invasion bugbear has so long kept them. Napoleon, we now learn, has begun to demand his cousin and place him on a proper footing. Many of the ships which were said to be destined to operate on the British coast are now withdrawn. There is every reason to hope, too, that, rather than keep the English in a perspiration of fear, Napoleon proposes it. In the recent Austrian Crown Wedding at Vienna, Secretary since the peace of Villafranca, the Emperor Napoleon considers the English alliance so essential to the well-being of France and of the world, that he will rather abandon national projects on which he has set his heart than give his touchy neighbors a pretext for endangering it. One is at a loss which to admire most—the acuteness of his foresight or the unparalleled obsequiousness of the English, who would insist upon it that their lives were in peril.

Then as to Italy. It is now clearly understood that the French troops are not to be used to restore the Dukes of Tuscany and Modena. Austria may restore them—if she dare, and if she can. Whether she will try it, in the face of an overwhelming popular vote in those Duchies against them, we shall shortly see. France turns a deaf ear to the Pope's whining appeal for the restoration of his authority in the Legations; and already we shall hear that Pius has been informed that the French army at Rome is about to be recalled, and that he had best give his subjects such a constitution as will prevent their cutting his throat. Victor Emanuel, whom every one pitied when the Villafranca peace was made, declares himself quite satisfied; and Garibaldi, whom some paltry newspaper writers depicted as overwhelmed by the Emperor's treachery, proclaims his gratitude in an enthusiastic order of the day. If Victor Emanuel and Garibaldi are satisfied, with only color of reason can Englishmen or American arraign Napoleon for betraying Italy!

It is soon, as we said, to see the end. Those who live will discover that the Emperor of the French has executed his purpose most admirably. Italy is now emancipated. She is a nation of twenty millions of souls. On the north, on which alone she can be exposed to attack, she has admirable armies, fortified or warfare, filled with ardor, ripe for victory. Throughout Northern and Central Italy the people have shown, throughout the whole of this trying year, a self-command and a forbearance which we can not find adequate terms of praise. The back of the enemy has been broken by the French. European sympathy is fairly enlisted on the Italian side. If under these circumstances, with a free people, avowed national action, general foreign sympathy, a first-rate army, and a first-rate intelligent public, Italy can not finish the work which Napoleon began; if after France has borne the heat and burden of affairs for a year, her ally can gather in the harvest, and toil through the sunset, then, in God's name, let the Italians be slaves!

For our part we do not think it will be; and we believe that it will be found, when the work is over, that had the French done more or done less the work would have been worse done than now.

THE NATURALIZATION QUESTION IN EUROPE.

THE Germans, it seems, are terribly frightened by the dispatch from Mr. Cass claiming the surrender of Christian Ernst and the other deserters who have been seized for refusal to military service in Germany. It is said that they are prepared to abandon the point without further parley.

We pointed out, in the first article which appeared in any American paper on this question, the weak point in the German side. We showed that, without raising a regiment or fitting out a gun-boat, we could bring all Germany to its knees at an annual loss of a single cargo an cargo on German manufactures. The Germans are alive to the chance, and rather than run the risk, and the certainty of their ranks with the United States, they would let us have two as many recruits as we have asked for.

We believe that the President, now that the question is in so fair a way of settlement, will not make any efforts unduly to hasten its adjudication. His Secretary is a very old man, and committed some sad blunders when the point first rose; but we have no doubt that the conservative and energetic vindication of American citizenship. Let him be satisfied with nothing short of a complete acknowledgment of the right of resisting American citizens; and let this reservation be made by all the German powers. It is, we believe, the Democratic party will regard the ground it has lost.

THE LOUNGER.

MAKING A HIT.

AMONG the Adirondack hills and woods at this very time there are hundreds of people lying quietly behind logs and rocks and banks, all ready to fire some noble animal that may happen to come within by. And so there are a great many young men and women too, who are waiting quietly to pop at him they think, and as they hope, will fall. They are waiting to make their hit. Several good sitters have already been caught in the Lounger's wire cage of his Pickwick Papers, and brought down to their Public in a twinkling. There was Thackeray, who had his hit at Punch; and his hit at Punch with Vanity Fair. There was Tennyson, who aimed longer still, but hit the Queen's Laureate and the great Public. Then there was Charlotte Bronte: for prey had to come down. The young men and women of the period are waiting for opportunities for their turn.

More than one of them has told the Lounger that, when a man has made his hit, all the rest is easy enough; and it is true what they say. It is easy enough; and it is true that they will be able to hit at length with Vanity Fair, or your In Memoriam, or Locksley Hall, or Jane Eyre, or any of those.

Therefore why not write it? Because a man has a fancy or some faculty for writing—because he has been praised—because he wants to be famous, and sees that other men have become so by it—because he wishes to be famous by it—to suppose that he can "make a hit" because somebody else did? Here, for instance, is Emily, the heroine of women, whose manner is a magic that works every body happy. She clothes her graceful form in a light muslin with short sleeves. Why should the plain and brusque Poppin suppose that her manner will be magical, because she tips her wrist figure into a light muslin with short sleeves? Yet it is no mere ridiculous thing for any young person of either sex to suppose that in going to "make a hit" because somebody else has.

How many lawyers are there in the city of New York? How many have there ever been? And how many names of great lawyers live in the honor of the city?

Literary success is as rare as any other. Sometimes a man writes a book that makes his reputation, just as a lawyer makes a plea that establishes him. But in almost all such cases two conditions are to be observed. Either very great talent or very great learning. And the two are often combined. Some of the greatest literary works have been thrown off on very slowly. Some of the greatest authors never made "a hit." Milton did not—Dante did not—Goethe grew like a tree. And it is observable that the "hits" are sometimes the least-valuable shot to become in a night, but inferred in the morning.

Gentle Sir, or madam, that liest under the green sod of summer leisure, expecting the buck to bend by—how if he never comes? How if your dissent depend upon the verdict of the jury, and seven pieces your summer bank before you have made your bit?

BLONDIN AND DE LAVE.

It's a day when newspapers are mainly eager to tell something startling under the head of news, if they can't say, but very dangerous, to moralize and to generalize upon current phenomena. Yet because a prize-fighter lay three days at Poole, without identified with a political party, is murdered in a gang-fight, and knifed with manners and in due precedent, it does not follow that the American people have a stronger regard for bullies than for statesmen. Nor because a rope-walker can go to Niagara and Heenan fight, and the disgusting details are exposed in the columns of the daily and weekly circular journals, does it follow that the American people are more interested in a prize-fight than in other more elevating matters. It is because, in these summer days, a man at Niagara regards death for a living, and another man, who is not imitable like him, must be swift to conclude that our civilization is low and sickly.

Either Blondin or De Lave will presently tumble off the rope and be killed. Then the newspapers will say, Sam Patch was a greater man, for he died but once. Meanwhile the same newspapers print all the details, and are responsible for at least half of the interest in the performance that attends these exhibitions.

Of course the journals will dwell upon their old "vocation" to give the news, and we are not sad for giving it. We do not approve the manner which are telegraphed and printed in our columns; but we should not be newspapers if we did not report them. We think, from time to time, that we say in, but certainly his performances are part of the current news of the day. If a correspondent should write us from Niagara that Blondin to cross the Falls, and should say nothing of the spectacle which was the object of the journey, we might we not justly complain of him as unfit for his position? Our readers don't wish to hear that Niagara is sublime; they wish to know what is doing at the Falls."

This is a perfectly reasonable plea. But we are surely stealing a fact. "There is a swarm of people pouring to Niagara to see Blondin walk over the Falls on his left ribcage." Why, then, is not Punch, Philosopher, and Friend. "What a shame! what a reproach!" Yet if the thing be true, it is a reproach that Blondin and his show should be attended by a swarm of people going to see the sight. But this they would want to; and besides they have it in their minds to go, or they would not start when the news comes."

That is a dangerous argument. But, without discussing it, what is the number of persons who have probably gone expressly to see the performance? We talk of our popular government, but it is popular only in form. Practically it is nothing of the kind. Another President. Will the shrewd and sarcastic spy say whether he thinks that the mass of voters will or will not follow the lead of the political wire-dancer who is ostensibly as the French people would vote for the candidate for the Presidency who will submit to them? The candidate of any party is, theoretically, the man whom the leaders of the party suppose will be most acceptable to the party majority. But actually—such is the condition of party organization—it is the man whom the leaders choose.

The practical "opinion" of any country is not the voice of the majority. It is the opinion of those who rule the majority by eternal laws of intellectual influence. The type of this country is in the morality of intelligent men.

POOR RICHARD.

Every district has its personal charity historian who knows the local traditions, as well as the larger history, of its people and progress. One of these last night told us a very characteristic story of Dr. Franklin.

The Doctor was one of the Commissioners who crossed from Perth Amboy to Staten Island to confer with Lord Howe, after the battle of Long Island. The house in which they met is still standing, and is one of the interesting relics of the island. Lord Howe told he could not recognize any claim of independence; and the commissioners said they could do nothing which did not start from such a recognition. So they took wine and parted. The American commissioners were conveyed across the water to Perth Amboy in the barge of the British General, and as they stepped ashore, Dr. Franklin pulled out a shining gold guinea and offered it to one of the boatmen. But the captain of the barge immediately called out to him not to take it; adding to Dr. Franklin that it would be as much as the boatman's place was worth to touch a rebel's gold. Thereupon the Doctor pocketed his guinea and walked away. But when his fellow-commissioners laughed at him for his willingness to lose his money so easily, Poor Richard waited until they had laughed out, and then said, with the wisdom of a philosophical statesman:

"Lose my money? Why, look here; these British officers have not the slightest idea of foreign currency. Don't you see that I increased the worth of our army and cause a hundredfold? In showing the fellow the color of Yankee gold; for I mean they wouldn't let him take it!"

VITUPERATION.

THE dictionaries define vituperation as blame or censure. Yet, in fact, it is the word which people insist that a speaker shall not vituperate another, since it is a certain sign for any man to censure or blame any conduct in any other man that he thinks fit; knowing, as he does, that if he do so openly the hard world will recoil and kindle his own head.

Suppose, for instance, that you believe a man, who is perpetually held up to the admiration of the young men as a fit example of the man and the citizen, to be a mere hypocrite, salick man, in whose hands the rights of the citizens could never be permanently secure, and whose conduct, even in matters of seldomness, would prevent by lead him to betray them. Is it not perfectly fair for you to declare to the young men that this man is a hypocrite, and that is not an admirable but a dangerous citizen, and that a man who is not honest in small things is not to be trusted with great? Weakness, hesitation, an eternal circus effort of trying to straddle and ride half in each horse are the worst of all political vices, and fatal often, as direct bad intentions. Whoever aspires by his own efforts or by those of his friends to be a leader of other men, must not complain if those who think him unfit for a leader state their reasons unadorned by flattery. He has no right to say that they mean him and no other. So long as a man lives privately and is of no public importance, he has no right to the rights of privacy, and is justly obelized from public discussion of his character and conduct.

We are gradually coming to a canvass of great interest in the country, in which many severe criticisms will be made. And they are to be condemned only when they are unjust, and not because they are personal. For the Presidential elections of 1860 should proceed upon the ground of principles and not of men. Every intelligent voter should vote to his duty if, when opposing certain principles, he thought that the representative of those principles was a man who was not competent to execute or fulfill the office, and did not say so. Suppose there were two parties in a country, and that at the one it was open upon the war. The other resists it. Certainly it is perfectly fair for the orators of the latter party to say that the leader of the party has let us at least spare ourselves the shame of sending a drunken, incompetent and a bully. Whoever says he must, of course, be prepared to be called to order. But there is this consolation—that if they be true, they are fair to be so even by those who would not like to said them.

Clearly we have no right to call people fool names to personally, or to slander them in the dark and to say, "I Resolved, that we think twice two are five; and Resolved, that we think that all who agree with us are mean sneaks and vagabonds." That is simply silly. But orators are often taken to task for "personalities" when they have no more simply expressing an honest opinion of them for the purpose of destroying their influence as much as they can.

LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—RESTLESS lady says, "This serial publication of secrets induces microscopic curiosity." Madam, the remedy is too complex for you ought to be very glad that it is so unimportant a particular.

—Inquiring reader will notice the author of a serial story over undertakes to tell the same tale simultaneously in two different ways. The consequence is, it may be effected by laying the scene in different countries, giving the proper nationality to the characters, and by no other plot. Of course, however, such a story has no vital relation to the truth of the author, and one have none in the memory of the reader.

—P. B. It is hardly fair to suppose that authors are a class are specially interested in Shakespeare. The whole world's involve the imagination there has always been observed a peculiar sympathy with the more remarkable in musicians and painters as in authors. As a class, imaginative men, both detail genius and genius.

—C. S. W. "Napoleon at Solferino" is respectfully declined.

—MERRIMACK. The "Three Fishers" is a ballad by Charles Kingsley. It begins:

"Three fishers went sailing out into the West,
Out into the West as the sun went down;
Each thought of the woman who loved him the best,
And the children stood watching them out of the town."

It has been set to very beautiful and appropriate music by a composer whose name?

—A FRIEND. Pre-Raphaelite is a term applied to several young artists of great talent in England, who profess a style of art which is a return to the effort of nature, all the actual details of nature must be imitated in painting. The name was given to them by critics, but their works have all the hard, stiff singularity of the artists who lived before Raphael; and partly it is complimentary, as indicating that they have returned to a more conscientious style than has been known since Raphael. Millais is the most famous and popular of the Pre-Raphaelite artists, and he has undoubtedly more poetic genius than any living English painter. His "Huguenot Lovers," and "Ophelia," and "Cavalier in the Oak" are perfect poems, and among the most truly interesting of modern pictures.

—I. T. The verses "At the Gleaming" are respectfully declined. Also, C. U.'s "Telling for a Death."

—INGOLDMEX. The first railroad in the United States was built in 1826, to connect the Quincy Quarry, in Massachusetts, with the tide-water upon Neponset River. It was only three miles long. The first road for passengers was the Baltimore and Ohio, in 1830.—Steam power was first used upon railroads by Blenkinsop, in 1811.—The first locomotive in the United States was used in 1831 upon the Mohawk and Hudson Railroad, and in 1833 upon the Baltimore and Ohio. In 1838 there were but three miles of railroad in the United States. Now there are more than 25,000. Who built the locomotive engine used on the M. and H. road? Was it Edward Bury, of London?

—W. S. B. sends a jeu d'esprit too long for the "Lounger's" column.

—Brevity's story has arrived safely, and an answer will be soon returned.

—LITTLE FLOWER, who returned to the Lounger, has quite overlooked her last literary service. She thinks it a good thing to remember that while we may receive money we can not command it. In a word, money is disappointment.

—The prospect is against cruelties. He says that as the rats it is now spreading it will soon be a fine that will encircle the earth.

CORRESPONDENCE.

NEW YORK, August 16, 1859.

Messrs. Harper & Brothers:

GENTLEMEN.—The Rev. Mr. Lackey, Chaplain of the Sing Sing Prison, informs me that "Harper's Magazine" has performed an office of great mercy to the poor prisoners, and is earnestly sought after by them.

Now let me ask your many subscribers, who have old copies therein stored, what could delight them more than to know that each one of these copies, if placed in the hands of a prisoner, would afford a ray of joy to lighten the gloom of their solitude?

May I beg of them, through you, to send to me their old copies, and I will put them in repair and send them on their errand of mercy to the different rooms of this State.

Pardon this intrusion, and believe me still

Yours very truly,
WILLIAM JAY HASSETT,
15 Centre Street.

OUR SARATOGA CORRESPONDENCE.

SARATOGA, August, 1859.

THE crowd of visitors is yet very great here, and the best time to form an estimate of their number is around the Congress Spring from 7 to 8 o'clock in the morning, or by a stroll through the parlors, parlors, and grounds of the principal hotels in the evening. These are the United States, the Union, and Congress? It is very fine, and pleasing to witness the crowds around the Congress in the morning, and the manners which are there exhibited—to me, indeed, in their eagerness for a first snatching the glasses from one another, and even pushing them into the ladies! A person comes his way to the fence around the spring, and taking a glass of water in either hand, turned round and gave them to the ladies. He would do the same while there was a lady near him desirous of a glass. All were accommodated in the same way, and abundant, unacquainted with the habits of the place; others said he was a gentleman of the old school. Right he certainly was, and the best and the luckiest of many, and was the observed of all. All said he was a gentleman, and he was.

You are at once astounded and astonished on entering one of the gay saloons here. They are crowded with ladies, each talking, laughing, looking at the top of their voice; and the confused noises stun you for a time, and you stand gazing.

Amid the splendid dresses and dazzling jewelry of the ladies astonish you. Even old ladies, with flowers, gems, and plaited curls, go as the reverse wing, are seen vying with the young, to be "Queen of the May." You believe, as many of the merchants fall, when their wives and daughters here can not be dressed for a ball, or for an appearance on the parade, for less than from one to two thousand dollars! We were shown a lady whose toilet-dresses sixty in number, and of the richest description; glittering under the bright shining of a gas chandelier, and a rogue, who had just left her side, after a brief conversation, observed in jest, "They were the only brilliants in her possession!" This I could not believe, as many of the ladies in the inverse ratio of the outward adorning, as it seems to be a trait of human nature to hide the most valuable from the eyes of the world. The richest jewels are those which are kept from the public. The plainest people in those saloons are the aristocracy of the place, and the richest are the very lower the gewgaws to their couchoons.

It is wonderful the mixing up of people here. The young Prince, with his cheap cigars and ratans, swell greatly. Their place at the dinner-table is usually rattled by the waiters with the champagne cork. They put on quite a wealthy air, and obviously make the most of the little they have. Each thought of a fine day that the disproportion between their purse and their pretensions is no longer "Lord Fopp" in the extravagant here which often interferes with their honesty, and with their subsequent prosperity. Economy and industry are the two essential to success in life; these are simply mean vices at Saratoga, and are not to be found in the presence of the glorious virtue of prodigality which here reigns triumphant. In these gay saloons and halls will see the milliner sitting by the side of the wife of the millionaire, and the swarthy and dwarfed creole from Cuba repeated to a Don of Castile descent, talking bad English to both. Indeed the finest looking fellow on the portico of the "States" one evening, and the most reserved, was a barber from Broadway, with a lady on his arm. The dress of his bust and of his beard was exquisite. How the mammas sighed for an introduction on account of their daughters! Indeed, a year or two since a young "French Count" had all but won the hand of a young lady of the "Upper ten" around "Madison Square," where it was discovered that his "head-quarters" was near the main bar-room of one of our fashionable hotels. For the young lady it was a hair-breadth escape. And how obviously with more pausch than brains who had made his money by a successful hit, was seen rubbing down his white whiskers after dinner, and his heart seeming to be filled with joy. Truly, 1859, it is good for an individual to come for a few day to Saratoga."

But amid this gilded ignorance and pretension wealth there is a large mixture of the genuine article—real persons of high sense and true worth. Here are princely merchants, as simple and pious as they are rich; and governors and judges, as great as they are modest; and young belles, as modest and sensible as they are fair and lovely, who are not to be gulled from the sphere of their accomplishments; and ministers of the first standing in their Churches, who have no need of preaching to find ample remuneration for their labor in their worth. The prayer meetings at nine o'clock each morning reveal that there are multitudes mixing with the gay throng whose hearts and whose hopes are in heaven, and who are as true to their principles as in the walks of life.

The now come here to drink Congress and to ventilate themselves, and they are all in a state just now. They once heated on high tide; but the waters are receding, and they are sinking in the scale. The high temperature favors not a flat fullers, because political, and absence of good men. But Cheviots is the great convener of the day of the country; and because it will not become fanatical, and lend itself to those unprincipled inquirists to power, it is roundly abused, even by some who minister at the altars. Fanaticism and abuse have never been, and never will be, a substitute for sincere. They soon weary; and when unsuccessful, will vexed, and become sincere of the past. The truth only holds on its way, and from every defeat gathers new strength to pour another shower of arrows upon the very hide of the heartless foe.

And "the Woman's Rights" people are here, and the strangest and most unsexed group for twenty-five cents a hearer. The women beat the men far away. They are more fluent and eloquent; and because they reason from false premises, come more directly to the point. There is a deputation among them from the Shakers at Lebanon—two men and three women. They are as primitive-looking as possible. In the street they walk, the two men before, and the three women behind; and the boys, in admiring mood, bring up the rear. We have seen the Shakers in their public exercises, and never did we see five persons in less danger from "the world's people" than they, and that stood in the midst of persons. We first saw Mrs. Stone and the Rev. Miss Brown have but little attention to pay for the people of their State eloquence failed to draw, and the Convention was a failure. Such things do for a while; but they soon become stale. Up to a certain point women that unsex themselves may amuse; beyond that, they disgust. Such is the feeling which must have obviously crossed the line. If hens do not get tired of striving to crow, people get tired of witnessing the same exhibition. The things that have been a success here are the prayer meetings in the morning, and the preaching of Rev. Joseph Cooper on the Sabbath. And long may it so be!

An event has just transpired here which has its many lessons. A gentleman of New Jersey, the son of a distinguished jurist of that State—himself once a member of Congress—met the chief at the Congress. He mixed freely and gayly with his friends through the day—at 9 o'clock in the evening he was in the circle of his friends in the portico—at 9 he was a corpse by apoplexy. In cold coffin and shroud he found for the grave in the early morning away for his home in New Brunswick. The sudden death of one so active in his profession, and distinguished made a deep impression for the hour. It started all, like a clap of thunder in a clear sky. But yet one of the most brilliant balls of the week was in Congress in the evening. The music was as lively, and the people as gay, and the dancing as spirited, as if no such call from eternity had been heard for a hundred years. Then one sits, and the living by it, and the dead.

"Vanity of vanities, saith the Preacher; all is vanity." The world is nowhere more vanity is this truth more clearly seen than amidst the gay saloons of Saratoga.

We visit most ministers. There are many of them here, of high and low degree; and all of them deserving water with a stone, and some of them look like the Prayer Book, bound in calf. Their regiments tell their Apostolic descent. Others wear decent black, with the white cravat. Others wear nothing black but the cravat. Others are all white. Others wear the dress of bishops of enormous size; while yet others have ruled quite a crop on the upper lip. And there are yet others who maintain the ministry in dress and honored dress of their order—they shave, they wear black, and the white cravat, and are professional hat—and seek only to attract by the propriety of their demeanor. We would not say that there is an affected air in any of our white patriarchs and waistcoat; but we confess a strong prejudice in favor of a clean upper lip and chin in a minister, and of the usual black dress. For do ministers rise in the esteem of society by their dress in the streets of Broadway or Saratoga. It is not well to treat rudely the anomalies of men. A man may be honored Christian man, dressed in White, lid one of the morning prayer meetings. I confess I was somewhat shocked on learning that he was a minister. And there are multitudes of good people for whom a mustache would utterly spoil a sermon. Persons of the fancy ministers of Saratoga could only bear the remarks made about them, they would at least shave and dress as the more mature and sober brethren. It is hoped they will do so when they get over their youngishness.

WANDA.

HOW PEOPLE ARE RUINED AT BADEN-BADEN.

BADEN, August, 1859.

ALTHOUGH "peace" has been declared, still, nearly all the usual visitors to this famous watering-place have thus far been kept away by the war and a general expectation in Germany that a movement toward the Rhine or Vienna would soon take place by order of the "Confederation."

The King of Wurtemberg and his suite have lately arrived, and are staying at the "Hotel Victoria," with this exception, no celebrities are present.

But there are a few of the faithful who never fail to be either here, in Wiesbaden, or Homburg during the summer months. I mean that class whose passion for the gaming-table never ceases, and who, when the season closes at the watering-places, flee hence to the gambling-saloons of Paris, Vienna, or London.

The building in which the gambling-tables are situated is called the "Conversationshaus," or Conversation-house. It is a fine structure, with a noble Corinthian portico, the front looking toward a pleasant lawn, by the western border of which runs a small but rapid stream called the Oos. On the north and south ends of the lawn are small bazars, filled with Tyrolese, Swiss, Algerian, French, and Bohemian productions. The mountains on all sides are covered with rich verdure, and here and there the ruins of an old castle or watch-tower adds much beauty to the view. There is a concert every evening at the charming new rotunda—just finished at a cost of $12,000—which stands nearly in front of the "Conversationshaus," at which the best performers that Paris or Munich can furnish delight the sweetest music. This "Maison de Conversation" was erected in 1824, by Weinbrenner. The main room is one of the finest I have seen in Europe, it being 150 feet long, 50 feet broad, and about 35 feet from floor to ceiling, the whole being decorated in the most costly manner. In this room is placed the "roulette table," which is a smaller room adjoining is found the one for playing "rouge et noir."

In order to understand these games it will be necessary to examine the adjoining diagrams. Firstly, the

ROULETTE TABLE.

It is so called from the revolving disk (X) which is in the centre of the table. As the tables in Baden-Baden are double, you have only to double the diagram to have a correct idea of them as they appear. The inner circle as well as the table is divided into 36 places, plus a simple zero (0) and a double zero (00) place, which make 38 numbers. One half of the notches in this inner circle are colored red, and the other half black. In the outer circle six notches are filled in one direction, and at the same time the central disk is turned in an opposite one, and while these are revolving the players put down their money (from one florin to six Napoleons on the numbers, and as high as four thousand francs on the other parts of the table), until the banker, seeing the marble is about to stop, cries out that nothing more can be put down. The circlet slope toward the disk, which is slightly conical, so that the marble rolls from one to the other several times before it falls into one of the notches. When it has fallen the banker declares the number and color which has won.

"Rouge" denotes the red, and "noir" the black side. "Pair" is for the odd numbers, including double zero (00). "Impair" is for even numbers and simple zero (0). "Manque" (to fail) signifies numbers from 1 to 18, and includes simple zero (0). "Passe" is for numbers (passing) from 19 to 36, with double zero (00).

If a player does not win, he loses all he stakes. If he wins, it is as follows, the zeros counting the same as numbers, the money staked always counting as one portion in the payment.

Money put on A or any numbers wins 35 times.
Money placed across a line, as it, wins 11 times.
Money placed on 5 numbers, as C, wins 11 times.
Money placed on 4 numbers, as D, wins 8 times.
Money placed on 3 numbers, as E, wins 4 times.
Money placed on 6 numbers, as F, wins 5 times.
Money placed on 12 numbers, as G, wins 2 times.
Money placed on 24 numbers, as H, wins 1 time.
Money placed { Rouge or noir, or / Manque or passe, or / Pair or impair, } wins 1 time.
Money placed on the line, as at M, wins 1 time.

At the end we notice

P.	M.	12.
12	12	12	12 P. denotes

the premiere, or first 3d of 36; 12 M. stands for the moyen, or second 3d of 36 (i. e., from 13 to 24); and 12 D. is for the dernier, or last 3d of 36 (i. e., from 25 to 36).

Money placed as at I wins	2 times.
Money placed as at K wins	1 "

In either of the latter cases color is not regarded. The vacant squares at the end of the numbers neither win nor lose when the marble falls into the zeros.

In case "zero" is declared, only the money placed on (0) wins. All others lose but "rouge," "impair," and "manque," which neither win nor lose. If "zero double" (00) is called, only the money placed thereon wins. All others lose save "noir," "pair," and "passe," which neither win nor lose.

In case the disk (X) becomes deranged, or is thought to revolve irregularly, it must be put in order in presence of a Government officer, assisted by one of the bankers.

The "roulette" company always commence with 40,000 francs in their bank. There are two paying tellers on each side of the table, and an assistant at each end, all of whom are relieved every two hours.

The playing commences at 11 A.M., and continues until 11 P.M., from May 1 until November 1.

ROUGE ET NOIR.

This game is less intricate than "roulette." In any case one either loses all he stakes or wins either double (the stake is included in the payment), and nothing less than two florins, or more than six thousand francs can be put down as a first stake, though the player can leave it until, by doubling with constant winning, he may "tenir la banque," i. e., break or blow up the bank, as was done three times in two days last year by the Prince Conino, he having won in that time $100,000; but as usual, he went to another gambling place and lost nearly all he had.

For this play six packs of ordinary playing cards are used, each of which has 52 cards. Each "face card" counts 10, and the others according to the spots, the ace counting only one. Therefore we have 312 cards, containing a sum total of 1040 numbers or points.

These cards are placed in the basket in the centre of the table; but new cards (and only those with white backs are used) must be furnished every day. The banker mixes these cards thoroughly, after which any one person can re-shuffle them, but the banker has the privilege of doing it the last time if he wishes. The cards are then placed in pile, faces downward. The banker, taking off as many as he can conveniently hold, asks the croupiny to put down their money. This being done, he "counts off" by throwing with a peculiar whirl of his thumb and finger the cards from the upper part of those he holds, bringing the spots upward, until the numbers equal 31, or over, as may be, the first card of the first row always deciding the color. Then he commences a second row, and continues until the points equal 31 or over. If the two rows should both count 31 the money on the table must be put in the places marked (I) (which is termed being put "en prison"). If, in the following counts, the two rows should again equal 31, the winners gain (when another number appears) as many times their stake as 31 double has exceeded the sum one was put in prison. Or the player may state his preference for another color than that which he had at the time his stake was being put in prison; or he has the privilege of taking away one half his stake at the moment it is being imprisoned.

If, at the end, there are not enough cards to count 31 for both rows, the banker informs the players of the some, and at the same time the cards are again shuffled and "cut" by some one of the players, when the play is continued until the count equals exactly 31 of either row. If both rows count 40 the stakes can be withdrawn or left, but another "count" must take place, is over 40 can not be counted.

The first card of the first row always designates the color row, and money placed on (C) wins if color gained. Money placed on (D) would gain if contre-color gained. Red (or rouge) is not called a color in the banker's eye, i. e., he says either red gains and color loses, or color wins and red loses, instead of saying black and red wins or gains.

The row of cards whose numbers approach nearest 31 always gains; but if the count of the second row equals the first a new count must always be made, excepting in the case where both rows equal 31, which has been explained. The cards are used until less than the end of the Duchy of Baden.

These gaming-tables are under the direction of Monsieur Benazet, formerly of Paris; but the "Conversationshaus" is rented to a company who pay $30,000 for the season to the Government of Baden, and agree to spend $100,000 annually on the buildings and public walks and drives in Baden and its suburbs.

Although these games are always conducted fairly, any one can see that the chance is greatest for him who has the most money and most chances; and as few wish to risk an amount equal to the bank, the bank must needs be the gainer. It is from the immense number of small players that the bank is enriched and is enabled to pay such heavy rents and taxes. Therefore, if any one is inclined to play, it would be wise in him to compare the chances, and pay all his bills in advance, besides having out a ruptier to get home with, ere he finds a home in the "Prison for Debtors," or commits suicide, a wretched, heart-broken outcast.

THE GOLDEN THREAD.

CHAPTER XXI.

ECHOING FOOTSTEPS.

A WONDERFUL career for echoes, it has been remarked, that corresponds with the Doctor's

ed. Ever busily winding the golden thread which bound her husband, and her father, and herself, and her old directors and customers, in a life of quiet bliss, Lucie sat in the still house in the tranquilly resounding corner, listening to the echoing footsteps of years.

At first there were times, though she was a perfectly happy young wife, when her work would slowly fall from her hands and her eyes would be strained. For there was something coming in the echoes, something light, afar off, and scarcely audible yet, that stirred her heart too much. Fluttering hopes and doubts—hopes of a love as yet unknown to her; doubts, of her remaining upon earth to enjoy that new delight—divided her breast. Among the echoes then there would arise the sound of footsteps in her own early years; and thoughts of the husband who would be left so desolate, and who would mourn for her so much, echoed in the echoes and broke like waves.

That time passed and her little Lucie lay on her bosom. Then among the advancing echoes there was the tread of her tiny feet and the sound of her prattling words. Let greater echoes resound as they would, the young mother at the cradle side could always hear those coming. They came, and the shady house was sunny with a child's laugh, and the Divine friend of children, to whom in her trouble she had confided hers, seemed to take her child in his arms, as He took the child of old, and made it a sacred joy to her.

Ever busily winding the golden thread that bound them all together, weaving the service of her happy influence through the tissue of all their lives, and making sunlight for them to work in, Lucie heard in the echoes of years none but friendly and soothing sounds. Her husband's step was strong and vigorous among them; her father's firm and equal. Lo, Miss Pross, in harness of string, weaving household spells with a steady charger whip-accredited, snorting and pawing the earth under the plane-tree in the garden!

Even when there were sounds of sorrow among the rest they were not harsh nor cruel. Even when golden hair, like her own, fell on her lap, on a pillow round the worn face of a little boy, and he said, with a radiant smile, "Dear papa and mamma, I am very sorry to leave you both, and to leave my pretty sister; but I am called, and I must go!" those were not sounds all of agony that wetted his young mother's cheek as the spirit departed from her embrace that had been entrusted to it. Suffer them, and forbid them not. They see my Father's face. O Father, blessed word!

Thus the rattling of an Angel's wings got blended with the other echoes, and they were not wholly of earth, but had in them the promise of Heaven. Sighs of the winds that blew over it, and of the grasses that were mingled with them also, and both were audible to Lucie, in a hushed murmur—like the breathing of a summer sea asleep upon a sandy shore—as she sang to little Lucie, comically studious at the task of the morning, or dressing a doll at her mother's footstool, chattered in the tongues of the Two Cities that were blended in her life.

The echoes rarely answered to the actual tread of Sydney Carton. Some half-dozen times a year, at most, he claimed his privilege of coming in unwitted, and would sit among them through the evening as he had once done often. He never came there heated with wine. And one other thing regarding him was whispered in the echoes, which has been whispered by all true echoes for ages and ages.

No man ever really loved a woman, lost her, and knew her with a blameless though an unchanged mind, when she was a wife and mother, but her children had a strange sympathy with him—an instinctive delicacy of pity for him. What fine hidden sensibilities are touched in such a case no echoes tell; but it is so, and it was so here. Carton was the first stranger to whom little Lucie had ever shown her pretty face and he kept his place with her as she grew. The little boy had a liking almost as great as his last. "Poor Carton! Kiss him for me!"

Mr. Stryver shouldered his way through the law like some great engine forcing itself through turbid water, and dragged his useful friend in his wake, like a boat towed astern. As the boat so favored is usually in a rough plight and mostly under water, so Sydney had a swamped life of it. But easy and strong existence, superficially so much easier and stronger in him than any diminishing energy or desert or sensitive made it the life he was to lead; and he no more thought of emerging from his place than does a jackal when my real jackal may be supposed to think of rising to be a lion. Stryver was rich; had married a lady of some importance and three boys, who had nothing particularly shining about them but the straight hair of their dumpling heads.

These three young gentlemen Mr. Stryver, standing portentously before the fire with his back to it when not otherwise employed, was wont to address as "boys;" as, "Boys, you know I shall be glad to do anything for you;" delicately saying, "Halloa! here are three lumps of headache-heavy matter misplaced in the office of Darnay!" The polite rejection of the three lumps of brend-and-butter had quite blunted Mr. Stryver with indignation, which he afterward turned to account in the training of the young gentlemen, by directing them to "look at the pride of Beggars, like that tutor-fellow. He was also in the habit of declaiming to Mr. Stryver, over his full-bodied wine, on the arts Mrs. Darnay had once put in practice to "catch" him, and on the diamond-dust-dusted object he himself, madam, which had rendered him "not to be caught." Sons of his Excellency Bunch Jr. laughing, listened in the echoing corner, until her little daughter was six years old. How near to her heart those echoes lay then, when the young and those of her own dear father's, always active and self-possessed in their recollection of her husband's, need not be told. Nor how the lightest echo of their united home, directed by herself with a clear and calm hand, fell on the ear more abundant than any waste, was music to her. Not, that echo could keep those notes so sweet in her ears, of the many times her father had told her that he found her more devoted to his married life than could well be credited, and of the many times her husband had said to her that no one could be more devoted to her father for him or her help to him, and asked her, "What is the magic secret, my darling, of your being ever ready and calm, of us all?" and there only one of us, yet never seeming to be hurried, or to have too much to do?"

But there were other echoes, from a distance, that rumbled menacingly in the corner all through this space of time. And even now, about little Lucie's sixth birthday, that they become less vague and sound, as on a great storm in France with a dreadful sea rising.

On a night in mid-July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine, Mr. Lorry came in late from Tellson's, and sat himself down by Lucie and her husband in the dark window. It was a hot, wild night, and they were all three reminded of the old Sunday night when they had looked at the lightning from the same place.

"I bespeak to think," said Mr. Lorry, pushing his hands up his wig, "that I should have to pass the night at Tellson's. We have been so full of business all day that we have not known what to do first, or which way to turn. There is such an uneasiness in Paris that we have actually a run of confidence upon us! Our customers over there seem not to be able to confide their property to us fast enough. There is positively a mania among some of them for sending it to England."

"That has a bad look," said Darnay.

"A bad look, you say, my dear Darnay? Yes, but we don't know what reason there is in it. People are so unreasonable! Some of us at Tellson's are getting old, and we really can't be troubled out of the ordinary course without due occasion."

"Still," said Darnay, "you know how gloomy and threatening the sky is."

"I know that, to be sure," assented Mr. Lorry, trying to persuade himself that his sweet temper was soured, and that he grumbled, "but I am determined to be peevish after my long day's bedevilment. Where is Manette?"

"Here he is!" said the Doctor, entering the dark room at the moment.

"I am quite glad you are at home; for these hurries and forebodings by which I have been surrounded all day long have made me nervous without reason. You are not going out, I hope?"

"No; I am going to play backgammon with you, if you like," said the Doctor.

"I don't think I do like, if I may speak my mind. I am not fit to be pitted against you to-night. Is the tea-board still there, Lucie? I can't see."

"Of course, it has been kept for you."

"Thank you, my dear. The precious child is safe in bed?"

"And sleeping soundly."

"That's right; all safe and well! I don't know why any thing should be otherwise than safe and well here, thank God; but I have been so put out all day, and I am not as young as I used to be. My tea, my dear? Thank ye. Now cast and take your place in the circle, and let us sit quiet, and hear the echoes about which you have your theory."

"Not a theory; it was a fancy."

"A fancy, then, my wise pet," said Mr. Lorry, patting her hand. "They are very numerous and very low, though, are they not? Only hear them!"

Headlong, mad, and dangerous footsteps to force their way into any body's life, footsteps not easily made clean again if once stained red, the footsteps raging in Saint Antoine afar off, as the little circle sat in the dark London window.

Saint Antoine had been that morning a vast dusky mass of scarcely-human beings to and fro, with frequent gleams of light above the billowy heads, where steel blades and bayonets caught the sun. A tremendous roar arose from the throat of Saint Antoine, and a forest of naked arms struggled in the air like shrivelled branches of trees in a winter wind; all the fingers convulsively clutching at every weapon or semblance of a weapon that was thrown up from the depths below, no matter how far off.

Who gave them out, whence they last came, where they began, through what agency they crookedly quivered and jerked, scores at a time, over the heads of the crowd, like a kind of lightning, no eye in the throng could have told; but muskets were being distributed—so were cartridges, powder and ball, bars of iron and wood, knives, axes, pikes, every weapon that distracted ingenuity could discover or devise. People who could by hold of nothing else set themselves with bleeding hands to force stones and bricks out of their places in walls. Every pulse and heart in St. Antoine was on high-fever strain, and at high-fever heat. Every living creature there held life as of no account, and was demented with a passionate readiness to sacrifice it.

As in whirlpool of boiling waters has a centre point, so all this raging circled round Defarge's wine-shop, and every human drop in the caldron had a tendency to be sucked into the vortex where Defarge himself, already begrimed with smoke and sweat, issued orders, issued arms, thrust this man back, dragged this man forward, diamaned one to arm another, labored and strove in the thickest of the uproar.

"Keep near to me, Jacques Three," cried Defarge; "and do you, Jacques One and Two, separate and put yourselves at the head of as many of these patriots as you can. Where is my wife?"

"Eh, well! Here you see me!" said madame, composed as ever, but not knitting to-day. Madame's resolute right hand was occupied with an axe, in place of the usual sober implement, and in her girdle were a pistol and a cruel knife.

"Where do you go, my wife?"

"I go," said madame, "with you, at present. You shall see me at the head of women, by-and-by."

"Come then!" cried Defarge, in a resounding voice. "Patriots and friends, we are ready! The Bastile!"

With a roar that sounded as if all the breath in France had been shaped into the utterance word, the living sea rose, wave on wave, depth on depth, and overflowed the city to that point. Alarm-bells ringing, drums beating, the sea raging and thundering on its new beach, the attack began.

Deep ditches, double draw-bridge, massive stone walls, eight great towers, cannon, muskets, fire and smoke. Through the fire and through the smoke—in the fire and in the smoke, for the sea cast him up against a cannon, and on the instant he became a cannonier—Defarge of the wine-shop, single of purpose, stood firmer, Two fierce hours.

Two fierce hours, single draw-bridge, massive stone walls, eight great towers, cannon, muskets, fire and smoke. One drawbridge down! "Work, comrades all, work! Work, Jacques One, Jacques Two, Jacques One Thousand, Jacques Two Thousand, Jacques Five-and-Twenty Thousand; in the name of all the Angels or the Devils—which you prefer—work!" Thus Defarge of the wine-shop, still at his gun, which had long grown hot.

"To me, women!" cried madame his wife. "What! We can kill as well as the men when the place is taken!" And to her, with a shrill thirsty cry, trooping women variously armed, but all armed alike in hunger and revenge.

Cannon, muskets, fire and smoke; but still the deep ditch, the single draw-bridge, the massive stone walls, and the eight great towers. Slight displacements of the raging sea, made by the falling wounded. Flashing weapons, blazing torches, smoking wagon-loads of wet straw, hard work at unclogging barricades in all directions, bricks, valleys, excavations, brewery without stint, boom smash and rattle, and the furious sounding of the living sea; but still the deep ditch, and the single draw-bridge, and the massive stone walls, and the eight great towers, and still Defarge of the wine-shop at his gun, grown doubly hot by the service of Four fierce hours.

A white flag from within the fortress, and a parley—this dimly perceptible through the raging storm, nothing audible in it—suddenly the sea rose immeasurably wider and higher, and swept Defarge of the wine-shop over the lowered draw-bridge, past the massive stone outer walls, in among the eight great towers surrendered!

So resistless was the force of the ocean bearing him on, that even to draw his breath or turn his head was as impracticable as if he had been dragging in the surf of the South Sea, until he was landed in the outer court-yard of the Bastile. There, against an angle of a wall, he made a struggle to look about him. Jacques Three was nearly at his side; Madame Defarge, still heading some of her women, was visible in the inner distance, and her knife was in her hand. Every where was tumult, exultation, deafening and maniacal bewilderment, astounding noise, yet furious dumb-show.

"The Prisoners!"

"The Records!"

"The secret Cells!"

"The instruments of torture!"

"The Prisoners!"

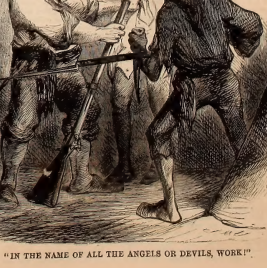
Of all these cries, and ten thousand incoherencies, "The Prisoners!" was the cry most taken up by the sea that rushed in, as if there were an eternity of people, as well as of time and space. When the foremost billows rolled past, bearing the prison officers with them, and threatening them all with instant death if any secret nook remained undisclosed, Defarge laid his strong hand on the breast of one of these men—a man with a grey head who had a lighted torch in his hand—separated him from the rest, and got him between himself and the wall. "Show me the North Tower!" said Defarge.

"Quick!"

"I will faithfully," replied the man, "if you will come with me. But there is no one there."

"What is the meaning of One Hundred and Five, North Tower?" said Defarge. "Quick!"

"The meaning, monsieur?"



"IN THE NAME OF ALL THE ANGELS OR DEVILS, WORK!"

"Does it mean a captive, or a place of captivity? Or do you mean that I shall strike you dead?"

"Kill him!" croaked Jacques Three, who had come close up.

"Monsieur, it is a cell."

"Show it me!"

"Pass this way, then."

Jacques Three, with his usual craving on him, and evidently disappointed by the dialogue taking a turn that did not seem to promise bloodshed, held by Defarge's arm as he held by the turnkey's. Their three heads had been close together during this brief discourse, and it had been as much as they could do to hear one another even now, so tremendous was the noise of the living ocean, in its irruption into the Fortress, and its inundation of the courts and passages and staircases. All around outside, too, it beat the walls with a deep, hoarse roar, from which, occasionally, some partial shouts of tumult broke and leaped into the air like spray.

Through gloomy vaults where the light of day had never shone, past hideous doors of dark deeds and groans, down precipitous flights of steps, and again up steep rugged ascents of stone and brick, more like dry waterfalls than staircases, Defarge, the turnkey, and Jacques Three, linked hand and arm, went with all the speed they could make. Here and there, especially at first, the inundation started on them and swept by; but when they had gone below ground, and were winding and climbing up a tower, they were alone. Hemmed in here by the massive thickness of wall and arch against the storm within the fortress and without was only audible to them in a dull, subdued way, like the noise out of which they had come but an hour destroyed their sense of hearing.

The turnkey stopped at a low door, put a key in a clashing lock, swung the door slowly open, and said, as they all bent their heads and passed in:

"One hundred and five, North Tower!"

There was a small, heavily-grated, unglazed window high in the wall, with a stone seat before it, so that the view could be seen only by stooping low and looking up. There was no other means of admission from the world into the cell, no bed, no stool, and no table, of which they had seen so many, and which they had come but an hour destroyed their sense of hearing.

cent yesterday with a pinch of snuff from this celebrated box—albeit 'we have no small vices.' It is a magnificent piece, of solid gold, and inscribed on the lid, in plain script, in the following:

"To the members of the Mayor, Aldermen, and Commonalty, of the City of New-York, to Major-General Andrew Jackson, with high military services, as a testimony of respect for his high military services."

We recommend that an appropriate inscription, indicating the entertainment under which it is transferred to Major Barnet, should be made on the reverse side.

RECORD WEDDING IN JAIL.

We read in the Detroit Free Press: "A young negro couple made her appearance at the jail on Sunday afternoon and requested that the Rev. Mr. Duncan should perform all the finery she could muster, having got herself up for the occasion in a white muslin dress, with a veil and orange blossoms, and a bouquet, and, to fill in the time before the happy event, the ceremony would have been performed in the middle of the day, the bride made her debut in the most fashion of tragedies. The Sheriff was there in the most extreme respectfulness, and the Rev. Mr. Duncan, big with anticipation at the prospect of so happy a termination to the troubles of one of his unfortunate flock, was all stood up and were married by Justice Purdy, and, the ceremony over, the bride and bridegroom were locked up and fellow a smack that savored of earnestness fully expressed. The bride might be said to be the picture of happiness, and darkey was put back for the night, to be sent to the House of Correction in the morning, there to undergo a sentence for a petit larceny. She will be released in a few days, and then the bridegroom will be released, and so it is good end for very long, so let it. Now I hope ye knows. The affair created a deep sensation, and no attention to the dry jokes cracked among his cronies on the inside of the bars."

THE GREATEST MAN AT NIAGARA.

The Rochester Democrat and Union of Sunday, August 28, contains an account of a visit to the Falls of Niagara, which was made by a party of gentlemen from Rochester. The party included a gentleman from Cattaraugus County who addressing the assembled company in a speech expressive of reverence for God and obedience to the Supreme will, in the course of his remarks said that he was the only connect between God and the children's highest kind of gentlemen on earth, for he had a brother-in-law who for little ones before him who was the greatest man at Niagara Falls—the man most entitled to the highest consideration in his astonishment and chagrin, a dozen youthful voices responded, simultaneously, in the entire concert, 'Blondin!' 'Blondin!'

BLOOD OUTDONE.

The Rochester Union has the following: "A couple of Brockport boys—aged about ten years—met on the river last year, best practising on the tight rope for the amusement of the people of that village. They met on the canal across from the American to the tavern on the towing path, and before they separated, each one told that they start at the same time, one from each end of the rope, and neither of them stopped to look, nor once twenty feet above it, they pass—the seeing himself and the other stopping to look, and the other. The young men have made no engagement to go to Watertown, but expect to meet there, and if they do not, the latter is most thoroughly disappointed, and will not be satisfied all over. No Frenchman can introduce any thing here as the study of a lifetime, but these Yankee boys can compete with him successfully in sixty days."

A LIVING HEAD OF A DEAD BODY.

The Newburgh Index gives the following account of a remarkable specimen of a respectable farmer in that neighborhood, who was known as Deacon Smith:

"Mr. Archibald Campbell, a respectable farmer in the township of Cornwall, Orange county, while engaged in the saw dwelling on his premises, the scaffold gave way, and he was precipitated, head foremost, to the ground, and struck his neck, but very fortunately and superficially. He was taken up for dead, but on examination by a proper physician, the vertebrae of the neck were found in its proper place with a dull but distinct snap. The whole body is paralyzed and only the head has any sensation left. He is not capable of moving a muscle or experiencing the slightest pain. Physicians have pronounced that the muscles used in respiration were not paralyzed, and he can breathe and live. The doctors say that he cannot live more a little higher, he would have died immediately. The sense of sight, hearing, smelling, etc., are normal, and his intellect unimpaired."

PERSONAL.

We learn that Mr. Alfred Tennyson contemplates a tour in the United States the coming autumn.

The Milwaukee Sentinel announces that one of its artists was invited and was at the Falls of St. Anthony to record, Corporation Counsel of the City of New York.

A correspondent of the Boston Post writes to them from Concisna, July 25, says that "State Senator Martin accidentally shot himself in the thumb while in the act of caring for re-election, and, having to ride after night, turned a horse-power planing mill, and by the whirling animal took right, and, by some unaccountable mistake, the planer shaved off the whole upper part of his body. Several shots being detained in his cranial, others in his lungs, and the rest in his stomach. He will be dangerously wounded for a few days, but, as for life, he is rapidly recovering. To-day he is out perusing his interest on a contract of land which he sold to Mr. Schuyler."

A late commercial of a Canada paper, M. Blouin will make a speech in favor of the Prince of Wales on his tour, when he announces his intention of appearing in the shortest of kilts, and the longest of stockings to match it. He will also, when canvassing, carry with him a fiery and rousing whisky, and the first man who kicks up a fuss will cook mutton for the passengers of the Mont d'Or for a week. Richmond Hill will be the first to hear from his last exhibition at Niagara, and that to his pecuniary benefit, for he has made a very considerable sum of money.

A little paper called the Spy, at Cleveland, Ohio, is edited by a young lady, and is very successful, although it is chiefly into the affairs of a young gentleman of that city that he devotes most of his attention. Last week he published her fairness and prizing-gross in this, throwing the latter out of the paper.

A letter from La Crosse, Wisconsin, August 19, says: "Yesterday, William Gates was found in the woods near here to death while out in Mormon Cooley, some fourteen miles from town, with a brother-in-law, treating. Words were passed between them about their right to take the lead in the dance, when they came to blows, which resulted as above. No serious father, his sons, and two daughters are left to mourn his untimely end. Settlement proceeds in town. Mr. D. was at the head of the law profession, partner of the present Mayor, and much respected by the community. The deceased was formerly of Preedon, Potique County, Ohio."

The Hon. Henry Wilson has accepted an invitation to deliver a eulogy at Natick upon the late Hon. Horace Mann.

Colonel Fremont, says the Mariposa Gazette, "is at last, to some extent, out of trouble, as we are happy to know. He has settled his principal matters of difficulty, and is out of the hands of the Sheriff and Court Receiver and Legislature. He has means to go on with his business, and has the grave objections of those interested to his proceedings in a fair way to be removed. The new running are yielding very handsomely, so we are informed."

A New York correspondent of the Baltimore Clipper writes: "A Democratic Senator, who is said to be Honorable Beverly Johnson. He informs me that, in the course of a few days, he will go to Utah, to see if he can draw blood taken out. Some years ago, while visiting Utah, Mr. Johnson was shot in the back, and the ball has struck a tree, and glancing into his eye, destroyed the sight. The surgeons have endeavored to get the ball out of the eye, but without success, and no surgeon will operate save at the request of Patti skill."

The Rev. Mr. Hall, of the Episcopal church, a few miles from Herkimer, says the Milwaukee News, is a sign-board, on which is painted a variety of texts and doctrines. On it the texts may read: "As both of us are a—d—d poor, and you can't get any more."

The Chicago Journal says that "Mr. Louis Schade, who is a resident of Chicago, is a great swell in New York as expounder of Democracy to his countrymen. The Democratic Committee of that city have made him a Committee of Arrangements, and he has Attorney-General of Iowa; that the duties of the office are not arduous, and he has been to have no trouble in getting a clerkship appointed Minister to Berlin, and revisit in triumph the scenes of his youth."

Among the visitors to the White Springs, Virginia, are Mr. Secretary Floyd, Governor Morgan, Governor Wise, Senator Mensing of South Carolina, Professor Bledsoe, Judge Perkins, Governor Johnson of Georgia, Judge Harvey, and Mrs. Gwin, the wife of the Senator from California, who, it is understood, is quite dangerously ill.

The correspondent of the Freeman's "Walking Gentleman" writes: "Mr. Lester Wallack is a man of the world block, and within the space of five minutes, that gentleman exchanged the following remarks with a gentleman looking General Pace; the sanguinary Zouave, Captain Rice, Governor Morgan, Mr. Secretary Floyd, Governor Wise, and that graceful and felicitous person, Signor Brignoli." They say a man is known by the company he keeps. Ta-ra-ra.

At the Galveston Theatre, with more honesty than politeness, Mr. Wallack announced the receipts of the night "Julia, by Mrs. Henry, her first appearance since her confinement."

A Washington correspondent reports that the Secretary of the Interior has ordered the Indian Agent to Utah, Colonel Forney, to discharge all the Mormons in his employ, and it is lamentable to observe how numerous they are among public officials throughout Utah. Let them deal with them are numerous. The bald pates that he has seen in Utah would make a fortune in wigs among the Sioux."

Yankee schoolmaster, named Comstock, turned a drove of cattle into the corn-field of a farmer in Dutchess County, New-York, recently. Damages have been awarded in the family, and away with the farmer's daughter, and Comstock's heart.

THE AMPHITHEATRE.

THE WARD.

A CADET HOP AT WEST POINT.

WE engrave herewith a Cadet Hop at West Point—a scene familiar to the happy people who spend summer days at Cozzens's at West Point.

During the summer—that is to say, from 17th June to 29th August of each year—West Point camps out and learns its trade. The boys are taught to sleep under the canopy of heaven, to dispense with all the luxuries and comforts of civilization, and to accustom themselves to the privations of actual warfare. The strictness of West Point discipline has long been proverbial; during "the encampment" it is never indeed.

Happily the rigors of military etiquette are mitigated thrice a week by balls or hops, which are given by the cadets to their friends and the guests at Cozzens's and elsewhere in the neighborhood. These gay parties are justly famed among the fair SEX; for letter or more indefatigable dancers than the cadets are not to be found even in New York. Pretty girls who go to West Point to spend a few days in the bracing air, and enjoy the lovely Hudson scenery, invariably declare that they never enjoyed any ball in their life so much as the Cadet Hop.

The following gentlemen are the managers of the hops, and to them our artist desires to return thanks for the attention paid him on his professional visit:

THE NEW ORLEANS CHARITY HOSPITAL.

THE city of New Orleans claims a proud preeminence in her benevolent institutions, and in none is she more honorably represented than in the noble hospital which we have the pleasure of engraving herewith.

The New Orleans Charity Hospital is one of the most celebrated institutions of its kind in the United States. Not only so, but in the liberality of its support, the commodiousness of its buildings, the systematic excellency of its curative arrangements, the number of its beneficiaries, the superior skill of its attending physicians, the admirable neatness of its domestic appliances, and the impartial catholicity of its administration, it will compare favorably with the oldest and more renowned establishments of England and the Continent.

The hospital is located on Common Street, immediately contiguous to the medical colleges of the city. This statement will indicate the superior facilities enjoyed by these institutions for affording to their pupils daily the most interesting practical exemplifications of the theoretical teachings of the lecture room. Nor is it amiss to say, that whether regard be had to the ability of the Professors or to the admirable advantages offered to the pupil, there is no better place in this country than New Orleans for young men who are studying to enter the Medical profession.

The external aspect of the hospital is rather imposing. Entering by the main door-way, and looking to the right, your eye at once rests upon a neat marble tablet, embedded in the wall, bearing the following legend:

THE CHARITY HOSPITAL OF NEW ORLEANS WAS FOUNDED IN THE YEAR MDCCLXXXVI BY

humanity. Here are the sick wards, constantly crowded with patients of every age and sex, of every color, from the blue-eyed, fair-browed Anglo-American to the tawny, sun-browned child of the Tropics, speaking every language from the liquid lapse of the vowely Italian tongue to the guttural harshness of the Celtonic empire. Here you will find every type of disease and every gradation of bodily injury, from a simple cold to the malignant vomito, and from the sprained ankle to the most compound communicated fracture of the high-bone. Not less than four hundred diseases are mustered on their catalogue, each of which has its several representatives—diseases whose formidable investiture of symptoms generally wears some of the ghastliest lividity of an undulged Ocean, and whose unimagined pangs cause little short of the foiled torments of damned ghosts beyond the River Petrichgodzon in the Grenzin Ocean.

At the period of our visit to New Orleans, the house-surgeon, resident at the hospital, were Drs. Foute and Bickham, two gentlemen who, for the thoroughness of their training, the liberality of their views, and the urbanity of their manners, are worthy representatives of the highest profession. Availing ourselves of their courteous invitation, we were shown through the various departments. To our unaccustomed eyes the visit presented much that was thrillingly interesting. Sights of suffering and distress which we had heretofore labled to impress sinister hearts than ours. In this ward lay a victim of unspeakable pain, on the next stretch with his mouth shockingly torn to pieces by a gun-shot wound inflicted by his own desperate hand. Not far off groaned another wretched creature, his throat horribly mangled. Instruments, a razor, a pistol, his Dominicker played blind fool. Walking through the passages, we could hear, on one hand, the labored breathing that announced the lamenting stupor of approaching death; on the other, the pitiful, shrill cry of lemonet physical anguish. Here lay an Irish drayman stretched upon his bed, while the bristling array of splints, and cords, and bandages, and pulleys, suggested the ingenious ferocity of torture under the patronizing sanctities of the good St. Dominic of the tortures of Francis. In this ward lay the unfortunate Spanish Don, nursing the festering stump of a leg whose foot was just then gracing the private museum of some medical professor. Not a stone's-throw apart you might find the flushed face of the child of fever, the pallid face, and the pallid face and lack-lustre eye of the pot consumptive, dirty, decrepit, weary, and friendless. While all abroad to the sensitive mental cans the nauseous fetor of the sick-room, despite the ventilative cleanliness of the establishment—such a smell as one might smell in the hateful of a three-months-dead dog in dog-days, or lingering among the smoldering tombs of an old cemetery, or stealing up through the paved aisles of some ancient abbey.

Amidst these scenes of human suffering there is one sight that redeems the dark catalogue of human ture. Moving noiselessly along the corridors, gliding softly around the couches of the suffering inmates, ministering to the constant wants of these unfortunate creatures, are to be found the devoted Sisters of Charity, under whose charge is placed the domestic arrangements of the institution. Day and night these faithful attendants, like visitant angels, watch by the bedside of the sick and the dying; now hearing the moulded blasphemies of heathenish men, now kneeling on the cold floor in low listening to the incoherent ravings of men wlirled on in the wild frenzies of a mad delirium, soon reading the fevered text, sometimes the restless agony of the passing spirit, receiving the last messages of affection, the lips trom a the dying, and death—words of love sent back from the threshold of the tomb—back over years of suffering, and sorrow, and loneliness, and shame, to the home-circle for the first time, to the unforgotten and heretofore treasured friend of youth's innocence and early joy. In this ceaseless routine of unostentatious charity these sisters are unknown women pursue their daily lives of self-denying, self-sacrificing accomplishment beyond the merest subsistence. Except thing alone which they demand from the world their unbegging care: the well-cleaned floor, neatly-made bed, the fresh, well-aired bed-clothing, the simple furniture, in the best of order, the naturally preservation; the careful preparation of the allotted food, the careful enforcement of medical directions—all testify to the singular fidelity of these consecrated hands to their duty.

One of the most notable parts of the establishment in the Dead House, into which at night are carried the still cold, ghastly, inanimate corpses of those Charity patients who die during the day. Could the unfortunate wretches who are dragged in hither during the year start up at the call of some potent incantation, a pallid host would they be, more terrible in their grim silence than array with banners. Here they lie, rotting with syphilitic and blackish ulcers, eaten by gangrenous sores, and fetid with disgusting ulcers; locked in the awful rigidity of tetanic spasms, or limp in the strong contortions of an easy sleep, misshapen with ugly tumors, and distorted by the sharp pangs of rheumatic disorders. Here one may look in upon them, by the sickly glare of the early gas-light, lying together, from the boarders boy to the man of old—"took-aged people," as Dickens has blear-eyed. As we walked through this dismal charnel-house, accompanied by the polite and very accomplished clerk, Dr. ——, of the University of Louisiana, imagine our horror to see him seize an idle brush, and, with artistic twirl, slap a crimson mark upon the bare breast of a lately expired wretch, exclaiming, with the gusto of a connoisseur in dead flesh, "This is mine!" Our friend, you should know, is one of the anatomical demonstrators in the University; and from these dead bodies it is that they select their subjects for dissection. Not less than 150 are sawed and slashed up in his medical school in one season—so he told us.

We send you a sketch of the Amphitheatre, where, on each Wednesday, the professors of the medical schools hold their clinigues. One of the most exciting spectacles to be witnessed in the institution is seen when fifty or a hundred students crowd the couch of some patient who is about to undergo an important surgical operation. The trembling expectancy of the terrified subject; the nervous pallor of medical tyros, who are about to see a man leg or arm wrenched off for the time; the careless nonchalance of the hospital practicer; the gleam of that watery steam of the knife, Dr. Stone, as, with cuffs thrown back, eye all shines, and lips firmly clinched, he prepares to make the deftest incision, the most unerring stroke of the well-graced blade; the sudden flash of polished steel, the dull, muffled sound of the falling flesh, the spirt of the blood, the scrape of the keen edge upon the solid bone, the sharp cry of the patient, followed by the heavy moan of pain—these are the outlines of a picture that thrills and terrifies the uninitiated spectator.

Under the liberal management of the Board, the Charity is looked upon as a model institution. About twenty physicians attend upon the wards, besides twelve resident students, annually elected and supported by the Board, who have every facility in courteously afforded for testing new discoveries, either in medicine or in the various branches of chemistry and physiology. At the time of our visit Professor John Dunty, of Alabama, was introducing his new chemical discovery, the anesthetic of the house-surgeons, as a deodorizer and disinfectant; and the friend of Dr. Dunty, a very scientific agent in the surgical wards. The Professor also exhibited his manscenter, for detecting the presence of organic impurities in the atmosphere. From the hospitable recognition with which these discoveries were received, we should infer that the opinion of the catholic spirit of the institution, as well as of the value of the results which were predicted out of the scientific labors of the conservatory.

We close this long article by appending the following statistics of the Charity, to show that the Charity Hospital is a grand establishment:

"The admission of patients during the year were 11,—of over thirty-six thousand. The average yearly Of this number 9750 were males, and 2292 females. The number discharged during the year was 10,042. The deaths were 2250. The Picayune says that, of these admitted, 1751 were born in the United States, and 1600 in foreign countries. The deaths were males and fifty-three females were born in the hospital; eighteen were colored.

"During the epidemic of the past summer 2770 yellow fever patients were admitted: 1331 were discharged, and 1302 died of the fever.

The 'Howard Association,' we may here add, is a New Orleans institution for the relief and assistance, in cases of epidemic. If the experience of some of its members could be published, they would, by the details of their labors, throw into the shade the imaginary stories of the "Diary of a Physician Upon Yellow Fever." The rules of the early members of this Association has now in press to be published in a few weeks, a volume of extracts from which we have had the honor of the author and his labors, we are sure that his work can not fail to be of great interest and value."

EPHRAIM DENVER'S WARD.

For the sole purpose of being emphatic, I shall say the day was hot—confoundedly hot—as hot as a July sun could make it.

But then it must be known that I had gone to the country on a vacation of two weeks, and it was my first experience in short linen. I had come to make the most of it. It was not my way of doing things, to waste an hour, or without being able to show an indenser, in the shape of a fishing-rod or face, for a two weeks' trip in the country.

I tell this to apologize for having, on the full glare of a July day, making my way along the road, and through the village, in the hope of coming I can offer in extenuation being the fact that I had invested half a dime in the purchase of a palm-leaf fan, somewhere on my journey. For this information the salesman, that the day was very hot.

Under the circumstances, I trudged up the road, a road guiltless of shade. Is it to be wondered therefore, that when I came to the toll-gate a little beyond the village, I should be glad and look wistfully up at the great black-board cherries that hung up over the toll-keeper's window, and that at this moment there came a voice as it were out of space, saying to me,

"Sayin', I'd offer you some of those cherries if I knew how to get 'em off the trees. I'm a little too old for them sort of work—not exactly built for like to climb, you're welcome to help yourself."

The voice came from behind me, and I turned quickly about. I felt that I was committing some good and cheery is its tones. There stood a comely looking man, apparently about forty years of age, and well enhanced by the heat; a stalwart air was with him that spoke plainly of an easy life, and a disposition for nothing; a pleasant countenance bearing that said very plainly how much he felt the heat, and how entirely satisfied he was that it was that his physical size was only a natural accompaniment to his important position.

"Ephraim Denver, at your service," said he, bowing toward me, and looking in an unmistakable way for which said gesture. "Ephraim Denver, and is yours!" I am not disposed to wear or assume any.

Upon such an occasion I held the truth to be self-evident, that the simplicity on the part of any as to your name, business, or general antecedents, argues that you have considerable interest in you, and in that light is highly complimentary. Acting under this belief, I informed Ephraim Denver of my name, in return for his. As the public has not shown equal curiosity, I will retain that communication. On this prompt response, which met an apparent glow of satisfaction over the face of Ephraim Denver, he made a step or two backward, and invited me to walk in and be seated, following up the invitation with a repetition of his fan merchant's assertion, that it was a very hot day, which assertion I was unable to deny. The toll-house had a cool, clean, wholesome look, quiet to a fault; the buzzing of a few flies, and the humming of a few bees about the rose bed under the open window, and nodded into the room, was the only sound. I looked about the ancient, well-kept room, with an ill-disguised air of admiration. The leathern covered chairs, the wide-mouthed fire-place, the fancy woven rag carpet, the quaint old china sitting upon the mantle-shelf, and, strangest of all, suitable all over the room, the tall, old-fashioned wood clock, not an ancient, spindle-legged instrument to correspond, but a large, substantial, well-carved, rosewood one, that told its story of modern thrift, and seemed as much out of place as an exclusive bonnet would be in the midst of a fair, where to assume a spade or a hoe among the tillers of the soil. I looked curiously at the clock, and more so from the fact that Ephraim Denver had almost identical with my entering into the room informed me of its antiquity. "Been in this place cool, and sunny little toll-house he resided with me, too," He also informed me that Mrs. Ephraim Denver—and here he had lived all his life, and his father before him,—considered this as I looked at the old-fashioned piano, and wondered what Mrs. Ephraim Denver must be like, to be at once the wife of such a man, and the owner of such a piano-forte, and the player upon the gorgeous instrument before me.

I did not long to wait to have this curiosity satisfied, by the appearance of the lady herself, who came from a room, with the air of one emerging about her of having overheard a strange voice, and no special desire to conceal her wish to know more of it. She was a little, fair-complexioned, goodhaired woman, wearing spectacles, under which she looked at me with a quick, inquiring glance, away with a perpetual click, upon a gray woolen stocking, and spanking in a soft dory way. There was a look about her that said "Ephraim Denver—sir, as her husband introduced her, "Aunt Lucie Ephraim," and at once made me conscious of the possibility of her being the performer on the rosewood piano.

I was drinking a mug of cider with Ephraim Denver, and flattered myself that I had advanced my self into his confidence, when I saw a carriage come, of which I soon found Uncle Ephraim possessed a goodly stock. Under this good opinion, I felt that I was perfectly warranted, I thought, to ask the question,

"How do you happen to have that piano here?"

Uncle Ephraim looked uncommonly solemn for a moment. He gazed earnestly at the piano, then at me, and drew a long breath.

"My ward," said Uncle Ephraim, laconically.

"Your ward!" I echoed, not quite knowing to me. I thought of the 17th Ward, of which I am one of the respected dwellers. I thought of a hobby-horse with a wooden, and of course perfectly equally prepossess things, none of which seemed to me a satisfaction, as explanatory of Uncle Ephraim. Under this conclusion it was, after a few moments' pause, that I repeated his words, in the tone of inquiry:

"Your ward?"

Uncle Ephraim and Uncle Ephraim, with a smile breaking all over his face, and a glance at Aunt Sally Denver. "I and the old woman call her so sometimes. Sayin', Dr. Ken't know as it means; but there's no doubt it's all right."

"Ephraim Denver I should say so;" and still I remained entirely in the dark, perhaps would so have remained to the present day, had it not been for the kind assistance of Aunt Sally Denver, who came to the rescue with,

"Sayin' Ephraim's guardeen to a gal that lived with us a year ago last May. We both took to her wonderfully, and were mighty sorry to part with her. Sayin' Aunt Sally Denver said it bitterly that trickled into the corner of her eye.

"Yes," said Ephraim, "as you've made in Uncle Ephraim, 'tis always affected on that subject." I could not help seeing that his own eyes had a wet look about them. "Never did know a child better to our own," and then, turning to Aunt Sally Denver, he took her disengaged hand, and, as though relinquishing a privilege, said,

"Aunt Sally, tell the young man about her."

"No," said Aunt Sally, "you tell him."

"Well," said Uncle Ephraim, as though he had forgotten the fact of his offer, and was unconsciously fully prepared, "there's some very strange things happen in this world."

Here the original assoveration I gave an immediate assent.

"Well," he said, taking a fresh mug of cider and a new start, "it is about three year come next twelfth of August, when I was sitting in that door looking out on the road, and thinking something about the want of rain, and the general effect on things, when I noticed, coming along the road, a nice-looking, neatly-dressed girl" (I think Uncle Ephraim had a way of saying "gal," but I consider it no liberty to correct the grammatical slips as well as many other particulars), "who, naturally, stopped at the door as you did just now, to ask a question about her dress, and an unassuming way she had with her. Well, I told her the way to the road, there was no pushing of it out on every occasion to make commonor folks feel cut up about it.

"Well, she stopped under the porch, and, as a natural consequence, I asked her to sit down. She sat down accordingly, and after a minute I said to her, Would she have a mug of cider? for which she thanked me. So, then I offered her a little water fresh out of the north corner of the well; to this she said, Yes, and as I handed it to her I took the opportunity to mention that my name was Ephraim Denver; but she only looked at me in a sad kind of a way, and said, 'Thank you.' It was very prettily said, however; and then, as soon as she had drank the water, she got right up, and, with another 'Thank you,' went away down the road, looked after her as long as I could, and then I went in to think on it. Aunt Sally Denver and I talked more that day about the little lady in the one, colored dress than ever I talked about any thing else before or since, I reckon."

Aunt Sally Denver nodded a strong assent, and wiped her spectacles with much emphasis.

"After this I noticed the young lady in the coarse-colored dress passing through the gate three times a week, coming from the village, and looking to it in about two hours. One day Colonel Dan Davis rode up to the door. Aunt Sally of spit, when she should come by but the young lady in the coarse-colored dress, looking very shiny and weather-beaten by body, and what he didn't be made to answer I know; therefore I asked him, as he stripped through water and sat down in the stalls of the door.

"Well, it came out from the Colonel that she was a young lady from the city, living in the village about a month before; that she had taken a place at old Peter Parker's, and was now looking out for music scholars to come without any success. So far, she had only two—one in the village, and one who came from the country, a week through my gate. The Colonel guessed she was a widow, well off, and the Colonel hadn't heard her name as I recollect. I laughed all this in my mind, and didn't exactly see how my inquiries were going to help any good. I thought the old woman was past the days of taking music lessons; and I didn't go much around I couldn't well drum up scholars for her. Well, I thought about it myself, the lady every day as she came through, and the more I looked at her, the more I liked her, and the more I kept thinking how I could do her some good. 'Where there's a will there's a way,' is the saying, and I guess I had my will right for this the old woman had got to see her many times by coming and going under my gate, she got about a crazy on the subject as I was myself.

"And so the thing went on for a long time, may be a month; and then I got the old woman to buy a bit of talk with my little lady, and see if there was not some way in which I could help her, though look her face always wore. I had come to the conclusion, any how, of stopping her on the next morning, as she came down at the usual time; and then one back, and she did stop. We were both on the lookout for her, and it would have been hard for her to have got by without our seeing her. In she came accordingly; and the old woman, in her pseudo-gentlegig way, soon had her bonnet off and a fan in her hand, while this time she didn't refuse the cider I offered, with the drops of perspiration starting out on the top the same as it does to-day. She drank a little from the mug, and then, looking at me, said,

"Mr. Ephraim Downer, I presume?"

"Call me Uncle Ephraim, my child," I said, interrupting her.

"Uncle Ephraim,' she began again, in a kind of tremulous voice, 'my name is Ella Ives. I am a widow.' And here she began to cry and take on a good hearty dinner that day—much heavier than she ever ate up to old Mrs. Turney's, who duly took her for what she could make by her board. My idea is that if you expect people to eat heavy you must eat very lightly yourself, or else appear to mind them too much.

"I think Ella enjoyed herself some that afternoon. I know that Aunt Sally Downer and I did. The old woman and the little music-teacher got away into another room, and I think they had their own some patch-work, for an hour or two, and then when they came back they were both red, and had staid to dinner to oblige Aunt Sally Downer she must stay to tea for me. There was a good deal of excuse, but I didn't take any of it, and I staid, and went home as the sun went down, looking, as I thought, much handsomer than I ever did about our quiet house that was very pleasant, and I entered into it with all my heart and soul.

"Two days after came Sunday, and I left Aunt Sally Downer to settle every thing. They were very thinking ever since Sunday night, or ever an hour, and when they came back I saw that both had been crying. So I just asked if all was right, and she did not answer me, but only gave her a good hearty kiss, and another to the little woman, and left me to settle it all. I must have fanced about the room, heavy as I was.

"In a very few days Ella—our Ella now—came to make the toll-house her home. She was not mistaken in our first fancy, for she was the nicest, neatest little lady that ever lived. She would insist upon taking many of the house duties off Aunt Sally Downer's hands; and there was no mistake about her keeping her daughter out of one. It made a sunshine in our old house it had never known before, when she flew round after her mother's boys and girls were children, and would come trooping down here every Saturday to make belief in the old home. The babies and boys are all dead now, or gone away to distant parts, growing perhaps to be old men and women themselves.

Uncle Ephraim stopped, and screwed the back of his hand across his eyes.

"And Ella?" I said.

"Ah! dear me," he resumed, "I'm afraid I am getting prosy, when I should only have begun to tell my story yet. Well, Ella went on getting happier every day; the bloom coming back to her cheek and the smile to her lips, and the music to her heart over her part. We knew that when she was ready she would tell all she wanted us to know, and sure enough she did.

"Our little Ella had been brought up to believe herself rich, and to trust every thing that money could bring. She was an only child, and a reputed heiress, and, of course, had plenty of admirers. Among these was Harvey Oakes; and Ella loved him very much—how much her action will tell. Harvey was a young lawyer, in partnership with his brother, and the firm of Harvey & Walter Oakes stood well in town. Walter was the firm stood in business, still higher stood Harvey Oakes socially; his presence was sought for every where, and his society was thought a proof of a success. Well, every body said, when it was known that Ella was engaged to Harvey Oakes that it was a fine thing for her; but I think that if he had been a king upon his throne Ella was good enough for him. Her engagement was such, they were to be married in the spring, for then Ella would be eighteen; but just one month before the time set for the marriage, almost in the height of the preparation, there was a rush, and a whirl, and some screaming, and hurrying to and fro, and forward in her stately home, and in a few minutes it was announced that Harvey Oakes, of the firm merchant, the father of Ella, was dead—stricken down in a moment, in his own grandly furnished parlors, with apoplexy—and before the next day on which the marriages would have taken place, had broken Howard Ives, the poor girl knew that she not her mother were penniless; that her father had died bankrupt, and every penny-worth of property he had would not pay his debts.

"It was then that Harvey came out for a noble fellow, as he was. He at once announced that he bought Ella for herself, and yielded reluctantly to the delay for which she begged on account of her father's death. Ah! you should have heard Ella tell this, the dear little thing, crying all the while. He seemed to think it more necessary that the marriage should go on—now that she was without a father's protection, she needed a husband's. And I don't think he was far from right. However, neither Ella nor her mother yielded to him, and the marriage was put off for six months. Was it ever known that misfortunes fall singly? The prophets says not; and our poor little Ella was to have another instance. Scarcely three months after the death of her father, Ella was stricken with a brain fever, while the firm of Harvey & Walter Oakes was in the dust; Walter a fugitive from justice, and Harvey in prison, charged with forgery, with a vast amount of illegitimate and forged obligations hanging over him.

"When Ella was conscious again, they told her all that had transpired since the first shock came. Harvey Oakes had got away, and was to be involved, to South America. How Harvey was still in prison, and how the trial was to come on, if his graceful punishment but full payment, which would keep the creditors from criminally prosecuting him, and which was the surrendering of every thing he had already taken possession of every thing, and to his last shirt and watch, they must keep. They are sure our Ella was not the one to sit down despondingly. She who could shut the gate before the nose of the grumpy baron and the grumpier, in the quiet when there was any thing to be done for that man—glory of angels! she had been instrumental herself of how matters stood, and what amount would release him; but it was so far beyond all that Ella became the surrendered and helpless victim of aiding him.

"Among the suitors of the olden time who came to Ella when Joshua Howard was the rich merchant, and Ella the heiress, was Robert Hilton Ives. He was the only one who ever would look on a discarded suitor; who knew him as a proud haughty man of ability, and who was undoubtedly a wealthy himself to have sought her, irregardless of her own. He was not young, and had not a face to be called seeking—rather the contrary. He fancied Ella, thought she would make an excellent wife—perhaps, as Ella knew, had come down for a bid for her, was refused, and withdrew very respectfully with a sound heart, telling her that if ever she needed a friend in need, to call upon and to him. It was to this man Ella went in her great misfortune. He was the only one to whom her desires, and treating it as a mere matter of business, bade her return home, and at a certain hour he would call on her, and she would have his full answer as to what could be done. A gleam of hope immediately flashed into the young girl's cold, heartless man of money. Hope for the false lover, but none for herself. The next day, at the hour appointed, Robert Hilton Ives called. What He had looked, he said, closely into the affairs of Harvey & Walter Oakes, and could assure her that terms Mr. Oakes could obtain his liberty. They were, the payment of his liabilities, and a pledge that he never return the country. The liabilities of these would require nearly fifty thousand dollars, and the amount of the conditions Mr. Ives could refused to subscribe to any terms whatever; and then Mr. Robert Ives, looking Ella full in the face, said,

"Should to obtain his liberty, is it your intention, Miss Howard, to marry him?'

"There was not a moment's hesitation about Ella's answer. She knew that for her liberty Harvey Oakes would be free, and that all of the man who stood before her; and well she knew that he would not accept the offer of her hand if she believed would allow her to join him in the fate man who was held by all as coverest with guilt. To all this Howard—to the man that Ella answered, promptly:

"'No; I will not marry him.'

"Then, Miss Howard, I will consent to pay Harvey Oakes's debts, and obtain his freedom on one condition.'

"A shiver ran over Ella as he spoke the word; she knew well what was coming, and that the only way she had determined to do all things, even though it were a surrender of life. She therefore said that he might name his condition.

"The condition, Miss Howard, is your hand. The great lawyer will not consent to marry Harvey Oakes shall be your settlement, for which I expect you to assign your power-of-right, leaving your property in your own hands, subject to my will.

"Now wasn't that a beautiful cold-blooded proposition? You may well shudder, Ephraim. Ah! and oh! that poor, little, friendless, loving thing, who, to save the man she loved, accepted the offer of a man she hated, and had no requital save in her own dear beautiful heart. Yes! she married him, and Harvey Oakes was released from prison without knowing the hand that did it. He was liberated to come before the whitewash of the law, and to clear, and curse her; to tear from his heart, where it had lain during all his peril, her sainted image, and cast it from him as a broken, the marble floor; to be removed by force; and for many months to be a helpless maniac. Ah! you poor women that go mad for love, though Mr. Shakspeare does say that men don't die from that complaint.

"All this came wonderful hard to poor Ella, but she lived—though I don't think she ever knew her self-sacrifice. For the year she was a wife—a quiet, obedient wife—and in all things that wealth and position could give her husband, Robert Hilton Ives was satisfied with his bargain; he had bought her, and he was entitled to agreement for her, and did not expect it.

"One day Mr. Robert Hilton Ives had business that called him to a distant city. The next, a telegraphic dispatch informed Ella that she was a widow, her husband having been killed by a railroad accident, with many others. In one week the body of Mr. Robert Hilton Ives was laid in the family vault, and his widow was informed that, he having died without a will, the heirs—whom she was never seen, and who were unknown to her—to the man whose wealth they sought—wished her to seek some other residence at her earliest convenience.

"Poor Ella, a widow at twenty, found herself suddenly turned from her home, without friends, money, or hope. There was one last step to come yet. Her mother, to whom Ella had always looked for advice and guidance, sank under the weight of her calamity, and the month that made Ella a widow saw her also an orphan. This was the white robin who came to the village to seek some stranger the sympathy that had been denied her among those who had known her from childhood. This was our little music-teacher; she who had been chastened by every sorrow, and cast down from the highest, to be left alone to toil for a poor pittances that she might bind bread. And oh, how hard she labored when we had found her, and got there safely in the snug home that had been given us!

"And so, Sir, d'ye see, that's the way we come to have the piano. The Lord has blessed me with plenty, and the price of that piece there is but little much. It wouldn't have hurt me much to have bought more of 'em, for that matter, if she'd have brought more, 'cause there was nothing too good for our Ella, my ward, as I called her.

Uncle Ed. ran rested his head on his hand, and took a long pull at the cider-mug, but I was just as much in the dark as ever. Was this little girl—as pure as a snow-drop—dead or living? If the latter, where? With the view of elucidating this I said as before, inquiringly,

"And Ella?"

"Ah, well, I see I'm getting prosy again. Well, Ella grew happier and happier, and prettier every day, and had been with us nigh on a year and a half, when one day, as I was sitting in the house after taking a walk down the road a piece, I saw a carriage coming. The first thing that caught my eye as I entered was Aunt Sally Downer, with her spectacles all awry, and her mouth open, and staring in yonder door, and staring across the room. I followed the direction of her eyes, and there I saw a tall, good-looking man on his knees to our Ella, holding her hand, covering it with kisses, and saying, over and over again, 'Forgive! Forgive!' Ella was as white as marble, and I could not for the life of me make out what the man was doing there, and why he wanted forgiveness. I was not to remain long in the dark, for I soon found that this good-looking fellow was Harvey Oakes that was, and that, after the effect some months of searching, had just found out Ella, and had come of his restoration to hence, to ask all her noblemess and generosity had been found out, and to prostrate himself before her and plead for forgiveness from the woman, who was more worse than death for him.

"Harvey Oakes had refused to leave the city where all his troubles had their birth. He relied on the promise which said the righteous shall not be forsaken. He therefore waited and bided his time. At the time of his liberation he sought to find out how whereas the money could be produced his creditors, but was unsuccessful in all his inquiries. At last, in his own mind, he attributed it to the guilty brother. Spoke of that blackness that hung over his name, Harvey Oakes faced, knowing that a cloud was necessary to it. As he met success the world came back, and more wealth flowed in to him. One day came a letter from the State Department. His brother had died in a city of South America, leaving a large part of his embezzled funds, and most he had left made there by successful speculation, and with this, what was dearer than all, a full confession of guilt, that took the weight from Harvey Oakes to place it where it justly belonged. With his restored wealth and reputation he received from his former creditors the information that gradually left him to the knowledge of how that money had been made. Ella was his best friend. Since that knowledge came to him, night and day he sought her, and at last found her at the old toll-house.

"And so you see our Ella is still alive, and very happy. Last spring was a year she was married in this room, and is now Mrs. Harvey Oakes. There's a little Ephraim Downer Oakes, too, that I think will be set to come to the old goddaffer's savings. What d'ye say, old woman? They spent about half their time in the old toll-house, and the rest in the best spell holds, we'll be apt to see my ward and the boy along soon. You must drink to and see 'em when they come. God bless you! Good-by t'ye!"

THE AGE OF STEAM.

BY DEN. F. BLOCUM.

ALL the world is in commotion
With the wondrous locomotion
Of the age of steam.

Of its puffing, steaming ages—
From the giant steamer's snorting
And the rapid car's wild careering
To the rattling country stage,
All is rumbling, tumbling, dashing,
Panting, groaning, thundering,
And in fidgety unrest—
Waking, shaking all creation
In this onward, rushing nation,
Making huge the blusteration
Of the age in which we live!

Ay, in wonderful commotion
Is this age of locomotion.
Lake a cauldron, bubbling, boiling,
With its busy millions toiling,
Rushing, dashing for the dimes;
Bankers, hucksters, merchants, tailors,
Lawyers, doctors, printers, sailors,
Office-seekers, politicians,
Poets, painters, and musicians,
All competing for the dimes;
On the land, upon the ocean,
Rages ever the commotion,
This absorbing "Yankee notion,"
Always hunting for the dimes,
Which we hoard up in our coffers,
Till some splendid bargain offers
In the tightness of the times,
When, perchance, amid the pressure,
We may step in with our treasure
And buy up a goodly measure
Of the world's estates and pleasure
With our magic silver dimes!

Oh, how few who thus are dashing,
Sometimes building, sometimes smashing,
Ever for a moment think
Of aught else in life but dollars,
But of dollars, dollars, dollars,
Of the potent, solid chink!
Ah, they heed not ocean-breakers,
Nor the signs of coffin-makers,
Never dream they of disasters,
Nor of doctors' pills and plasters,
Nor of dust and dirt and grave!
"Still achieving, still pursuing,"
Like an ardent lover wooing,
Over land and sea and wave,
Do they ever hear the crying
Of the weary, sick, and dying,
Who some little pittance crave?
No, alas! the cry of sorrow
Is deferred until to-morrow—
Now they have no many cares—
And these sounds of human wailing
Are disordant, like the jarring
Of lost spirits to their ears!

Scarce a man in our Sanaria
But will clean the sad malaria,
Which now hangs o'er the negro's rags!
"Never mind the poor man's failing,
Sure his poverty's appalling,
And not in our line of trading,"
Quoth the money-making wight!
"Time enough to think of charity,
Of that deed of greatest merit,
When we've garnered up our store."
So they rush on with their steaming,
Driving, striving, and screaming,
Buying, selling, cheating, robbing,
Thimble-rigging and stock-jobbing,
Scorching for the golden ore—
But they rock not in their dreaming
Of a future which is gleaming
(Though to them not in the scening)
On "the dusk Plutonian shore!"
There they may hear weeping, groaning,
There may look on lamentation lashing,
That they never felt before!

Oh, this mad'ning money-mania
Which pervades the human cranium,
This corroding, burning passion
Which is never out of fashion,
And in folly makes no dash
Seeking nothing save of self!
How it manacles and loads us,
How it hardens hand and heart and goads us,
Till the fitful dream is over,
Till upon the grave we hover,
And in agony we ask
Of how little worth is pelf!
But this age of locomotion
Can not wait for such emotion
Nod'accordant with the times!
They, forsooth, are silly croakers,
Or at best but idle jokers
Who applaud not money-brokers—
Who have higher aspirations
Than the making of quotations,
Or the tinkling of the dimes!

MORE REAL GHOSTS.

III.

THE two instances of simple vision resulting from thought-impressing at the moment of death, which I am about to bring before the reader, are related to me by an unbeliever in witness. They were told me by the Rev. W. W——, mathematical tutor at one of the Cambridge colleges; a man of talent, and of undoubtedly hard brains, and the author of many mathematical works.

Nothing can happened to the aforesaid Professor himself.

"One night I was lying in my little bed. It was winter. The fire cast a bright light all over the room. I could not long sleep, but I had not been asleep. Indeed, I know that I was at that moment as wide awake as I am now. Suddenly, though I had never saw her before, nor upon, I saw Lady M—— quite distinctly, advancing as if from the door of the room. She was in evening dress in a white wrapper. The fire shone upon her face. I never doubted that it was herself. Stretching out my arms I cried, 'Oh! Lady M——, are you indeed come once more to see your little protege!'—her favorite name for me. But she did not answer a word. She came on to within a certain distance of my bed, then stood still, and looked upon me with a most peculiar expression of fond affection that I never saw equaled. Then, somehow, I can not hardly tell in what manner, she seemed to retreat from me, and, as it were, to go out through the wall. She was gone. I felt sure of it, though the wall. I supposed that Lady M—— having come, as she sometimes did, to my room, to see I had every thing comfortable, had found to disturb me by speaking, and so had gone out quietly somewhere by the door, or a door, of course. So I fell asleep, greatly comforted and pleased by having seen Lady M——.

"The next morning there was a mixture of silence and mysterious sound in the house. Strange persons crept about. I was indeed from going near the door of Lady M——'s chamber. At last

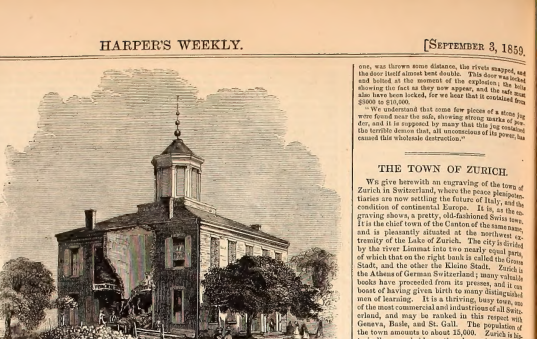
I was told—in answer to my reiterated entreaties that I should see Lady M——, for she was now well, I said (and she not come herself to my room the preceding night!)—that Lady M—— was dead —had expired at the very moment (as far as could be ascertained) when I had seen her, the evening before, come to my bedside and look at me so yearningly."

I, of course, asked the Professor if, by possibility, Lady M—— (unwatched during that moment) might really (as in the case of some other supposed spectre) have come to his bedside, and returned to die in her own room? The Professor declared that such a thing was impossible, for Lady M——'s own mother, knowing her daughter's moments were numbered, had never left the sick-bed for a single moment, and in her arms the poor patient breathed her last, at the identical time when the appearance visited Mr. W——a.

The second story told me by mathematical Reverend W——, runs thus:

At St. John's College, Cambridge, was a professor of the names of Fallowes, ci-devant senior wrangler, "a rosy man right plump to me." He was an especial friend of Mr. W——n, who was in the habit of seeing him constantly. One morning calling upon him, Mr. W——a found his friend in his dressing-gown at a late hour than usual, reclining on his sofa, and looking pale and dispirited. To continue in the words of Mr. W——a: "I asked Fallowes, 'What is the matter with you? Are you ill?' 'No! I am not ill.' I rallied him on his despondency, and entreated him to tell me the cause. He said, 'You will laugh at me if I tell you.' I assured him, I promised him, that I would not. At length, after much pressing, he said, 'If ever I saw any one, I saw my friend M—— last night at the foot of my bed.' 'Why,' replied I, 'he is in Scotland.' 'I know it!' said Fallowes, 'and that is the wonder of it, and the horrible thing. For he appeared to me with dripping hair, and swollen features, and with all the appearance of a drowned corpse. And I can not get it out of my head that something has happened to him.' 'My dear friend,' I said, 'you have only had a horrible dream, and be sure nothing will come of it.' However, do all I could, I found it impossible to remove the impression from Fallowes's mind. For days he continued unchanchely, and at length one morning he put a letter into my hands with merely these words: 'You see I was right!' The letter was to narrate that on the very night when Fallowes had received the impression his friend had been drowned in crossing a ford in Scotland."

Many of my contemporaries at Cambridge will remember that portions and distortions of this story (of which I now give the correct version) were dimly bruited about, and that it was reported (which was the truth) that Fallowes could never endure to be interrogated on the subject. They will also bear witness that Fallowes did not look like a man addicted to seeing ghosts.



EXPLOSION AT THE PORT GIBSON COURT-HOUSE.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH.]

A GUNPOWDER PLOT AT PORT GIBSON, MISSISSIPPI.

AN attentive correspondent enables us to publish the accompanying engraving of the partial destruction of the Claiborne County Court-House at Port Gibson, Mississippi, by an explosion of gunpowder. The deed was done by some burglar, for the sake of the money contained in the sheriff's vault. We take from the *Bee*ville (Port Gibson) the following account of the scene:

"The sleepers of our quiet village were startled yesterday morning about twenty-five minutes to four o'clock, by a terrible explosion, which jarred houses and rattled windows for a quarter of a mile around. It was discovered that the court-house had been blown open with gunpowder, in an attempt possibly to examine and secure the contents of the sheriff's vault. On visiting this scene of destruction, we found upon examination that about twenty feet of the northern wall, about midway between the two corners, were completely down from the roof to the foundation, blown front and back, filling the passage with rubbish.

"The vault led out of the sheriff's office under the store stairway; this vault was about eight feet deep and three and a half wide, and in it, built around with solid masonry, were two iron safes, nothing of them visible but the doors; the first one was comparatively useless, the second one was good, and generally contained what money was in the hands of the officers. This was the place, evidently, where the powder and the match were applied; and what is stranger still, the inside of this safe, the good one, shows signs, and the manner of the explosion, induces the belief of every mind that the powder was placed in the inside of it. The back of the safe was shattered to pieces, the masonry and heavy stone stairway looking up immediately behind it, and what separates the vault from the hall of the building, are entirely scattered into fragments, piling them in great confusion over the hall floor. The vault door, a strong iron one, was thrown some distance, the rivets snapped, and the door itself almost bent double. This door was locked and bolted at the moment of the explosion—the bolts showing the fact as they now appear, and the safe doors also have been locked, for we hear that it contained from $3000 to $10,000.

"We understand that some few pieces of a strong jug were found near the safe, showing strong marks of powder, and it is supposed by many that this jug contained the terrible demon that, all unconscious of its power, has caused this wholesale destruction."

THE TOWN OF ZURICH.

WE give herewith an engraving of the town of Zurich in Switzerland, where the peace plenipotentiaries are now settling the future of Italy, and the condition of continental Europe. It is, as the engraving shows, a pretty, old-fashioned Swiss town. It is the chief town of the Canton of the same name, and is pleasantly situated at the northwest extremity of the Lake of Zurich. The city is divided by the river Limmat into two nearly equal parts, of which that on the right bank is called the Grosse Stadt, and the other the Kleine Stadt. Zurich is the Athens of German Switzerland, many valuable books have preceded from its presses, and it can boast of having given birth to many distinguished men of learning. It is a thriving, busy town, one of the most commercial and industrious of all Switzerland, and may be ranked in this respect with Geneva, Basle, and St. Gall. The population of the town amounts to about 25,000. Zurich is historically remarkable as the place where the Reformation commenced in Switzerland, under the guidance and preaching of Ulrich Zwingli, in 1519, and the first entire English version of the Bible, by Miles Coverdale, was printed here in 1535. Many English Protestants, banished by the persecution of the reign of Queen Mary, found in this town a cordial reception during their exile.

One of the most pleasing features about Zurich is its promenades and points of view. One of the best of them is an elevated mound, once forming part of the ramparts, and called Cat's Bastion, now included in the New Botanical Garden, which is prettily laid out in walks and shrubberies, and opened to the public without restriction—a privilege not abused. It commands a delightful view of the town and lake, and of the distant Alps. Nothing can be more delightful than the view at sunset from this point, extending over the smiling and populous shores of the beautiful lake to the distant peaks and glaciers of the Alps of Glarus, Uri, and Schwytz, tinged with the most delicate pink by the sinking rays. The most prominent and interesting of the Alpine peaks seen from this, beginning at the east, are the Sentis in Appenzell, Glarish Dodi, Klariden in Glarus, Achsenburg, Rossberg, and Uri Rothstock. This is the place, "On the margin of fair Zurich waters," where the peace of Europe is to be secured for a few years.

CHAPTER XLIX.

AT THE ROUND TABLE.

AFTER the events which have been narrated, it was clearly unnecessary for Hope Wayne to ask any explanations of her Cousin Alfred in regard to the report of their engagement. She felt instinctively that he had been made somehow a tool of Fanny Nevet's, and more than ever were actually married, Hope could not help pitying her simple, good-humored cousin, and regretting the boldness in which she had told Fanny at Saratoga that she would congratulate Alfred when she heard of his engagement to Fanny.

Mr. Dinks had notified Hope that she was going home. That lady was satisfied by her conversation with Mrs. Nevet that it would be useless for her to see Mr. Nevet—that it was one of the cases in which facts and events plead much more persuasively than words. She was sure the rich merchant would not allow his daughter to suffer. Fathers do so in novels, thought she. Of course they do, for it is necessary to the interest of the story. And old Van Boozenberg does in life, thought she. Of course he does. But he is an illiterate, vulgar, hateful brute. Mr. Nevet is of another kind. She had herself read his name as director of at least seven different associations for doing good to men and women. She had also read the sermon upon Christianity in Commerce which Mr. Nevet had persuaded Dr. Maundy to publish.

"If a New York merchant, of wealth and respectability," said Mrs. Dinks to Hope, "who comes of a fine old family, and whose name is synonymous in Christian enterprises, can not be depended upon to do justice and love mercy, who can? Yes, who can? Shall I believe that his fine professions are only a prospectus printed in gilt to help his business? that he regards Christian character as a mere capital invested in Pearl Street?"

Perhaps Mrs. Dinks privately thought that some people might take that view. But she wanted to comfort herself by stating strongly whether which was certainly possible.

Ayear before Hope would have been entirely of her aunt's opinion. Now she merely bowed and looked sober. For Hope Wayne had changed in those few months quite as deeply as her letter to Mrs. Sinecure implied. At the round table in the Round Table she defended Lord Byron with her and less ardor. As her life had become real, as her character had developed under various influences, the romantic girl had passed into the thoughtful woman. She had had sharp surprises and discoveries and disappointments that had not embittered her. The round tree firmly rooted, through tempest, and dog-day heat, and kindly cold, grows on and on: adds new rings of strength to its trunk, new leaves to its boughs branches: every year hangs out more blossoms in the summer sky, and reddens every autumn with richer fruit.

Mrs. Dinks still delayed her departure. She knew that there was no reason for her staying. But she stood. She loved her son dearly. She was unwilling to leave him while his future was so dismally uncertain; and every week she inferred Hope that she was on the point of going.

Hope Wayne was not sorry to remain. Perhaps she also had her purposes. At Saratoga, in the previous summer, Arthur Merlin had remarked her incessant restlessness, and had connected it with the picture and the absence of somebody. But when, in New York, he cleared up the mystery and resolved who the somebody was, to his great surprise he observed at the same time that the restlessness of Hope Wayne was gone. From the months of seclusion which she had passed upon herself he saw that she emerged older, calmer, and lovelier than he had ever seen her. The calmness was, indeed, a little unnatural. To his sensitive eye—for, as he said to Lawrence Newt, in explanation of his close observation, it is wonderful how sensitive an exclusive devotion to my art will make my eye—to his eye the calmness was still too calm as the epoch had been too gay.

In the solitude of his studio, as he drew many pictures upon the canvas, he sang, and smoked, and scuffled around the floor in survey his work from a little distance—and studied its progress through his open fire, as he lay prostrate ing upon his lounge in a cotton velvet Indian coat, illustrated, bedaubed and bedizened, and puffed profusely, following the intervolving smoke with his eye—his meditations were always the same. He was always thinking of Hope Wayne, and beholding himself with that mask of art, actually beholding himself with himself: and not perceiving that when a man's sole thought by day and night is a certain woman, and an endless speculation about the quality of her feeling for another man, he is simply a clever thinking of his sentiment as a rival.

Arthur Merlin worked away, and congratulated himself that he had escaped falling in love. Whenever he spoke of the sadness in his friend Lawrence it was always from the point of view of art; at which Lawrence smiled more and profoundly glad, because, notwithstanding his scepticism at Delmonico's, he was not quite sure that that, while Arthur Merlin talked of Hope Wayne as an artist, he loved her as a woman.

The talented fellow undoubtedly was a great favorite in society. He could not tell why. Indeed there was no other secret than that he was a very pleasant young gentleman who made himself agreeable to young women, because he wished to be agreeable to girls: them—not, as he wickedly told Lawrence Newt, who winked and did not believe a word of it, because the human being is the noblest subject of art, but only because he wished to show himself by natural experience how much more charming in character, and sprightly in intelligence, and beautiful in person and manner, Hope Wayne was than all other young women.

He proved that important point to his perfect satisfaction. He punctually attended every meeting of the Round Table, that he might lose no opportunity of pursuing the study. He found Hope Wayne always friendly and generous. She frankly owned that he had shown her many charming things in poetry that she had not known, and had helped her to form juster opinions. It was natural and pleasant, he said, Arthur who had helped her. She did not know that it was a very different person who had done the same—a person whose name was Ada Nevet. For it was her changing character—changing in consequence of her acquaintance with Ada—that modified her opinions; and Arthur arrived upon her horizon at the moment of the change.

She was always friendly and generous with him. But sometimes she betrayed a suspicion of the idea that she must be the Diana of his great picture. There was an indescribable coolness and remoteness about her. He knew nothing to do with that confounded picture, and thank-equally confounded Lawrence Newt! thought he.

For the conversation at the Round Table sometimes fell upon Ada.

"He is certainly a handsome fellow," said Amy Waring. "I don't wonder at his success."

"It's because he's rich, then, Miss Waring!" asked Arthur.

"Does what?" said she.

"That Jim gives what you call social success."

"Oh! I mean that I don't wonder such a handsome, bright, graceful, accomplished young man, who lives in fine style, drives pretty horses, and knows everybody should be a great favorite with the girls and their mothers. Don't you see, Arthur? a sort of Alcibiades?"

Lawrence Newt laughed.

"You don't mean Pelham?" said he.

"No, for he has sense enough to conceal the coxcomb. But you ought to know your own nephew, Mr. Newt," answered Amy.

"Perhaps; but I have a very slight acquaintance with him," said Mr. Newt.

"I don't exactly like him," said Arthur Merlin, with perfect candor.

"Didn't know you knew him," replied Amy, looking up.

Arthur blushed, for he did not personally know him: but he felt as if he did, so that he unwittingly spoke so.

"No, no," said he, hastily; "I don't know him, I believe, but I know about him."

As he said this he looked at Hope Wayne, who had been sitting, working, in perfect silence. At the same moment she raised her eyes to his inquiringly.

"I mean," said Arthur, quite confused, "that I don't—somehow—that is to say, you know, there's a false impression you get about people—"

Lawrence Newt interposed—

"I suppose that Arthur doesn't like Abel for the same reason that all decent's like water: for the same reason that you, Miss Amy, and Miss Wayne, would probably not like such a man."

Arthur Merlin looked keenly at Hope Wayne.

"What kind of man is Mr. Newt?" asked Hope, faintly coloring. She was trying herself.

"Don't you know him?" asked Arthur, abruptly and keenly.

"Mr. Howard Hope, as she worked on, only a little more rapidly.

"Well, what kind of man do you think him to be?" continued Arthur, nervously.

"That is not the question," answered Hope, calmly.

Lawrence Newt and Amy Waring looked on during this little conversation. They both wanted Hope to love Arthur. They both doubted how Abel might impress her. Lawrence Newt had not confessed and said that neither Amy nor Hope would probably like Abel.

"Miss Hope is right, Arthur," said he. "She asks what kind of man my nephew is. He is a brilliant man—as fascinating man."

"A fascinating Bury," said Hope Wayne, without looking up.

"Exactly, Miss Hope. You have mentioned the reason why neither you nor Amy would like my nephew."

"I do not understand. Arthur Merlin was bewildered.

"I don't quite understand," said he; "I am such a great fool."

Nobody spoke.

"I am not sure that poor little Grace Plumer," Lawrence Newt gravely said.

"Don't you remember about little Grace Plumer. She can take proper care of herself," answered Arthur, merrily.

Hope Wayne and Amy fingers did not stop. She remembered Miss Grace Plumer, and she did not agree with Arthur Merlin. Hope thought that Grace was a boarding-school butterfly, and she knew the voice, the manner, the magnetism by which the girl was exposed.

"Since the Plumers came," said Lawrence, "Mr. Abel Nevet has returned to his allegiance. Mrs. Bleecker Van Kraut is not unattended whither Mr. Abel accompanies Miss Grace. If Mr. Godefroi Plumer is really so rich as I hear, I think we shall have a Mrs. Abel Nevet. Poor Mrs. Abel Nevet! Poor Mrs. Nevet!"

He shook his head with that look, mingled of feeling and irony, which was very perplexing. The tone in which he spoke was really so full of tenderness for the girl that Hope, who heard every word, and felt every tone, was sure that Lawrence Newt pitied the prospective bride sincerely.

"I beg pardon, Mr. Newt, and Miss Wayne," said Arthur Merlin; "but how can a man have a high opinion for women when he sees his sister do what Fanny Nevet has done?"

"Why should you complain that his sister does precisely what he is trying to do himself?" asked Lawrence. "They are my brother's children, Mr. Merlin, and I would rather lay them in their graves to-morrow than trust the chances of their lives."

Every word sank into the soul of Hope Wayne. Every word helped her to understand Abel Nevet.

CHAPTER L.

A LITTLE DINNER.

IT was summer, but still Mrs. Dinks lingered. Mrs. Dinks had told her husband of Alfred's engaging, the Honorable Budlong said it was a great pity, but, as all came of the foolish fondness of the boy's mother; that nothing was more absurd than for mothers to be sternly calling their children to account. Although who would have attended to Mr. Alfred if his mamma had not, the unemployed lawyer forgot to state, notwithstanding that he had just written a letter upon public affairs, in which he eloquently remarked that he had no aspiration for public life; but that, after from the turmoils of political strife, his modest ambition was satisfied in the performances of the sweet duties which the wise Creator, who has set the children of men in families, has imposed upon all parents.

"However," said he, "Mr. Newt is a wealthy merchant. It's all right, my dear! Women, and especially mothers, are peculiarly silly at such times. Endeavor, Mrs. Dinks, to keep the absurdity—which, of course, you will not fail to do with a press altogether—within bounds. Try to control your nerves, and rely upon Providence."

Therewith the statesman stroked his wife's chin. He controlled his own nerves perfectly, and went to dress for dinner with a select party at General Belch's, in honor of the Honorable M. J. Edx, whom, in his capacity as representative in Washington, had ground an axe for his friend the General. Therefore, when the clerk was removed, the General rose and said; "I know that we are only a party of friends, but I feel that I should indulge my feelings, and gratifying yours, by proposing the health of our distinguished, able, and high-minded representative, whose Congressional career proves that there is no office in the gift of a free and happy people to which he may not legitimately aspire. I have the honor and pleasure to propose, with three times three, the Honorable Benedictus Jawley Edx."

The Honorable Budlong Dinks led off in gravely pounding the table with his fork; and when the rattle of knives and forks and spoons and glasses had subsided, and when Major Scuppernong, of North Carolina—who had dined very freely, and was not strictly following the order of events, but cried out in a loud voice in the midst of the applause, "Encore, encore! good for Belch!"—had been waved to silence, then the honorable gentleman who had been thus honored, and expressed his opinion of the state of the country in a few remarks of an hour and a half, to the general effect that General Jawley Edx, and fellow-citizens—I mean my friends, and you, Mr. Speaker—I beg pardon, General Belch, that General Jawley Edx, gentlemen and ladies, that is to say, the relatives here present—I mean—yes—is one of the very good for Belch!"—had been waved to and fro in teeth and down the throat of calumny—the greatest human being that lives, or has lived, or ever can live.

Mr. Elo rose amidst a flurry of applause. Major Scuppernong, of North Carolina, and Captain Laub, of Pennsylvania, turned simultaneously to the wrong gentleman who sat between them, and who had been introduced to them by General Belch as Mr. Newt, son of our old Mannney friend Bonifacius Newt, and said to him, with hysterical force,

"By Gee, Sir! that is one of the greatest men in this country. He does honor, Sir, to the American name!"

The gentleman, without waiting for a reply, each seized a decanter and filled their glasses. Our friend Abel, who had a taste for seeing life and a genius for every kind of society, and a particular purpose in dining on this particular occasion at General Belch's, where he knew he was to meet the Honorable Budlong Dinks, and to make a special on each other, filled his own glass and lighted a cigar.

Of course, after General Belch had spoken and Mr. Elo had responded, it was necessary that every body else should be brought to a speech. General Belch mentioned by the keystone of the arch of States; and Captain Laub, in reply, enlarged upon the swarthy sons of Pennsylvania. General Smith, of Vermont, when green mountains were gracefully alluded to by General Belch, was proud to say that he came—or, rather, he might say—yes, he would say, hailed from the hills of Ethan Allen; and, in closing, treated the company to the tale of Ticonderoga. The glittering mouth of the Father of Waters was a beautiful metaphor which brought Colonel le Fay, of Louisiana, to his feet; and the Colonel said that really he did not know what to say. "Say that the Mississippi has more water in its mouth than ever yet had!" roared Major Scuppernong, with great hilarity. The company laughed, and the Colonel sat down. When General Belch mentioned Plymouth Rock, the Honorable Bedlong Dinks sprang upon it, and congratulated himself and the festive circle he saw around him upon the inestimable boon of religious liberty which, he might say, was planted upon the rock of Plymouth, and blazed until it had marched all over the land, dispensing from its vivifying rays the healing dew of charity, like the briny tears that love its base.

A LITTLE SPEECH.

"Beautiful! beautiful! My G—, sir, what a poetic idea!" murmured, or rather gurgled, Major Scuppernong to Abel at his side.

But when General Belch rose and said that such sentiments as these when so unpremeditated eloquence was unnecessary, and that he would use none, and that he therefore merely requested his friends to fill and pledge, without further interruption, "The old Bay State, where there was a prolonged burst of enthusiasm, during which Major Scuppernong whispered, as he shook and wavered there, blubbering in maudlin wise, and wiping his eyes with a napkin, while the company, who perceived his condition, rattled the table, and shouted, and laughed, until Silgo Moultrie, who sat opposite Abel, declared to him across the table that it was an abominable shame, that the whole South was insulted, and that he should say something.

"Fiddle-de-dee, Moultrie," said Abel to him, laughing; "the South can't be insulted any more than Major Scuppernong, of North Carolina, gets drunk and makes a fool of himself than the North is insulted because General Belch, of Vermont, and the honorable Dinks, of Boston, spoke fools of themselves without provocation. Do you suppose that, at this time of night, any of these people have the remotest idea of the points of the compass? Their sole interest at this moment is to know whether the gallon Major will consume before the table turns to get through his speech."

Silgo Moultrie saw the justice of Abel's view. But the gallon Major did not get through his speech at all, because he never began it. The longer he sat there the more tender he grew, and the more profusely he wept. Once or twice he made a motion, as if straightening himself to speak. The noise ceased, and then subsided a little. The guests cried "Hi!" There was a moment of silence, during which the eloquent and gallant Major mopped the lingering tears with his napkin, then the speech opened in a sentimental strain; the roar began again, until at last the smile changed into a burst of sobbing, and as Abel's observations proceeded, and Bedlong Dinks's secret amusement, Major Scuppernong suddenly turned and threw his arms about Abel, and tenderly embraced him, whispering with tipsy tenderness, "My dearest Bebel, I love you! Yes, by Heaven! I love you!" and fell asleep.

Abel called the waiters, and had the gallon Major and slopped over removed to a sofa.

"He enjoys life, the Major, Sir," said Captain Lamb, of Pennsylvania, at Abel's left hand. "A genial, hearty, generous soul. In the whole room, Sir, General Belch is a man who knows enough to go in when it rains."

Captain Lamb, of Pennsylvania, cocked one eye at his glass, and then opening his mouth, and throwing his head a little back, poured the entire contents down at one swallow. He filled the glass again, took a puff at his cigar, threw back his head a moment with the handle of a spoon, then opening his pocket-knife, proceeded to excavate some remains in his teeth with the blade.

"Is Dinks a rising man in Massachusetts, do you know, Sir?" asked Captain Lamb of Abel, while the knife swirled and rested a moment on the outside of the mouth.

"I believe he is, Sir," said Abel at a venture.

"Wasn't there some talk of his going on a foreign mission? Seems to me I heard something."

"Oh! yes," replied Abel. "I've heard a good deal about it. But I am not sure that he has received his commission yet."

Captain Lamb looked his eye at Abel as if he had been a glass of wine.

Abel rose, seating himself by Silgo Moultrie, entered into conversation. Silgo was not precisely jealous of Abel's devotion to Grace Palmer—he accounted him as a mere creature of domes—but he was a little nervous. Abel's flirtations were not in public calculated to please. He did not flirt to make other people stare and talk. He flirted to gain an actual ascendency, and yet an ascendency which should not be suspected by others until it was sure. Abel considered that the use of his relations to Mrs. Palmer justified him in believing Silgo not to be in the least dangerous.

But the object of his sitting by Silgo was not to enjoy his conversation. It was to give the cue to the company for changing the subject so that he might sit where he would. He drifted and tacked about the table for some time, and finally sailed into the port toward which he had been steering—an empty chair by Mr. Dinks. They sniffed, exchanging. Mr. Dinks talked, with a patronizing air,

"I presume you are not often at dinners of this kind, Mr. Newt?"

"No," replied Abel; "I usually dine on veal and spring chickens."

"Oh!" said Mr. Dinks, who thought Abel meant that he occasionally ate that beef.

"I mean that men of my years usually feed with younger and softer people than I see around me here," explained the young man.

"Yes, of course, I understand," replied Mr. Dinks, feebly, who had not had the least idea what Abel meant; "young men must expect to begin at women's dinners."

"They must, indeed," replied Abel. "Now, Mr. Dinks, one of the pleasantest I remember was this last summer, under the auspices of your wife. Let me see, there were Mr. Moultrie there, Mr. Whitloe and Miss Magot, Mr. Bowdoin Beacon and Miss Amy Waring—and who else? Oh! I beg pardon, your son Alfred and my sister Fanny."

As he spoke the young gentleman filled a glass of wine, and looked over the rim at Mr. Dinks as he drained it.

"Yes," returned the Honorable Mr. Dinks, "I don't go to women's dinners."

He seemed entirely unconscious that he was conversing with the brother of the young lady with whom his son had eloped. Abel recalled it himself.

"I suppose," said he, "we ought to congratulate each other, Mr. Dinks?"

The honorable gentleman looked at Abel, paused a moment, then said:

"My son marries at his own risk, Sir. He is of years of discretion. I should not hinder, in any manner, if only six hundred dollars a year, which I allow him, I presume he would not marry without some security upon the other side. However, Sir, as that is his affair, and as I do not find it very interesting—no offense, Sir, for I shall always be happy to see my daughter-in-law—we had better, perhaps, find some other subject. The arts of social life, Sir, have, as to avoid what is disagreeable. Don't you think Mr. Elie quite a remarkable man? I regard him as an honor to your State, Sir."

"A very great honor, Sir, and all the gentlemen at the neighboring dinner are honors to the States from which they come, and to our common country, Mr. Dinks. Mr. Bowdoin may well be content to dine upon veal and spring chickens so long as we know that such gentlemen have gone before us in their affairs."

Mr. Abel Newt bowed to Mr. Dinks as he spoke, and the said gentleman bowed back with the stately gravity with which a President of the United States hears the Latin speech in which he is made a Doctor of Laws. Mr. Dinks replied to the little speech of Abel's, as if he desired to show that he could be courteous to children that had been complimented.

"And yet, Sir," continued Abel, "if my father, their elder brother, could conceive a prejudice in regard to this elopement, and decline to know any thing of my happy pair, as I understand dollars, in the present liberal style of life incumbent upon a man who has moved in the circles in which Mr. Alfred Dinks has consistently moved, would be a very limited income for your son and daughter-in-law to live upon."

Abel lighted another cigar. Mr. Dinks was a little confounded by the sudden harsh of the conversation.

"Very, very," he replied, as if he were entirely left to reflection, "very true, Sir."

"The father of the lady in these cases is very apt to be obdurate," said Abel.

"I think, likely," replied Mr. Dinks, with the polite air of a man assenting to a truth in mathematics. "The arts of social life, Sir, as I have not the slightest knowledge."

"Yes," persisted Abel, "if I will not conceal from you—for I know a father's heart will wish to know to what his son is exposed—that my father is a very strong prejudice in this affair."

"Oh! he'll get over it," interrupted Mr. Dinks, pleasantly. "They always do, Sir. I am now, don't you think that we had better—"

"Exactly," struck in the other. "But I, who know my father's heart, am sure that he will relent. Oh, Sir, it is dreadful to think of a family quarrel." Abel puffed for a moment in silence. "But I think my dearest father loves me enough to allow me to mould him a little. He will relent, and say to me, 'Son Abel, Mr. Dinks would contribute say fifteen hundred dollars a year, and Mr. Alfred cannot live on less.' Now, I think in that case I might persuade him to advance as much; and so, Sir, your son and his wife would not be thrown upon the world, and been accustomed, and their mutual affection would sustain them. I doubt not that the grandfather died. Then all would be right."

Abel blew his nose as if to command his emotion, and looked at Mr. Dinks.

"Mr. Newt, I should prefer to drop the subject, Sir, now and forever. I will say no more allowance. I doubt if he ever gets a cent from Mr. Burt, who is not his grandfather, but only his step-father. I will not interfere. You may receive something. I repeat that I prefer not any understanding in the matter. I wish he has done a foolish thing, I am sorry. I hope he has not. Let us drink to the prosperity of the mountain young pair, Sir."

"With all my heart," said Abel.

The gentlemen drank, and the manager one proceeded to compliment Mr. Dinks's speech upon Religious Liberty and Plymouth Rock. Bedlong Dinks, it was extremely happy. I am very glad it was heard by gentlemen from so many States. He delighted to hear the sentiments of a patriotic enthusiastic."

There was a pleasing insinuation in this little remark which Abel's companion received with a warm smile. It certainly would be very pleasant, after all, to have a son-in-law who favorably all over the country, for when one received one's diplomatic appointment it would not be altogether as a stranger. Mr. Dinks was also secretly satisfied with the way in which he had avoided the conversation about his son's marriage.

Abel was not less satisfied. He had come to the dinner that he might discover, in the freedom of soul which follows a feast, what Alfred Dinks's prospects really were, and what his father would do for him. Boniface Nevet, upon coming to the store after the fete-a-tete with his wife, had told Abel of his sister's marriage. Abel had comforted his parent by the representation of the probable Burt inheritance. But the father was skeptical. Therefore when General Abraham Belch entered the room, and sat by Mr. Abel Newt's company at dinner, to meet the Honorable Barnbus Jawley Elie—an invitation which was dictated by General Belch's desire to stand well with so influential a political personage as Boniface Newt—the father and son both perceived the opportunity of discovering what they needed.

"Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Dinks will have six hundred a year, as long as papa Dinks chooses to pay it," said Abel to his father the day after the dinner.

Mr. Newt clenched his teeth and struck his fist upon the table.

"Not a cent shall they have from me!" cried he. "Shall Abel lose a girl mean by this kind of thing?"

Abel was not discomposed. He did not clench his teeth or strike his fist.

"I tell you what they can do, father," said he.

His father looked at him inquiringly.

"They can take Mr. and Mrs. Tom Wichet to board."

Mr. Newt remembered every thing he had said to Mr. Van Schoonhoven. But of late his hair was growing very gray, his brow very wrinkled, his countenance very anxious and watery. When he remembered the old banker it was with no self-reproach that he himself was now going white, in the banker's cause, by his bed side to Abel's scorn. It was only to remember that the very old man had sunk down the portcullis of the bank vaults, and that loans were getting to be almost impossible. His face darkened. He drew a sharp oath. "That old villain!"

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE ROME SENTINEL relates that a three-year-old girl disappointed her father upon a visit to her grandparents in the country, where a blessing is invoked by the whole family before each meal. The little girl was provided with a bowl of bread and milk. Her father, supposing the blessing, and of course on the first occasion she was seated with them, commenced eating immediately. But when the family gathered around the board the second time after the commencement of the meal, they were waiting for the preliminary religious ceremony, and observing that the child was not there duly conscious of the approaching solemnity she called him to order by saying, with very great propriety, "Father, you—you—you've got to talk to his plate pretty soon."

A young Frenchman, a student of the Academy of Pointe-au-Chêne, had to finish his studies. At Napier he met Wm. A. Wright, who was also a student. It is customary with the people of his nation. The young Frenchman, who had left the Spanish Creole behind, was dirty, wore well made, and proposed to him to draw him. As each remembered the other's face, they began struck. The Frenchman conducted him home and left him to wash his hands. Every one in the house went into an agitating closet, but soon returned, apparently with very little relief, and, upon inquiry, by what means to draw I" told he, as if to wash both hands was an ordinary labor.

HEALTH OF AMERICAN WOMEN.

The great value of the GRAEFENBERG MEDICINES, including their splendid remedy, Marshall's Uterine Catholicon, is guaranteed by testimonials from the most distinguished men in the country, whose names and the evidence of genuine character, are at the service of persons interested. Among them are testimonials of the GOVERNORS OF TWO STATES, the CHAIRMAN of the BOARD OF HEALTH OF NEW YORK, one of the Surgeons-in-Chief of BELLEVUE HOSPITAL, and many Surgeons, including the Rev. N. Bangs, the HEAD OF THE METHODIST CHURCH, THE STATE CHEMIST AND ASSAYER of the State of Massachusetts, THE MAYOR OF NEW YORK CITY, UNITED STATES COMMISSIONERS, and others, besides the Proprietor of BARNUM'S MUSEUM, and many other public men, together with Editorial Notices from the leading Journals in the country.

To Dr. VALENTINE MOTT, President and Professor of Surgery:

To Dr. G. S. BEDDOE, Professor of Diseases of Women, New York University.

To WILLARD PARKER, President of Academy of Medicine.

To Dr. MARION SIMS, Head of Women's Hospital, New York.

To Dr. JOHN C. CHEESEMAN, Professor of Diseases of Women.

GENTLEMEN: Your position in the medical profession is very high. You claim to be acquainted with all forms of surgical diseases, and profess to teach others how to cure disease. Can you do it yourselves?

The remaining physicians of the Graefenberg Company make no professions of position. They merely claim to cure disease, and are willing to rest their claims upon the testimony of those they have cured, and not upon any position or honors awarded by a self-constituted medical board. From each of you, gentlemen, patients have come to the consulting rooms of the GRAEFENBERG COMPANY. In some instances, you have exposed your skill, and given them up as incurable. In other instances, you have nearly killed them, and made their cure very slow and difficult, by injudicious or topical practice. Yet, under the beneficent and patient operation of the Graefenberg treatment, ALL of these sufferers are in a fair way to be cured; MOST of them are cured already.

☞ The Graefenberg Family Medicines will always be on all theaters for which they are recommended with certainty and safety.

Whatever has had occasion to consult the current volumes of the Magazine must have been struck with the multiplicity of subjects upon which they intelligently comprehend, historical, and scientific facts, to that, apart from its merits as a work of entertaining reading, it is of the highest value as a work of general reference, and on a great variety of subjects.—The "Monthly Record of Current Events," in particular, though promising little immediately after the date of the publication of the work, is found to be a most valuable and convenient repertory of information for every one who has the most frequent occasion to consult a book of reference.—N. Y. Evangelist.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE is, emphatically, the American periodical par excellence. It is always conservative in politics, elegant in taste, varied in matter, overwhelming in quantity, and cheap as dirt, and, moreover, as large by a sturdy common sense, it has no rival. Nor will it have any. We rejoice in its prosperity.—New Orleans Christian Advocate.

SIR—

Agreeably to your order of the 1st inst., we have witnessed a series of satisfactory experiments made with T. A. DELANO'S Life-Preserving Vest, and have the honor to report that we consider it a valuable invention—well adapted as the means of saving human life, from its convenient form, and the readiness with which it can be fitted, and slight liability to get out of order.

With respect, your obedient servant,

CHARLES C. TURNER,
Commandant U. S. Navy.

NEWPORT, R. I., October 6th 1858.

Delano Life-Preserving Coat and Vest Company:

GENTLEMEN—I have examined the improved Life-Preserving Vest, invented by T. A. Delano, and have seen it put to many severe tests, all of which it has so admirably stood that I consider it a perfect protection against drowning. The elastic straps prevent a large amount of inflation without incommoding or fatiguing the body, and, as far as I am aware, are an entirely new device and a very useful invention.

Yours, very respectfully,

GEO. W. CULLUM,
Capt. U. S. Engineers.

THE "GREAT EASTERN" AND THE CITY OF PORTLAND.

We engrave herewith a picture of the Great Eastern, as she now lies in the Thames. On 3d September it is announced that she will sail for Portland, in England, on a trial-trip; and if that prove satisfactory, she will leave Holyhead for Portland, Maine, on 15th of the same month. There is a rumor that she will sail from Galway to New York; but this as yet lacks confirmation.

We gave in our last number a pretty full description of this noble ship. With regard to her sailing qualities and her probable safety at sea, the London Times says:

"As to the ship itself, it has no immunity from perils. It may suffer what is suffered every day by some ship or other in our vast mercantile navy. But the calculation has been worked out, and there lies a vessel ready to start in a few days for Calcutta, lend it passengers and cargo, take in others, and return home immediately, without taking in more coals, all within seventy days. Once released from these shores nothing can stop her, so long as her machinery does its work. This, of course, is the question; but never was steamship provided with so many alternatives. She will rush over the sea with a speed nearly equal to an ordinary railway train, and with a weight five hundred times greater. Should she come into collision with any thing else afloat—should she, by chance, touch some little three-decker in the mid-sea, she will live to tell the tale, and she alone. She might send the flimsy craft to the bottom in the night, exiting her in two or sailing over her, without even disturbing the sleep of her passengers. It might be presumptuous to affirm that she will not feel the waves, for that remains to be tried; but on calculation she should feel them little more than an ordinary Thames steamer does the waves between bridges."

The cabins are thus described by the reporter of the Illustrated London News, who visited the ship on the occasion of the recent banquet on board:

"The dock having been duly explored, the company crowded down the Principal staircase, and were soon astonished with the elaborate splendor of the grand saloon, upon which Mr. Crace has exhausted all his well-known profusion in renaissance decoration. Much skill has in the first place been shown in making the best of the masts and funnels, obstacles which could not be removed, and which in less skillful hands would have very much obstructed the view, and spoiled the general effect of the saloon. But Mr. Crace has squared them unsightly objects, and covered them with large and costly mirrors, so placed that, instead of contracting the view, they give the effect of much greater space than is really available. The sides, and all spaces not occupied by looking-glasses, are covered with a peculiarly rich white and gold paper, with massive renaissance centres, and interspersed with panels painted with allegorical subjects. The floor is covered with crimson Axminster carpeting of the Royal pattern, and the recesses are all filled with couches covered in crimson Utrecht velvet. The hangings are of the most superb island of the same color, fringed with silk lace and draped up with tassels of the newest design; and, in short, every thing given for hire more of the State reception-room of a Royal palace than the principal cabin of a merchant-ship. A very peculiar feature in this unique saloon is the mode by which it is lighted and ventilated at the sides—by large open-fan-railed sky-lights, which can be had reaching to the upper-deck, where they are met by sky-lights, which can be had up or down at pleasure. Besides the great additional light which these openings give, they are invaluable as securing at any moment current of fresh air, a luxury which will only be fully appreciated when the Great Eastern is steaming majestically across the Indian Ocean with her living freight of some eight or ten thousand passengers for Calcutta. Next to this imperial saloon is another and still longer one, which is to be appropriated to the ordinary first-class passengers, the other being exclusively devoted to the extra first and the ladies, and in which the directors on Monday entertained some 400 of their friends. Arrangements had been made for 850, but the thirst of the British public for scientific investigation, especially when a Champagne luncheon crowns the vista, brought down such troops of friends that entertainment had to be found for nearly double the number. Thanks, however, to the provision of Mr. Quartermaine, of the Ship, to whom the commissariat had been intrusted, there was enough and to spare for every body, and the wines were always ready in abundance when some noble connoisseur of particular sentiment refused to be tempted. Around them the principal saloons the sleeping-berths of the passengers are skilfully arranged, the amount of accommodation being regulated, of course, by the price paid for the passage. But it is hardly fair to call them mere berths, seeing that they are, generally speaking, rather suits of apartments, comprising sleeping, sitting, and dressing-room, all self-contained, and offering to fortune as complete seclusion as if they were in their own houses. Every one of these berths is larger than the best cabins in any other vessel; and they have the peculiar advantage of being double, and double the height, and possessing the most ample and ready means of exit and ventilation.

THE CITY OF PORTLAND, MAINE.

Portland, Maine, of which we give an engraving on the previous page, is the fortunate port which is destined to receive the gigantic vessel and the pride of this country—the harbor being the only one on the Atlantic coast which a ship of her size can enter and in perfect safety. Portland is at the line growing city, with a population of about 35,000. It has been mainly built up by the trade with Canada, which borders it the real sea-port of Canada during the winter months. The people are enterprising, they know their own interests; their town will soon become a formidable rival to Boston. There are no port dues of any kind at Portland.

A story is told by a late writer which illustrates the extent of internal communication in the United States. He says: "A recent event in the railway life of Portland caused no little sensation and congratulation. A cargo of cotton arrived at that land which had been borne on the waters of the Mississippi 1,200 miles to St. Louis on the bank of the Missouri on the railways that conveyed it to the confines of Canada; the cars of the Great Western and Grand Trunk of Canada then carried it 300 more miles to Portland, from whence it was taken to Boston for a manufactory in the vicinity of that city."

When the Great Eastern visits Portland the citizens will, no doubt, win a high reputation for hospitality.

A LITTLE MORE MONEY, IF YOU PLEASE.

A STATE Canal Convention has been held at Rochester. A brief memorandum of its proceedings will be found elsewhere. It did not repay perusal. It is the old story, and taxpayers know it by heart.

It is the doom of every useful thing to be turned to base purposes. Printing has served to disseminate vile books. Gunpowder has caused the death of many a good man. The electric telegraph in Nova Scotia enables rogues to cheat their neighbors in Wall street. And now the New York State canals, one of the most magnificent engineering works in the world, and a noble instrument of communication and civilization, have been for years the grand agent of corruption and profligacy among the politicians of this State. Year after year the people vote more money for their completion. Before the money is voted the "friends of the canals," as a certain class of easy politicians call themselves, just as their prototypes in olden times used to style themselves "friends of the people," call their gods to witness that the money would never have cost a stigma on the horse-leech: when the proposed job is at last settled—when the greed has been allowed to feed fully, Chaubert or Samuel D. Ruggles, of Union Square. For all marauders agree that there is a time when the leech becomes gorged, and can not help relieving its prey to digest; but from the days of De Witt Clinton the present Governor of this State has been a time when the "friends of the canals" consented to withdraw their fangs for a single instant from our succulent body politic. Then it has been, so it will be evermore. The Susa Canal may be dug; vessels may sail through the Aetnian; the Pacific Railroad may run over buffaloes in the desert; Professor Wise may carry the Liverpool Mail in his balloon; but never, to the end of time, shall the Erie Canal be erected with the announcement that the New York canals are completed, and need no more money from the public.

It is hardly necessary to say that the gist and aim of the new Canal Convention is to obtain more money. To do the "friends of the canals' justice, however, they do not take us by the throats and demand our purses or our lives. They are willing to compromise with us. If we won't give up our wallets, will we toll the railroads? If not, the "friends of the canals" ask no more—at present.

This story of telling the railroads is ancient, but not respectable. When first the New York railroads were built, the canals, their seniors in the carrying trade, viewed them with a jealous eye. To obtain the necessary charters from the Legislature the various railroad companies were compelled to submit to tolls in favor of the canals, whose influence at that time was paramount at Albany. After the roads were built, the folly of taxing one class of enterprises for the benefit of another—and less useful class became widely apparent, and the railroad companies which had acquired power at the capital, were enabled to procure the passage of a law repealing the tolls. Most of the roads agreed, in consideration of a reduction of fare, passengers at two cents a mile—about what it costs them to do the work. But what the Legislature had done it could undo. The law was repeal, it could re-establish tolls. Armed with this principle, a certain class of hungry politicians have regularly fed upon the railroads all on the leading railroads of this State, under a threat of reimposing tolls in favor of the canals. Every January, as regularly as Harrison's cold snap, some member of the Legislature introduces a bill to re-establish tolls. The usual spectacle is presented of the bill successively shows a large majority in favor of the measure. The meaning of this is, that the General Committee of the Erie Central Railroad, must lose no time in stepping up to the Captain's office and settling. In a few days the annual bill for Boston burning does in effect make the journey in question, with the object necessarily changed, whereupon a great many four of every five members are in favor of tolling the roads, and the speeches are unanimously severe on the subject of the wicked leading usually passes in silence by a slender majority; and before the third the "six months' bill" is read, every member is aware that a vote in the canal policy from some ponderous critter.

The whole thing is, in fact, a farce, and worse than a farce—an indecent attempt to blackmail the railroads. No man of sense at the present day is seriously in favor of re-establishing tolls on the railroads. It is not necessary even to expect the railroads to support the canals than it would be to expect steamships to pay tolls to sailing-vessels, or electric telegraphs to compound the deficit on the postal revenue. Progress involves inevitable injury to things established. Steam have superseded sails; the Minié rifle has superseded "Brown Bess;" the telegraph has deprived the post-office of a large amount of business; the railroads have hurt the canals; and by-and-by, perhaps, Professor Wise will take away a portion of the business of both. Each agent of civilization has its day; when that day ends, and some new and improved method takes the place of the old, the latter must give way with the best grace it can, and not seek to burden its successor with the duty of sustaining its obsolete existence. If the railroads are to be made to carry the canals on their backs, why not also the stage-coaches?

The public of the State of New York can not be decently expected to vote more money for the completion of canals. Enough money has been spent on them already would, if honestly laid out, have built a canal from here to Little Lake Erie. Another million, or two millions, or ten millions, or a hundred millions may be spent, and they will be no nearer completion than now. Like the "friends of the people" the "friends of the canals" to complete them. Their completion would be a death-blow to their "friendship." Like the "friends of the people" they would be inexperienced son for erring a patient of ten years' standing, the "friends' would be inconsolable if the canals were really finished.

"How shall I support my family," said Mr. Attorney Quirk, in reply to a proposition to abolish a case, "if I stay proceedings and put an end to the suit?"

The only true plan to be pursued in reference to the canals is to force them, as speedily as the highest bidder, and get rid of them altogether. Whether it was right in the origin for the State to embark in the commercially false canals, we will not now inquire: there are cases when an expedient may justify a departure from principle; and we are inclined to think that, under the circumstances, this was such a case. It is clear enough that it is monstrous for the State of New York to carry on business at the present day as a common carrier. Nothing could justify the original incorporation of the State in the canal scheme but the absolute impossibility of getting the canals built by private enterprise. Now the paramount importance of the canals to the prosperity of the Commonwealth. But, now that they are built, that experiment ceases to apply, and we may revert to sound principles.

It is as false policy for the State of New York to own canals, and do business in competition with the Central Railroad, as it would be for the State to set up a newspaper or a barber's shop. Private enterprise is the proper and natural province of the Commonwealth. Its sphere of action is exclusively public and political. When it enters the domain of private enterprise, and undertakes to do business for hire, like a private individual, it can not fail to be cheated, to lose money, to breed corruption, and to ruin its whole public action. See how abominable a speculation these canals have been! Even when the roads were tolled for their benefit the public was taxed to make-up the difference between their revenue and their expenditures. Now we pay our taxes yearly, and each year's accounts show a larger deficit. A million or two are spent every year on the canals; but they are not only not completed, they are not kept in decent repair. A horde of hungry politicians—Democrats, Republicans, and Know Nothings, all fraternize in dividing the canal spoils—fatten on them; but the forwarders complain that their business is impropelly done, and the owners of the canals—the people of the State—are nearly a million of dollars pocket by them every year.

Why should there be any further hesitation as to what to do? The people we know the canals no more they will cost us. In the end we shall be forced to follow the example of Pennsylvania and other States, and sell them for what we can not for them. It may not be much; but at all events, when they are sold, there will be an end of the eternal appeals of the "friends of the canals" for "a little more money;" and the principal source of corruption in our New York politics will be cut off.

THE FUTURE OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE NORTH.

Ten elections of delegates to the General Conference of May, 1860, are proceeding, and the indications are that the ultra Northern party will succeed in obtaining something more than a majority in the General Conference, which is to be held at Buffalo. The question to be decided by that body is of sufficient public interest to deserve some analysis at the hands of the secular press.

Those who are unfamiliar with the subject may need to be informed that a rule of the Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church excludes from membership all persons who engage in "the buying and selling of men, women, and children, with the intention to enslave them." This rule has always been so interpreted as to apply solely to persons who reduce from human beings into slavery; the mere act of slaveholding has been regarded as no sin—never by the rule, and, until 1856, no attempt had been made to impugn the membership of slaveholders in the Methodist Episcopal Church North. Even those Northern men who, in 1844, took so active a part in denouncing the slaveholding bishop Andrew acquired slaves by his wife, did not, at that time, question the right of laymen to hold slaves without impairing their Christian character. In the Conference of Cincinnati, in 1856, however, the ground was taken by some members, that the rule covered the mere act of holding slaves, as well as the act of reducing freemen into slavery; and that if the present phraseology of the rule was not strong enough it ought to be altered to that purpose. A vote was taken; the advocates of the new view were defeated, and the old interpretation of the rule was sustained.

Ever since then the extreme Northern men have been actively organizing for a renewal of the struggle in 1860. Another election has been reported; the others which are to follow will, it is supposed, result in giving the ultra anti-slavery party a majority. This party will secure the adoption of their rule by the General Conference, and its subsequent ratification by a majority of the annual conferences. The Baltimore Maryland Conferences, the Philadelphia Conference, the Conferences in New Jersey, and perhaps a few others, may oppose a resolute front to the innovators; but it is considered likely that they will constitute a minority.

Under the circumstances this course is well calculated to provoke earnest, sober thought among the members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Hitherto, as, it is estimated, two thirds have owned within the limits of the Northern division of the Church. In the event of the adoption of the proposed rule excluding and HOLDING A SIX, these and their owners would, of course, be at once driven out of the pale of the Church into some other denomination. Besides these there are, in all the large cities, and in several agricultural districts, a large number of conservative laymen who may be expected to object to the wholesale denunciation of their slaveholding brethren. Many such must, under the severance of the Church as an evil which, under the circumstances, it was difficult to prevent, may not quit the Church on the occasion, when they are requested to indorse a measure which is, at least, a barefaced affront to the entire laity of the Southern portion of the Church.

It is quite likely that the partisans of the new opinion have counted on this opposition, and are prepared to carry out the dictates of their "conscience," even at the cost of one half the body of which they are members. The case of the Methodist Episcopal Church, like those of the Roman Catholic, 'do not grant to laymen any voice in the management of the Church, which is wholly in the hands of the clergy. The members of the Conference have, therefore, the power to carry out their views. What disposition is to be made of the property of the Church, in the event of a new division, remains, however, to be ascertained. Most of the Methodist Episcopal churches in the North are at present mortgaged for large sums of money. The interest on these mortgages is paid out of the contributions of the laymen belonging to the Church. We understand that a careful inquiry establishes the fact that, in many sections, the bulk of the persons who contribute toward these payments are opposed to the enactment of the new rule; so strongly opposed in fact, in fact, that should it be established they would, rather than become parties to a wholesale insult on their Southern brethren, decline to contribute any thing further toward the interest on the debt, and would suffer their churches to be sold under a foreclosure of the mortgages.

It is not unlikely, moreover, that questions may arise with regard to the legal right of the Conference to cut off any or all of the then existing vested rights. Whatever conditions a Conference may impose in future applicants for membership in the Church, it is extremely doubt whether it be in the power of that body to prohibit members who have already acquired and actually existing. In the sundry legal discussions of the naturalization dispute, it was admitted, even by those who opposed the measure, that no law of Congress could disturb acquired rights of citizenship. Why the rule will not apply equally to Church membership the advocates of the change will doubtless be prepared to show us. They will do well, also, to come provided with arguments to prove that the new law does the vested rights of the Church-members in the property of the Church, as well as Church-membership, can be confiscated at the pleasure of the Conference.

It is well that the ministers of the Methodist Episcopal body should look at this matter in calculating mind. We do not, of course, presume to offer advice where there are so many and so much abler heads ever ready to the call of religious duty. Possibly it may be for the advantage of most of the clergy of the Church to have a further split in the Church. But the laity of the Church are not competent to judge of such matters. Nor should we presume to offer an opinion as to the probable effect of the proposed rule, by which should throw a number of its most eloquent men and able preachers into the arms of Episcopacy or Presbyterianism. We may, too, in matter of which secular writers must, of necessity, be imperfect judges. But if the adoption of the new rule is to lead to the secession of many of the principal Methodist churches in the large cities, the event acquires a secular interest, and we rather think it will have an effect on the market for real estate.

THE LOUNGER.

THE GOOD OLD TIMES.

We all think our neighbor's garden looks so beautiful; that his house is so neat and convenient, and that his children are so smartly dressed. But then we don't see his back-yard. He doesn't come to us to see when he has a headache, and if he is scolding his children or quarreling with his wife when we call upon him, he becomes at once blind and deaf to every thing but honey.

It is precisely in the same way that people of fifty look at young people, and wonder if boys and girls enjoy themselves as much as they used to. Many an old bachelor hangs round the ball-room at Saratoga and Newport, looking on rather ruefully, and informing you that the days when he could Smile and Smirk celebrated Admired and the old-fashioned quadrille were the days. Then Saratoga was Saratoga. Saratoga is a spectre now.

The old fashion forgets that the old husband of an earlier date who used to say the same things to him. If we take people's words for it, the good old age was better than the memory of the eldest inhabitant of the globe.

I do not know who mentions the matter at all, who does not complain of the decline and degeneracy of the age. Carlyle does so here and there, and so two centuries ago did Luther a hundred years before, and Philip Sidney still earlier. Yes, and in the days of Noah and Adam and Eve and vexation of spirit?

Doubtless the world is bad enough all the time, but the comfort is that it is continually growing better. There are always great weeds in the garden, and it is only when we look back upon it that the garden to work, to be busily pulling them out. But if the less smart, and think that they spring up from the soil so two centuries ago, and Luther a hundred years before, and Philip Sidney still earlier of the race. But when the race has advanced five more centuries, the poets will come to the times in which we live as the good old times.

DIFFERENCES.

THE Philadelphia doctors have not the same reputation as the Philadelphia lawyers, whatever that may be, but they have eternally "respectfully" recommended the regular faculty to frown upon all women who practice medicine. And yet there is not probably one of the profession who has not been all the better in his youth for the medical care of his mother, or one of their women-patients who, could she be sure of the equal skill and care of a fellow-woman, would not prefer to be visited and treated by her during the illness peculiar to women.

It was only about the time of Queen Anne in England that women left the practice of these branches; and there is nothing in the whole range of the study and practice of medicine which the sex can say not be equal. Those who are not equal to it then, will be in the category of most of the ill-haired young gentlemen at medical schools. Capacity for mastering medical mysteries does not depend upon sex, but upon sense; and although there are probably very few women at this moment in the country competent to practice successfully, there few are as competent as is necessary. It is not necessary to insist that every woman who would practice must be of equal skill with the best greatest men. The five greatest physicians in the country do not treat all the cases that are given than the generals do all the fighting on the battlefield. That is done by the rank and file; and even the Philadelphia Council of Medical Censors, and the Pennsylvania State Medical Society—full of good men, and many of them our personal friends—both are—would hardly insist that nobody should serve as a soldier who was not in all respects the equal of the General. They would ask only to be a foot-hearted and nimble, and can be handle a musket?

While thus the Philadelphia doctors declare that women shall not help women in the very straits where women prefer women's assistance, and while a town citizen of New York have made the final arrangements for the Female Medical College.

It remains to be seen whether the National Academy of Design will feel it to be their duty to recommend respectfully to the public that it will not prefer the designs drawn by the young women who they give designs, to those of the young men whose of young men. We are not sure that we are not doing a great injustice to the Academy even by the question at all. But the question is raised, and. Would it be against the rules to admit Miss Bonheur as an honorary member?

It is about eight years since the school was founded by a few ladies, with an advisory committee of gentlemen, who, like the ladies, were at first the exception, never advised any thing so far as we have learned. But the committee remained silent, and when the Cooper Institute was completed, its founder did not hesitate to devote rooms to the use of the school; and to-day the most commodious, proper, industrial and amateur pupils, not under twelve, will be received in the evening, and the hop in the room is not occupied by the former. Amateur scholars will pay two dollars a term for drawing, and twenty dollars for the season. All will furnish their materials, and members of the engraving class their tools. Instruction will be given in nothing further, and the studies will comprise every kind of ornamental designing, with particular attention to wood-engraving. Specimens of the actual sales of the pupils' works for their own benefit.

It is rather a comelier business than respectfully recommending to women not to allow other women to cure them when they are ill.

THE LYCEUM.

It is almost time to hear the annual statement that the system of popular lectures has about run out. With the most perverse disregard of that important fact, we understand that the Lyceums every where are as busy as bees laying in their store of winter lectures. And the lecturers are as diligently making up their books as English noble men on a lyceum day.

There will be a natural interest to know of new lectures; and the Lounger has two to mention—Mr. Fitz Hugh Ludlow, "Behind the Curtain," and "Ben Eater" has introduced him into our literature with his quiet attention; and Rev. C. S. Henry, of Poughkeepsie, who has written a book of Evidences of good amusements will be found extremely good to take.

Of course nobody can puff a lecturer but himself. There is no dodging a failure. If a man goes upon the platform and speaks as if he were a sign he's badly, he will not be invited to go up there again. Moreover, we have seen how popular lecturers have been weeded, whoever enters the lists like the best of brilliant companions. Not one of them who thus fell but lacked the first essential—the moment when he shall find himself unequal to the position. They are all the merry of society, the quiet, more eloquent, more attractive men, whenever they shall appear.

May such incessantly crowd into the Lyceum. And may those who will then retire rejoice in the success of those who speak more wisely!

ANOTHER AFRICAN TRAVELER.

THE two works of Drs. Barth and Livingstone are among the most valuable, and the latter one of the most interesting, of modern travel. They take us directly into the dumb, dark continent, which is now the great field left for adventurous research. They show us the theatre on which civilization has almost to begin its work. No man can discover with the knowledge contained in these books.

The explorations are necessarily geographical. Africa is being tapped upon all sides, and knowledge oozes out of it, like the sweet sap of the maple.

Seven years ago Dr. Charles Beke published a "Summary of Recent Nilotic Discovery," for the various attempts in that particular department had apparently brought the problem of the sources of the Nile to a probable early solution. Dr. Krapf-locher had ascended the river to a point whence he could see mountains, only three degrees from the equator; and Captain Speke and Lieutenant Grant-ered the new peak of Kenia, which they supposed to be about one degree south of the equator; and in the enthusiasm of discovery Krapf exclaims, "I could not doubt that the streams flowing northward from the Kenia pour into the White Nile." But it is by no means yet settled, although recent discoveries of Miani, in Central Africa, and of the White branch is the main stream. All late explorations point to the Nile. Krapf discovered the great Lake Usambiro, a little south of the equator, as the source of the mysterious river. It is a fish-producing, sparkling lake. Its shores are rich plantations, of one of which Frederick Werne has written an interesting account. Two of the most recent explorations have joined the expeditions; and the Emperor of France has just fitted out another under the command of Miani, a Venetian nobleman. Besides, a young English-Indian officer, now well known by the books of Gerrard Street, has also recently contained an account of his visit to the Temple at Mecca, has entered Africa upon the eastern shore, and is now on the Nile waters.

Meanwhile, an adopted American citizen, of French birth, Du Chaillu, has returned to Paris in about four years ago, partly in the interest of the Philadelphia Natural History Society, and has given to the world the results of his travels. He is a few days from an exploration of a region hitherto quite unknown. Commencing on the coast of the Gaboon River, he has made five separate expeditions, penetrating several hundred miles into the interior, living with the natives, and, more than abundantly, and a race of negroes who, although confidentially described by Du Chaillu, seem to be of whose arts M. du Chaillu has brought home specimens.

Perhaps the most new to see. The mats and cloth woven of a strong native grass, are remarkable and fine for the delicacy of their work, and will be an evident aesthetic taste in the combination of colors and the effect of designs. The javelin, of which the blade is wrought of iron obtained by the natives, is singularly light and graceful.

Perhaps the most valuable and interesting information in M. du Chaillu's exploration will be the fact that he has seen and carefully studied the largest species of ape, and has quite settled their existence, and habits have been hitherto mainly a matter of report and conjecture. Du Chaillu has given a few weeks since Harper's Weekly presented illustrations and descriptions. So far as appears, M. du Chaillu's head is rational. The man is not, as does the living Gorilla; Mr. Bowdich, as quoted by Mr. Wood, says that it is "fierce, bold, and active. M. du Chaillu brings prepared specimens of the animal, of his own shooting, which we hope to see. He has also specimens of the living animal. The Gorilla is a gigantic and grotesque caricature of the human species. The head of the male, which can be heard four miles in the forest; and with one blow of his huge paw he can destroy a man. The natives call him N'Gina. He is said to be as his long arm quietly from a tree, catches an unwary passenger below, chokes him, as little boys catch sinners and big men linger fish—for fun. He is a terrible fellow—to mean the Gorilla, not the man. Many of the natives consider him to serve them up as scaller than the most depraved denizens of the town.

A work from M. du Chaillu, describing his adventures and discoveries, would be a valuable contribution to the literature of African research.

BOOK-BUYING.

TO a lover of books a book-store is inexpressibly attractive. To one who has an attractive taste to buy some precious volume enters the shop; but to the mere reader, the shelves are many other precious volumes which he equally wants that it seems useless to buy one; and every moment, as he looks further and sees more and more, he is more bewildered and delighted.

The man knows how many books there are which no gentleman's library should be without, until he drops into any well-selected collection. But he learns in these same lists and shops how many there are which his own library can never possess.

It is a most bewildering and delightful. Why go to Rome, says the sad sitter who has but seven months to spend, since I can not go to the Secret Cataract of the Nile? Why buy Gibbon's Rome, or Camden, or Anthony Wood—why buy any book, when I can not buy all? Why not, on entering one corner, surveying the alluring shelves, since I must leave so many behind? Would so gladly have Dalyte Shakespeare, Bohn's, but I have him at Harrington's Ocean—there are Wetton's Reliques—there is Gerard's Herbal.

Yet it would be a very foolish fellow who would not look at an opal because he could not see a diamond. Because Shakespeare because you can not have Decker—or Milton, because, until lately, Marvell was although not Andrew Marvell.

There is always this consolation for a book-buyer, that the best books are the most common and cheapest. On the day it is published there is of course an entire edition of any worthless work; but in ten years it is uncommon; in twenty, a copy is rare; in fifty, it is obsolete. Every man now living, who honors literature and respects books, may please himself with the conviction that his grandchildren will know nothing of Martin Farquhar Tupper, except as he himself knows of Amos Cottle. Who reads Sylvester's Du Bartas now? or Churchyard's Chips? Or Gorbo Ferrex and Porrex? Rarity has a charm in books as in all other material commodities. But the readers of books which are distinctively rare are men of quaint and crotchety, rather than of broad and humane, minds. A syllabus of a course of reading which should embrace the books that are best, and therefore most desirable in their kind, would make those which are most familiar. Because the books are read for some special intellectual whim of the reader, or to gratify some little vanity of seeing and knowing what others do not know and have not seen—not because it is something worth knowing and seeing. It is like any other fast whose excellence lies in its difficulty. It is akin to the mane feeling which leads a man to fly in a balloon, or to walk on a featherrock—because so few people have done it before.

A book-buyer is often secretly astonished at the dimensions of certain works, and wonders if any body is good faith to read over read them. Did we cause upon a huge folio, black and forbidding, in which, upon turning the leaf, he finds the title—for that than a cover—proved to be "The third Series of Papal Usurpations," by the tough old William Prynne. There was a moment's reflection upon each page. A man might begin his day's work with it, and end it by lunch at the luncheon; going on through the afternoon and night with the next page. What living man has honestly read Prynne's "Antiquitatis-mastix," of which there are more than a thousand pages? When we are equally come and go in the world, how much time must be given to eating, to business, to sleeping, to recreation—and then consider how many of these men and black lines of unstructured prose must be mastered in an hour—and then in a day, on a week, in a year—every page of which is by no means to these things? Macaulay (or is it Sydney Smith?) complains that somebody had forgotten, in writing his history, that he was writing for his own existence. Whoever will take the trouble to look at "The third vone of Papal Usurpations," by William Prynne, will perfectly understand the curious remark and the spirit in which it was made. 1845. How the Cavaliers must have hated people who could write such lengths of tedious stuff! and how the people must have thanked God who enjoined the Cavaliers who would not be edified!

There was a book in the Lounger's study several years since—he was a clergyman—advertised to an edition of Calvin's Works: John Calvin's, of Geneva. It was printed in Scottish. And the Reporter we had from this victim of an unwary subscription was that it was a very good book. The clergyman himself has gone shroud to travel for his health.

But as a week moment we subscribed, several years since, to Von Hammer Purgstall's "History of Arabian Literature." It is almost a book of stenography. Seven vast volumes, one of 1879 pages, are already issued. The work is perhaps half done, and there may be only 3715 unborn readers of the nine thousandth nine hundredth and fifteenth haveth the Mohammedan name of Diet Mohammed B. Ahmed el-Dschendi.

Mr. Alicone, in his admirable Dictionary of English and American Authors, proposes to include 50,000 different writers. He says, in his preface, that it has been estimated that of the 100,000 volumes in the English language, about 50,000 would repay a perusal. Suppose a person to read 100 pages a day, or 36,500 volumes a year, it would require 900 years to exhaust such a library."

So, as a man can not read all the books upon any the globe, he can not cover the field of literature by the most superficial reading. Let him therefore make his choice, and choose his book. Whole ranges and departments he may pass unnoticed, and therefore he will light with the more pleasure and delight upon the best editions of the best authors. The student of literature, when he has filled his mind with the knowledge and the taste made it, will find no pleasanter place in which to play the Lounger than the well-filled store in which—happy, if in the original editions—he may see at least the general aspect of famous books.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—Boccoman writes from Georgia, apropos of the robbery of the Chirigui grave:

"Do you consider the stealing of graves a legitimate source of wealth? If honesty can claim that it has any thing to do with it, I think it has a right to demand that upon the graves of Gracewood Cemetery to get the profits of the monument item, would be inscribed in memory a convenient villain? Ribbetcase have warmly counseled the Lounger to inscribe the tomb of Frederick the Great his sword and orders."

OUR NEWPORT CORRESPONDENCE.

THE latter was unavoidably crowded out of our last issue.

The Newport Festival.—The Procession, &c.—Grand Fête at Mrs. Astor's.—Dress Circle Gossip.—Belle-go-lasses Type.—Dresses from Madame Roger's.—Beautiful Women.—Miss F——y, &c., &c.

NEWPORT, Thursday, August 25, 1859.

YESTERDAY was the Newport Festival—the gathering of her absent "sons" and daughters to be welcomed and entertained by their kindred who had remained at home. The auspicious "23rd of August" was ushered in by a tumultuous ringing, at early dawn, of the bells of the town; and it might have been said of this as of Prospero's island, "The isle is full of noises, and sweet sounds that give delight and hurt not," though they did banish morning slumbers; but that annoyance was soon forgotten in the glad feeling that the good people had such favorable weather for their celebration. A rainy day would have spoiled all the holiday clothes and all the holiday feelings. As it was, all passed off most satisfactorily.

There was a procession, and a big tent in a field near this house, and in which there was much dancing and feasting. Gentle Reader, manners for two days before had come in laden with joyous groups, and the streets of the town were crowded with animated parties, evidently engaged in recognizing old familiar scenes, and in comparing the Newport of the past with the Newport of the present. We think there is always much to interest in any popular manifestation of feeling; and it is so seldom but in this country we have any thing like a fête for the multitude, that it was pleasant to see it so heartily entered into and enjoyed.

But there are other themes that claim our attention more; for besides the usual soirée dansante of the different hotels there have been two entertainment given last week by Mr. and Mrs. E. Astor, to which the élite of the fashionable set were sojourning in these parts. The grounds and shrubberies of this noble mansion are prettily laid out, and on this occasion were lighted and decorated with a profusion of Chinese lanterns; and the always graceful hostess, in that the dissatisfaction of not could fear no contact with dump when escaping from the heat and choking-room to the temperate coolness of the garden; that was enough for her shoulders that we met seemed but inadequately protected from the night air. Many of the ante-deshabille pocket-handkerief hastily thrown over the head. Nevertheless, the scene was quite charming. That the picturesque effect was increased by the absence of shawls and cloaks was certain, and the scene was indeed enchanting. Among one of some of the pictures we have seen illustrating Boccaccio's graceful poetry, and of Italian fêtes of vaults and ladies.

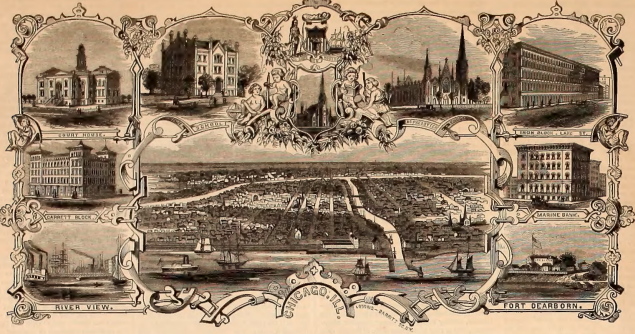
For these lovely ladies did not want for statesmen and soldiers and gentlemen to attend on this evening, for seldom any where have we seen such a number of gentlemen looking young and well assembled. It is certainly unusual in this country, impossible in France, and only to be equaled in London before the season is in the full "season," when the near approach of the "Derby day" has driven all the world to the race-course, and to the handsome manhood of England. We considered and speculated upon this fact in a philosophical mood, and concluded that it was to be the consistance that at Newport just now there is a collection of educated young men from all parts of our broad country; and on this occasion all the cities and places of "creme" for it, and the polished planters of the South and the solid merchants of the West were also well and worthily represented.

It was pleasant, too, to see that the type of the Anglo-Saxon type so decidedly predominating among days. And we sometimes feared it was dying out in the land, and that we should have inherited their father's faces, any more than their forefathers had their mouths, and noddles and the Frenchmen than we should wish those speaking the English language ever could be; but this evening we were reassured. There were the same locks and well-poised heads and well-grown limbs and the light blood; light-brown hair and blue eyes and the somewhat serious but unaffected and manly manner. We may cease to fear for a while too long upon this theme, but it is not always that we are so well pleased with our young countrymen, and to have the expectation of seeing realized the veracity of any by naming those (though we might easily do so) whose weight excelling in personal attributes and good looks.

But it is the turn of the ladies now, though we think they will have to wait a considerable time to be given to the masculines for this "once only," Miss F——y and many Parisian belles present in this party that one felt at once they had but just arrived from the skillful hands of Madame Roger and Madame Demorest. She was the result in each of them. And after all, there is a decided charm, and a very pleasing one, in a well-made dress. The lovely mistress of the mansion, it seems to us, would not so gracefully have enacted her part in the festival of the evening in any costume but what not have looked as very pretty in no doing—but what her fair beauty was set off to the best advantage by one of these charming dresses of Madame Roger's. It was of superb black lace, disposed in a number of tunic upon a white silk, and dark ribbons with stars of gold in them holding up this tunic-looking drapery in a voluminous and most becoming effect. There were present several of these famous tunic dresses of Madame Roger's, and they appeared to us to be the full and elegant figure like those of Miss L——y and her sister, and her fair beauty was set off to the best advantage by one of these charming dresses of Madame Roger's. It was of superb black lace, disposed in a number of tunic upon a white silk, and dark ribbons with stars of gold in them holding up this tunic-looking drapery in a voluminous and most becoming effect. There were present several of these famous tunic dresses of Madame Roger's, and they appeared to us to be the full and elegant figure like those of Miss L——y and her sister, and her fair beauty was among them in a charming; and like all fashions which differ from the prevailing one, they must be "très bon ton" to produce a pleasing effect.

And now, amidst the throng of other lovely women who crowded the saloons, and the apartments of this fairie scene, who shall first receive our notice? Shall it be those whom the world claims and salutes as the most beautiful, or those who may seem such to our own private judgment? Of course Miss L—— and her sister claim both of these awards. Look well at her, and you will say so too. Look at the regular features of the face, the well-turned head and throat, the brilliant dark eyes, and brilliant coloring of lip and cheek. This lady was admired, and she deserved, and the richest lace seemed but the fitting garb of her queenly beauty. And yet such fewer sweet and gentle and truthful she is, as all pretty women should be, but are not!

But the unmarried ladies, who always think so much of themselves, will think it is their turn now; but of these we will not make any notice due to them our humble comments. But there is one of whom we must speak, for her lovely face and her extraordinary most spiritualness. Miss F——y bears a name distinguished in her country's annals for the brave deeds of the men who have borne it as for the beauty of their sisters and daughters. This one has the large, lustrous eyes, and dark, thoughtful eyebrows, and soft yet rich coloring of one of Raphael's Madonnas, or perhaps one of those delicious heads of Andrea del Sarto, which seem so to unite the charm of girlish innocence with an air of spiritual meaning and mature expression. Our heroine was charmingly dressed in simply-flowing robes of white tarletane, and a few flowers well placed in the dark tresses.



THE CITY OF CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

THE GREAT GRANARIES OF CHICAGO.

THE awakening of the great Northwestern country has commenced at Chicago. The short crop of 1858, following close on the heels of the revulsion of 1857, well-nigh prostrated the Western States. For two years, or nearly so, the bulk of the Western people have been poor; their cities have not increased; their merchants have done little or no business; their railroads have barely earned expenses and interest. Now, at length, the bountiful harvest of 1859 has come to put an end to the long agony, and restore to the West its former activity and prosperity.

Chicago, the entrepôt for the grain trade of the Northwest, is the first point at which the recovery is felt. During the past fortnight the telegraphic announcement of large arrivals of wheat at Chicago has created quite a marked excitement in Wall Street. And justly so. Large arrivals and shipments of grain from Chicago will once more set the wheels of commerce in motion, and efface the last vestiges of the sad crisis of 1857.

We have thought that under these circumstances our readers would like to see pictures of the place, and of the great granaries, which are such powerful instruments in the pending work of recovery. We accordingly engrave herewith a view of the city of Chicago, and of its principal public buildings; also a view of part of the dépôt of the Illinois Central Railroad, showing the two vast storehouses of Sturgis, Buckingham, & Co. We propose next week to follow this up with other similar engravings.

It is hardly necessary to say any thing of the city of Chicago. Its miraculous growth—the extraordinary energy of its people—the public spirit they have shown in promoting public works—its unparalleled advantages of situation—its immense commerce—all these are matters of public notoriety, and justify the name it has won of the New York of the West. Men still live, and do not consider themselves old, who have owned farms in the heart of the present city of Chicago; yet last year the commerce of the place, as expressed in imports and exports, was one-fourth as great as the whole foreign trade of the United States. This, too, is the return for the year 1858, a year of general depression. The actual figures were — imports $91,036,000; exports $83,259. The tonnage was —steam vessels 8151 tons, sailing craft 58,771 tons. Very few cities in the world have such a future before them as Chicago.

It is needless to say that the staple trade of Chicago is in cereal products—wheat, corn, oats, barley, etc. It is the dépôt into which the fertile Northwest pours its annual surplus, and from whence it is distributed throughout the East and South, and the foreign world. A large trade is done at Chicago in provisions and hides, salt, lumber, high wines, etc.; and in a few years we may expect that the traffic in coal and lead will be quite considerable; but grain must even then be the chief article of trade.

For the reception of grain enormous store-houses have been erected at Chicago, at or near the principal railway dépôts. The two represented in our engraving are used by the Illinois Central Railroad. Each of these immense buildings is capable of containing 700,000 bushels of wheat, and 225,000 bushels can be received and stored in each of them in a single day. These figures fail perhaps to convey to the mind the actual quantity meant; it may be realized when we say that these two granaries hold enough grain for the consumption of the people of Chicago for five years. If the place were blockaded, these granaries being previously filled, they alone would supply every human being in Chicago with his usual supply of wheat for the period of five years.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER LI.

CLEARING AND CLOUDY.

IT was a very bare, melancholy room in which Aunt Martha lived; not only because it was unfurnished and generally desolate, with no other outlook than into the yards of the South Street stores, and the patch of sky over the South Street roofs. Not for these only, but because the woman who sat there clad in black, and solemnly and endlessly sewing by the huge basket on the floor, seemed to belong to other circumstances—to gentle friends, to a kind home. It was like a high, remote cave over the great sea of the city, scooped in a sorry cliff, with no bird to sing in it, no green leaves to wave and hang in it, no cheerful sounds of domestic neighborhood to soften it. Only, all day long, the hard roar of the town—only, at morning and evening, and through the long night, a stony oppression, as of a tomb, and the hard roar, the awful oppression, the sad sunshine, the dull lack of the South Street stores, the scant, poor pasture—all seemed to be ministers of divine justice, as the woman surveyed them, looking up sometimes from her work, and apparently pleased to feel how forlorn, and forgotten, and omitted in the world she was.

At night, when she blew out the thin flame of the candle, whose ghostly light had only served to make the desolate chamber more ghastly and more terrified with itself, she said, with a weariness that no soul on earth knew, "Another day is past, O God!" as if she had told another bead upon the black rosary of time. It was summer again, and she sat sewing in the hardest of wooden chairs, erect, motionless. Yet all the bleakness of the room was conquered by the victorious bloom of Amy's cheeks, and the tender maidenliness of Amy's manner, and the winning, human, indefinable sweetness which was revealed in every word and look of Amy, who sat beside her aunt, talking.

"Amy, Lawrence Newt has been here."

The young woman looked almost troubled.

"No, Amy, I know you did not tell him," said Aunt Martha. "I was all alone here, as usual, and heard a knock. I cried, 'Who's there?' for I am afraid to open the door, lest I should see an old friend. My knees trembled, Amy. I thought the time must come when I must be exposed to the world, that the divine wrath might be fulfilled in my perfect shame. I had no right to resist, and said, 'Come in.' The door opened, and a man entered whom I did not at first recognise. He looked at me for a moment, kindly—so kindly, that it seemed to me as if a gentle hand were laid upon my head. Then he said, 'Martha Darre.' I am ready,' I answered. But he came to me and took my hand, and said, 'Why, Martha, have you forgotten Lawrence Newt?'"

She stopped in her story, and leaned back in her chair. The world fell from her like forgiveness, and she wept—soft tears, like a spring rain.

"Well?" said Amy, after a few moments, and her hand had taken Aunt Martha's, but she let it go again when she saw that it helped her to tell the story if she worked.

"He said he had seen you at the window one day, and he was resolved to find out what brought you into Front Street. But before he could make up his mind to come, he chanced to see me at the same window, and then he waited no longer."

The tone was more natural than Amy had ever heard from Aunt Martha's lips. She remarked that the severity of her countenance was unchanged, except that a little strip of white collar around the throat somewhat alleviated its dense gloom. Was it Amy's fancy, merely, that made her think she saw a more human light in her aunt's eyes and upon her face?

"Well?" said Amy, again, after another pause.

The solemn woman did not immediately answer, but went on sewing, and rocking her body as she did so. Amy waited patiently until her aunt should choose to answer. She waited the more patiently because she was debating herself who it was that had brought that softer light into the face, if, indeed, it were really there. She was thinking why he had been curious to know the reason that she had come into that room. She was remembering a hundred little incidents which had revealed his constant interest in all her comings and goings and doings; and therefore she started when Aunt Martha, still rocking and sewing, said, quietly,

"Why did Lawrence Newt care what brought you here?"

Amy's answer was not original. It has been made as often as that question has been asked.

"I'm sure I don't know. I have thought about that."

Miss Amy looked as indifferent as she could, knowing that her companion was studying her face. And it was a study that companion relentlessly pursued, until Amy wondered that Lawrence Newt was such a gentleman that he could get wind of no distress but he constantly looked to see if he could relieve it.

Finding the theme fertile, Amy Waring, looking with tender eyes at her relative, continued. And yet with all the freedom with which she told the story of Lawrence Newt's large heart, there was an unusual softness and shyness in her demeanor. The shifting glances was more dropping than clear, a ringing voice was lower than usual, that generally full with such a neat, crisp modulation from her lips now lingered upon them as if they were something honeyed, and so uttered of more smoothness.

"Indeed, Aunt Martha, I should like to have every body think of me as kindly as he thinks of every body."

She had been speaking for some time. When she stopped, Aunt Martha said, quietly,

"I am glad to hear of such a man. I doubted if there were any such. But, Amy, although you have told me you are thankful to, you have not told me why he wanted to come here because he saw you at the window."

"I suppose," replied Amy, "it was because he thought there must be somebody to relieve here."

"Don't you suppose he thinks there is somebody to relieve in the next house, and the next, and the next, and the next since he left Eden in South Street?"

Amy felt very warm, and replied, carelessly, that she thought it was quite likely.

"I have plenty of time to think up here, my child," continued Aunt Martha; "so I see it is good that He has spared my reason, and I have satisfied myself why Lawrence Newt wanted to come here."

Amy sat without replying, as if she were listening to distant music. Her head drooped slightly forward; her hands were clasped in her lap; the delicate color deepened upon her cheek, now deepening, now paling. It was a woman's instinct not to seem to know what was coming, however sure she was. The silence was exquisite, but she must break it.

"Why?" said she, in a low voice.

"Because he loves you, Amy," said the dark woman, as her busy fingers stitched without pausing.

Amy Waring was perfectly calm. The rest of the busy city was softened and subdued here in that back upper room. She could not speak now. She sat to hear what her aunt would say next.

"I know that he loves you from the way in which he spoke of you. I know you love him for the same reason."

Aunt Martha went on working and rocking. Amy turned pale. She was not ready to say to herself what another had now said to her. Perhaps it was owing to the sudden consciousness of a painful thought, which entirely engrossed her mind. If Aunt Martha has seen this so plainly, why may not Lawrence Newt have seen it? She was half indignant with herself at the thought. But why should I be sorry if he has? she asked herself. Am I ashamed of—of—? Who could help it? Besides, there's no danger of his loving me.

Love is such a sweet skeptic. It would have impossibilities; and the greatest impossibility to the lover is that he should be loved as he loves.

A long silence followed the last words of Aunt Martha. She did not look at Amy, but she had no external curiosity to satisfy, and she was a woman, and therefore understood what Amy was thinking.

They were still silent, when there was a knock at the door.

"Come in," said the clear, hard voice of Aunt Martha.

The door opened—the two women looked—Lawrence Newt waited just long enough to shook hands with Aunt Martha, and then turned to Amy.

"This time, Miss Amy, I have caught you. Have I not kept your secret well?"

Amy was thinking of another secret than Aunt Martha's living in Front Street, and she merely blushed, without speaking.

"I tried very hard to persuade myself to come up here after I saw you at the window. But I did not until the secret looked out of the window and revealed itself. I came to-day to say that I am going out of town in a day or two, and I could not bear to leave Eden, for I know that I may do what I can to put matters straight."

He looked at the solemn woman as he spoke, but he used no address in speaking to her. It was only the inclination of his head that showed to whom he was speaking.

Aunt Martha shook her head slowly. "Why should it be?" said she. "Great sin must be greatly punished. To die, while I live; to be buried alive close to my nearest and dearest; to know that never thinks of me as dead, and is glad that I am so—"

"Stop, Aunt Martha, stop!" cried Amy, with the same firm tone in which, upon a previous visit, in this room, she had dismissed the insolent shopman, "how can you say such things?" and she stood, radiant, before her aunt, while Lawrence Newt looked on.

"Amy, dear, you can not understand. Sons and daughters of evil, when we see that we have sinned, we must be brave enough to resist in our own punishment. God's mercy enables me truuly to suffer the penalty which his justice awards me. My path is very plain. Please God, I shall walk in it."

She said it very slowly, and solemnly, and sadly. Whatever her offenses was, she had indeed her atonement with the dignity of a religious duty. It was clear that her idea of obedience to God was to do precisely what she was doing. And this was so deeply impressed upon Amy Waring's mind that she was perplexed how to act. She knew that if her aunt suspected in her any intention of revealing the secret of her shame, she would disappear at once, and elude all search. And to betray it while it was unreservedly confided to her was impossible for a girl whose life had not solemnly promised not to do so.

Observing that Amy meant to say nothing, Lawrence Newt turned to Aunt Martha.

"I will not quarrel with what you say, but I want you to grant me a request."

Aunt Martha bowed, as if waiting to see if she could grant it.

"If it is not unreasonable, will you grant it?"

"I will," said she.

"Well, my dear, I want you to go next Sunday and hear a man preach, whom I am very fond of hearing, and who has been of the greatest service to me."

"Who is it?"

"First, do you ever go to church?"

"Always."

"Where?"

Aunt Martha did not directly reply. She was lost in reverie.

"It was a youth like an angel," said she at length, with an air of curious excitement, as if talking to herself. "His voice was music, but it struck my soul through and through, and I was frightened and in agony, as if I had been pierced with a flaming sword that waves over the gate of Paradise. The light of his words made my self-love and more loathsome. Oh! what crowds there were! How he walked upon a sea of sinners, with their uplifted faces, like drowning souls in terror! How from his denunciation! How sweet the words of promise he spoke! How the attributes of God are a broken spirit; a broken and a contrite heart, O God thou will not despise!"

She paused, shook her chair, and stood with her eyes lifted in a singular condition of mental exhilaration, which gave a lyrical tone and color to her words.

"That was Summerfield," said Lawrence Newt. "He was a wonderful youth. I have heard him myself, and thought that I saw the fire of Pentecost, and heard the sweetness of Charles Wesley. I used to go into the old John Street meeting-house, where the crowds hung out at the windows and doors like swarming bees clustered upon a hive. He swayed them as a reed bends in a grain-field, Miss Amy. He swept them away like a mountain stream. He was an Irishman with all the fervor of Irish genius. But," continued Lawrence Newt, turning again to Aunt Martha, "it is a long while since I have seen him. I want you to hear."

She looked at him inquiringly.

"His name is Channing. He comes from Boston."

"Does he preach the truth?" she asked.

"I think he does," answered Lawrence, gravely.

"Does he drive home the wrath of God upon the sinful, rebellious soul?" exclaimed she, raising both hands with the energy of her words.

"He preaches the Gospel of Christ," said Lawrence Newt, quietly; "and I think you will like him, and that he will do you good. He is called—"

"I don't care what he is called," interrupted Aunt Martha, "if he makes me feel my sin."

"That you will discover for yourself," replied Lawrence, smiling. "He makes me feel mine."

Aunt Martha, whose ecstasy had passed, seated herself, and said she would go, as Mr. Newt requested, on the condition that neither he nor Amy, if they were there, would betray that they knew her.

This was readily promised, and Amy and Lawrence Newt left the room together.

"Miss Amy," said he, as they walked slowly toward Fulton Street, "I hope that, gradually, we may overcome this morbid state of mind in your aunt, and restore her to her home."

Amy said she hoped so, and walked quietly by his side. There was something very much humble in her manner. Her secret was her own no longer. Was it Lawrence Newt's?

"I didn't say why I was going out of town. Yet I ought to tell you," said he.

"Why should you tell me?" she answered, quickly.

"Because it concerns our friend Hope Wayne," said Lawrence. "See, here is the note which I received this morning."

It was open; he opened it, and read aloud:

"MY DEAR MR. NEWT,—Mrs. Simcoe writes me that grandfather has had a stroke of paralysis, and lies very ill. Aunt Dinks has, therefore, resolved to leave on Monday, and I shall go with her. The scenes very much affected indeed by the news. Mrs. Simcoe writes that the doctor says grandfather will hardly live more than a few days, and she wishes you could go on with us. I know that you have some kind of association with Pinewood—you have not told me what. In this summer weather you will find it very beautiful; and you know how glad I shall be to have you for my guest. My guest, I say; for while grandfather lies so dangerously ill I must be what my mother would have been—mistress of the house. I shall hardly feel more lonely than I always did when her wife was active, for we had but little intercourse. In case of his death, which I suppose to be very near, I shall not care to live at the old place. In fact, I do not very clearly see what I am to do. But when is One Who does; and I remember my dear old nurse's hymn, 'On Thee I cast my care.' Come if you can.

"Your friend,

"HOPE WAYNE."

Lawrence Newt and Amy walked on for some time in silence. At length Amy said,

"It is just one of the cases in which it is a pity she is not married or engaged."

"Isn't she always a pity for a young woman?" asked Lawrence, shooting entirely away from the subject.

"Theoretically, yes," replied Amy, firmly, but not actually. It may be a pity that every woman is not married; but it might be a greater pity that she should marry any one of the men who ask her."

"Of course," said Lawrence Newt, dryly, "if she didn't love him."

"Yes, and sometimes even if she did."

Amy Waring was conscious that her companion looked at her in surprise as she said this, but she fixed her eyes directly before her, and walked straight on.

"Oh yes," said Mr. Newt. "I see. You mean when he does not love her."

"No, I mean sometimes even when they do love each other," said the resolute Amy.

Lawrence Newt was alarmed. Does she mean to convey to me delicately that there may be cases of true mutual love where it is better for a man to marry? thought he. Where, for instance, there is a difference of age, perhaps, or where there has been some other and earlier attachment?

"I mean," said Amy, as if answering his thoughts, "that there may sometimes be reasons why even lovers should not marry—reasons which every noble man and woman understand. And therefore I do not agree with you that it is always a pity for a girl not to be married."

THREE IN THE MORNING.

Lawrence Nevt said nothing. Amy Varing's woman seemed satisfied with her answer; for she knew that her companion might easily misunderstand what she said; and yet there was no way to help it. That companion, indeed, could not divest himself of the feeling that there was some peculiar meaning in the words he had heard. He perceived the half-confusion, shy manner of Amy, which he supposed arose from the effort of saying what she had said. How could he guess that it was the result of Aunt Mabel's decision to send her secret to Amy herself?

They walked silently on. The people in the street passed them like spectres. The great city hummed around them unheard. Lawrence Nevt half-smiled to himself. "So you have waked up at last, have you? You have found that beneath the beautiful presence of a kind to you, it does not follow that she will one day be your wife."

His mind drifted away into sweet and sorrowful fancies. It had come at last, then—the discovery that he had hardly dared to hope—self—and, at the same moment, the perception that it was all in vain. Such was the strange way with which it had been conveyed to him only deepened and purified the feeling.

"At least," he thought, with tenderness and longing toward the beautiful girl that walked beside him, "at least, I was not mistaken. She is nobler and lovelier than I supposed."

At length he said,

"I have written to ask Hope Wayne to go and hear my preacher to-morrow. Miss Amy, will you go too?"

She looked at him and bowed. Her eyes were glistening with tears.

"My dearest Miss Amy," said Lawrence Nevt, impulsively, seizing her hand, as her face turned toward him.

"Oh! please, Mr. Nevt—please—" she answered, hastily, in a tone of painful entreaty, withdrawing her hand from his grasp, confused and very pale.

The words died upon her head and was silent. It seemed to her that she was suffocating, as his words uprised her in turn how strangely she had been mistaken.

They said nothing more. Arm in arm they passed up Broadway. Every moment Amy Varing supposed the merchant would take leave of her and return to his office. But every moment he was further from doing it. At length Lawrence Pfanner passed them, and opened their eyes; and Amy spoke to Abel.

"How long has Amy Waring been engaged to your Uncle Lawrence?"

To Amy the world had suddenly become so sad, sober world, in which there are serious duties to fulfill—which we must not neglect for transient dreams—in which we must see the dear hopes of our hearts wither and drop like the leaves in autumn.

When they reached Amy's door Lawrence Nevt raised her hand, bent over it with a solemnity, courtly respect, held it a moment, then pressed it to his lips. He looked up at her. She was standing on the step; her face, pale, overswimming with moisture, were fixed upon his; her luxuriant hair curled over her neck in jet, locks—youth, love, and beauty, they were all there. Lawrence Nevt could hardly believe they were not all his. It was so natural to think so. Somehow he and Amy had grown together. They had the same pursuits, the same things. He understood her perfectly.

Perfectly, he said to himself. Why, you are nothing but hand; you are kissing it with reverence; you are looking into the face which is dearer and lovelier to you than all other human faces; and you are as far off as if oceans rolled between.

CHAPTER LII.

IN CHURCH.

THE Sunday morning bells rang loud from river to river. Loud and sharp they rang in the clear, still air of the summer morning, as if the voice of Brother-in-law Bogerius, the genius of New Amsterdam, were calling the people in many tones to be up and stirring, and eat breakfast, and wash the breakfast things, and be in your places early, with bowed heads and reverent minds and solemn faces, when the last bell chimes you always have been and always will be, so help me Bob, I, Everard Bogerius, in the clear summer morning, ding, dong, bell, amen!

So mused Arthur Morlin, between sleeping and waking, as the bells rang out, loud and low—fortissimo and piano—flowing like a rushing, swelling tide of music along the dark inlets of narrow streets—touching and hearts with hope, as the rising wave touches spots of sunlight above. Come you, too, out of your filthy holes and hovels—come to church as in the days when you were young and had mothers, and you, grisly, drunken, bear-eyed thief, lisped in your little lessons—come, all of you; come! The day has dawned; the air is pure; the hammer rests—come and repent and be renewed and be young again. The old, weary, restless, debauched, defeated world—it shall sing and dance. You shall be lambs. I see the dawn of the millennium on the heights of Hoboken—yea, even out of the Jersey swill a good thing came! It is I who tell you—it is I who order you—I, Everardus Bogerius, Dominie of New Amsterdam—ding, dong, bell, amen!

The streets were quiet and deserted. A single gaze hurried by his window, and Arthur could hear its lessening sound until lost in the sweet elongue of the bells. He lay in bed and did not see the people in the street; but he heard the shuffling and the slouching, the dragging step and the bright, quick footfall. There were gay bonnets and black hats already stirring—every worshipper at the church of St. Steve's or St. Patrick's—but the great population of the city was at home.

Arthur, among the rest, a young man who comes hastily out of Thiel's, over Stewart's—a young man of foreign black hair and dark eyes, which look restlessly and furtively up and down Broadway, which seems to the young man already quite familiar and bright. He runs into a street with a bound. He hurries along, restless, disorganized—for Arthur was always thinking anxiously about, as if he were jealous of any that should see his yesterday was not over, and that another hour or two, as it passed, had been swept into the serene, open bay of morning. He does not see the people. He sees only thoughts together—calculating his losses; for the black-haired young man has lost heavily at Thiel's faro-table—several hundred pounds—remembering that it is Sunday morning and that he is to endure a long service in the Episcopal church, a young lady whose father has millions, if universal understanding is at all correct—and Arthur looks at the skies, at the bells boiling full of figures in a certain counting-room, and the story that will answer for the next half-dozen people in the world; the black-eyed youth, in evening dress, alert, graceful, but not remarkably well-dressed, who has a cab, speeds up Broadway, and does not seem to hear the bells, whose mind evidently does not run at all at play, and which are now ringing strange changes in the peaceful air: Come Next! Come Next! And if you're not! Come Next! Ding, dong, Broadway, come, come, come! Ding, dong, bell, amen-a-a!

Later in the morning the bells rang again. The house doors opened, and the sidewalk was filled with well-dressed, well-known men. It was a pleasant sight to see. Here was a whole city population in a pleasant mood—ready to confess its sins and to profess repentance, while to-morrow the bells would have gone mad, the counting-room doors would burst, the iron gates locked, and the sinners would do just how forty they had repented.

Boniface Nevt and his wife sedately proceeded to church—not a new bonnet escaping Mrs. Nevt's wide eye—not a single hair in Boniface as angel going home, as Gabriel Bennet said at his table, when he pinched with his utter Ellen leaning on his arm.

The Van Boosenberg carriage rolled along the street, conveying Mr. and Mrs. Jacob to meditate upon heavenly things. Mrs. Dagon and Mrs. Gerry Van Boosenberg, severally, in their way to learn how to love their neighbors as themselves. And among the rest walked Lawrence Nevt with Amy Waring, and Arthur Morlin with Hope Wayne.

Hope Wayne had heard the voice of the Dominie Bogardus, which by fancy had heard at the air; or was he obeying another Dominie of a wider parish, whose voice is heard in the heart? It was not often that the painter went to church. Sometimes he would look wistfully at the top of a house in Fulton Street, he sat smoking meditative cigars during the Sunday hours; too, he had many friends remonstrated. Aunt Winnifred, with whom he lived, was never weary of laboring with him. She laid good books upon his table in his chamber. He returned late at night, often, and found little tracts upon his pillow. Aunt Winnifred's pity for his future was all over my room." he said, smilingly, to Lawrence Nevt.

But when the bells rang they shocked him, and said, you can?

"Arthur, how can you? What will people think? Why don't you go to church?"

Arthur replied, with entire coolness,

"Because Van Boosenberg never goes."

Aunt Winnifred looked perplexed. Then she said,

"I'm afraid I should cut off my daughter with a shilling."

"Arthur, what do you mean?"

"Aunt Winnifred, what's the use of going to church when I've no religious goes, and is not the Lord disconposed? I am a child of the family of such a place?

Aunt Winnifred's eyes dilated with horror. She had no argument to throw at Arthur in return, and that reckless follow always had to help him.

"However, dear aunt, you go; and I suppose you ought to be quite as good a Christian by going as Van Boosenberg for staying away."

After such a conversation it fairly mixed facts in Arthur's room. The shower was only the signal for fresh hostilities upon his part; and for all the honest people in church, he was able to believe her nephew to be a very bad young man.

As he and his friends passed up Broadway toward Chambers Street they met Abel Nevt bustering down to Booker's to accompany Miss Flomer to Grace Church. The young man had bathed and entirely refreshed himself during the hour or two since he had stepped out of Thiel's. There was not a better dressed man upon Broadway; and many a hospitable feminine eye opened to entertain him as long and as much as possible as he passed by. He had an unusual flush in his cheeks and a jaunty step. Perhaps he was excited by the novelty of mixing in a throng of church-goers. He had not done such a thing since on summer Sunday mornings he used to stroll with the other boys along the broad village road, skirted with straggling houses, to Dr. Peevee's. Heavens! in what year was that? he thought, unconsciously. Am I a hundred years old? On Sundays then he used to see—Precisely the person he saw at the moment the thought crossed his mind—Gabriel Wayne—and to long to be passed her party, how much calmer, staider, and more softly superior than in those old Sunday mornings.

She remembered, too; and as the little, young man of foreign black hair and dark eyes, Mr. Abel Nevt bent in passing, Arthur Morlin, who felt, at the instant Abel passed, as if his head were on fire—large, and full of blood, and his movement stupidly awkward—felt, in fact, as if he were choked like a schoolboy. Arthur Morlin observed that, while his companion went on speaking, there was but a transient acknowledgment of the bow. The young man's head was not at all disconcerted for a moment only. And she did not change her color nor wear a different look.

Why did the young painter, as he observed these little things, feel as if the sun shone with fiercer heat upon him? Why, as he had never heard a bird sing so sweetly as one that hung in the window of a house, which by the way in that moment was he almost willing to paint Abel Nevt as the Endymion of his great picture?

They turned into Chambers Street, in which was the well-known church, and proceeded on to preach. Lawrence Nevt led the way up the aisle to his pew. The congregation, which was numerous, turned, to catch a glimpse of the church. There was a general air of intelligence and elevation in the faces, which was due chiefly of the New England type. Amy Waring saw no one she had ever seen before. In fact, there were few present in whom the whole New England blood did not run, except some curious humors of the city, who have a natural desire to see and hear a celebrated man.

When our friends entered the church a slow, solemn voluntary was playing upon the organ. The congregation sat quietly in the pews. Chairs and benches were brought in to accommodate the increasing throng. Presently the house was full. The bustle and distraction of entering were over. Every one looked at his neighbor, and composed himself to worship.

For a few moments a slight man, wrapped in a black silk gown, slowly ascended the pulpit stairs, and before seating himself stood for a moment looking down at the congregation. His face was small, and thin, and pale; but there was a power in it which expressed sweetness in the eyes—the irradiation of an anxious soul—as they surveyed the people. After the first impression, however, there was a perfect silence in the crowded church. Then, as Mrs. Gerry Van Boosenberg took the preacher, in a voice that was in singular harmony with the expression of his face, began to read a hymn. His head had a remarkable tendency, rising and falling with yearning tenderness and pathos, which, in the sympathetic mood which every thought, every aspiration of the hymn. It was full of reverence, gratitude, longing, and thanksgiving.

"While Thee I seek, protecting Power,
Be my vain wishes stilled;
And may this consecrated hour
With better hopes be filled."

When he had read it and sat down again, Hope Wayne felt as if a religious service had already been performed.

The simplicity and fervor and long-drawn melody with which he had read the hymn appropriated to himself, and the congregation after a few notes from the organ they began to sing an old German air, which, as it rose from the congregation until the church trembled with the sound, and the sauntereers in the street outside the church ceased laughing and talking, and, touched by some indefinable association, raised their hats and stood bareheaded in the sunlight, while the solemn music filled the air.

The hymn was sung, the prayer was offered, the chapter was read, and, after a little silence, that calm, refined, and solemn, yearning face appeared at the desk. The preacher balanced himself for a few moments alternately upon each foot—moved his tongue, as it rather to wet the words with moisture, and announced his text: "Peace I leave with you: my peace I give unto you."

He began in the same calm, simple way. A natural, nasty candor certified the truth of every word. Gradually, after a few words, his tone, and swinging, as it were, in long, waving hollows—a sweet, solemn, and yearning one—equally sustained. There was scarcely any movement of the hands or arms; only now and then the head was raised, or the body gently spread and waved. As he warmed in his discourse he was kind of celestial grace glimmered about his person, and his pale, thoughtful face kindled and beamed with holy light. His sentences were simple, simply, but with a rhetoric, no declamation or display. Yet the words and the thoughts were full of poetry and of that natural eloquence which, like a white flame, burned all the persuasiveness of the speaker away. The people sat as if they were listening to a long, bedded soul.

But the appeal and the argument were never to passion, or prejudice, or mere sensibility. Fear and horror, and every kind of physical emotion, so to say, were impossible in the calmness and sweetness of the assurance of the Divine presence. It was a Father, whose peace was inherited, whose message the preacher brought. It was a father's gentleness he delivered, as the Lord priest His children, said he, in tones that trickled like tears over the hearts of the people, although they were audible and unbroken. He went on to show what the children of such a Father must needs be; to show that, however sinful and wandering and lost, the Father had sent to tell them that the doctrine of wrath was of old time; that the eye to the eye and the tooth for the tooth was the doctrine of an imperfect knowledge; that a faith which was truly childlike knew that Christ was a present power, and that out of such faith alone arose the life that was Christian.

Wandering princes are we! cried the preacher, with a profound sadness in his countenance in his tone, while the very light of heaven shone in his face—wandering princes are we, sons of the great King. In foreign lands we have left our inborn, groveling with the very swine in the mire, and thinking of the husks that they do eat; emptying, defiling, hating, forgetting—but we shall not forget. We shall remember our rags and impotence and sin—in the darkest moment of our moral death, when we would crucify the very image of God in us, we shall remember.

Then, in a voice deeper and sweeter than all music, he uttered one brief, startling word—the common Father—"Forgive them, O Father, for they know not what they do!"

At this the whole congregation did not move. Leaning forward, with upraised eyes and beaming with love and longing, with sympathy, with hope, with quickened affinity, the vast motionless, seemingly unwilling to destroy the holy calm by stirring, they sat, and communed with their Father. There were those in the fortieth pew who did not hear; but their mouths were open with earnest attention, their eyes glittered with moisture; for they saw and heard the Father, and a mighty and strong was the common sympathy of the assembly that they seemed to feel what they could not hear.

Lawrence Nevt, Hope Wayne, Amy Waring, and Arthur Morlin sat in the pew that had been meant for them individually. They sat side by side. Each was alone with the preacher's thoughts and feelings! They were like solids who had breathed the cordial of mountain air—refreshed, invigorated, renewed.

Lawrence Nevt did not look round for Aunt Martha. But the preacher's voice, with its mingle of thinks of dry fields in a saturating summer rain. She sat through the whole—black, immovable, with her chin on her hand, and her face precipitously. They thought she was an incarnation of Sunday. Her features, cold, severe, hard, they watched her, could they but read if she had heard any thing to comfort or relieve her sorrow. From the first word to the last she gazed fixedly at the speaker. With the exception of the tears that fell from her eyes as the pulpit stairs she looked up for a moment at that pallid face, and a finer eye than one would have given to her in the first moment of cold, to kiss the hem of his garment. On and by sacrificing and self-denying life, by the soft touch of angels at midnight, is the stone rolled away from the door of the sepulchre.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE KANSAS GOLD-MINES.

We hear by telegraph from St. Louis that a special dispatch to the Republican from Leavenworth, of the 29th ult., reached Leavenworth at 4 o'clock that day. It says that the Kansas gold in the head-waters of the South Platte is confirmed, but the yield is not so large as reported. The difficulty owing to the distant location and the roughness of the route, in transporting machinery, is very considerable. The gold is found in the gulches and ravines of the Rocky Mountains. Valley. The express brought a large quantity of gold dust. Some of the miners have been on the ground for two months, and have taken out from $1,000 to $2,000 each.

A MEAN RASCAL.

One of the most successful efforts at rascality that we have yet seen recorded has been that of a man named Bryan, who has been operating in Philadelphia. It appears that a sharper in Philadelphia advertised for a partner in a business which required a small amount as teachers of music. Fifteen young women were accordingly found who were willing to pay the requisite sum for the privilege of the acquisition of healthy employment. Bryan, however, was not content with this small game, and he soon left Philadelphia. It was supposed that he had fled by the schooner that the ladies should deliver it to the captain of the vessel on the appointed day. On arriving on this city, en route for the South, the sharper was arrested, and a large sum of money obtained from them about one hundred and fifty dollars for their fee as "the captain of the vessel." Bryan was also arrested at the hotel for him to conduct them on board, as he was charged with his presence. The police have caught the swindler.

CANAL CONVENTION.

A Convention of the friends of the Canals assembled at Albany on the 6th inst., and was largely attended. Before their interests and secure the accomplishment of the projected enlargement and improvement and the means were present. David R. Barton, Esq., of Rochester, was chosen President, and a number of vice-presidents and secretaries, representing all shades of political opinion, were appointed. Resolutions were passed unanimously favoring the completion of the canals and the lowing of the rates of toll.

A MAGNIFICENT AURORA.

An aurora borealis of extraordinary brilliancy and effect was visible in this city and throughout the country on the night of the 2d inst. Between the hours of 10 and 11 o'clock the streets were admiring crowds of spectators, and the telegraph wires were literally burned out. The most vivid light appeared in the northern sky about half past 10, when it gradually disappeared. The hum of the telegraph wires was heard distinctly, and the aurora assumed a vertical form, flashing with amazing luminousness and spreading from the zenith to the horizon. Some of the fleecy skies of the heavens there were at the same time illuminated with the most fantastic formations, and of a most singular effect. There was a fresh outbreak at 4 o'clock in the morning, but not so extensive as the one previously observed.

We hear by telegraph from Boston that disquieting rumors were in circulation there respecting the appearance of the aurora borealis during Sunday night. It was more brilliant, and of longer duration, than had occurred for twenty years.

The Superintendent of the Canadian Telegraph Company's lines bringing from Montreal as follows, to wit:

"I never, in my experience of fifteen years' telegraphing, witnessed any thing to equal the magnificent extraordinary effect of the aurora borealis between the line and Fisher Point last night. The lines was in most

MORE REAL GHOSTS.

IV.

As I have had what would be popularly called A Ghost in my own family, and as that case of what I denominate "thought-impressing" was very strongly impressed on my own thoughts when I was a child by my grandmother, who was the narrator, I think I can give the narrative as first hand, in the narrator's exact words.

My grandmother was a woman of strong mind and good, bold, upright old Ugly (I mean that she held herself upright), who had no nerves to speak of, and such sound health that I do not remember to have heard, when long past seventy, that she had ever kept her bed a single day, "except, my dear, once when I was a whipper, "upon eight certain occasions" (she had eight children), "which can not properly be called maladies."

My grandmother did not believe in ghosts. "Yet, my dears," she would say to us, "I once saw, who should believe in ghosts but I? For when I was at school (a long time ago, as you may believe) I saw an apparition—"

When I was about eleven years old I was placed at a very high boy's school in the neighborhood of Sloane Square. Miss Lloyd, who kept the school, was an excellent person, and we were very well and very fond of her—fond, though a little afraid of her too, for she was a strict disciplinarian. I was very happy at that school, and some of my firmest friendships, that have lasted to me through life, were formed there. But there was a girl there, a Miss Hake, who was not exactly a dear friend of mine, but who, nevertheless, took a great deal of notice of me, in a droll, half-bullying sort of way. She was a good deal older than myself—she might be fourteen—and remarkably tall for that age. And she rather provoked me, because she treated me as a child—kindly—yet still as a child. I used to please myself by what I would pinch my little fat cheeks till they were redder than nature had made them, and by what I would call playfully—yet still she hurt me sometimes; and when she said, 'Now I am going to have a cherry out of your cheek!' I would run away, and hide myself in some dark corner. Still, I was rather fond of Miss Hake. She was clever. The thing had happened before. Miss Hake was a rich, a favored pupil, and her holidays were apt to be rather of the longest, as well as the merriest.

I mention this to you, my dears, lest you should suppose that much thinking of Miss Hake was the cause of the curious appearance which I am about to tell you of. I did not think about Miss Hake just at the time to which I refer. Indeed, I seemed to have forgotten all about her. No wonder! We were then in the midst of the holiday tasks, which (I am sorry to say) we had not learned—at least, I know I had not learned mine. Miss Lloyd was, at such occasions, rather put out, and somewhat of the cross-est. About her I was obliged to tell a great fib, my dears. To assure you, Miss Hake had gone quite out of my head.

"One evening—it was toward the latter end of August (our summer vacation was in July and part of August), our whole number—except Miss Hake, right o'clock, I was in my bedroom, with some other girls who slept in the same apartment (it was a large apartment it was), and very busy sorting my linen, which had just come from the wash. By the same token, it was a Saturday evening, for that thing was regular at our school. As soon as the linen was brought in, we had to sort it, and put it—this—if we tumbled our drawers—the inspectress, who visited matters daily, reported us for untidiness, and for whatever Miss Lloyd scored down. Our week's pocket-money had to pay for it. These regulations were evidently enforced, in order, as Miss Lloyd observed, 'to give us tidy habits.' On the Saturday night I mention I was very busy sorting my linen, which had come from the wash in a sadly mixed-up state. The bill that accompanied it was also in a sad confusion, as it will think some other girl's night-cap had got into my basket. At any rate, I was longer than usual sorting my things, and all the other girls had finished putting away their linen before me. They had all left the room, however, without my noticing the much notice of that circumstance. I had laid by most of the things in the drawers, and was now stooping over my little basket in order to take the last articles from it. Though it was getting dusk, the light in the room was quite strong enough to admit of my seeing my object with perfect distinctness. Suddenly—some feeling made me lift my head from the basket, and there, quite near me, close to the window, and, as it were, looking out from the window-curtain, though not at all shaded by it, stood Miss Hake.

"I called out joyfully (for I was really glad to see her), 'Oh! Miss Hake, are you come?' Miss Hake made no answer. I said, 'Oh! Miss Hake, won't you speak to me? How long have you been here?' No answer! Something else I said—I forget what—and I felt all of a sudden a little fearful of fear crept over me, because Miss Hake would not speak, and because she looked at me very fixedly with her large dark eyes. Still, my only idea was that Miss Hake was at her old tricks, and wanted to frighten me. Indeed, I cried out, 'Oh! Miss Hake, you want to frighten me!' But in the same moment I felt something of more decided fear, and an impulse which made me throw down the wicker basket that I still held in my hand, run out of the room, and so down into the eating-room, where the girls were assembled for supper. 'Miss Hake is come!' I cried out, now not the least afraid. 'Miss Hake is up-stairs! Miss Hake is—' where is she?' 'Up in my bedroom.' On which some of the older and more privileged of the girls, with a laugh and a mock rather angry, and said I had been trifling with them, for no Miss Hake was up-stairs. Then I said I had seen her in the room. Then the talk and the tumult attracted the attention of Miss Lloyd herself. I was called to her desk, and I told my tale—hair at the head of the supper-table, and closely questioned as to why I had not spoken to Miss Hake when I saw her. Miss Hake was come. I was known to be a truth-teller, and when I simply replied (trembling all the while) that I had not thought to it as to go herself all over the house to see if Miss Hake was come, Miss Lloyd, rising, left the room Miss Hake. Then it was hinted that the subject must be dropped—a hint which doubtless operated with Miss Lloyd herself, for she came no more firm to what I considered the evidence of my senses—and the girls of our room, who had been watched and in bed, there went about a whispered talk, and many a whispered surmise, why Miss Hake (if she had come at all, as she must now on the popular belief) and then gone away again. 'There was a ghost in the house.' That idea had been smuggled out of the house, after having in some odd way smuggled herself into it. 'There was a ghost in the house.'

"Now, my dears, I am not going to be a superstitious person, no one seemed even to surmise that I had seen a ghost. I was said to have been alive and well—at least when I saw her.

"Well, a few days, perhaps a week, had passed since the Miss Hake's supposed visit to the school. We were all assembled in the school-room, and going to commence our studies, when there was a silence. Miss Lloyd hemmed and cleared her throat, as if she had something out of the common way to say. Then, after making a lecture of some kind, for the time when we were lectured was generally a female one, Miss Lloyd rose, and, I among the number, thought guiltily that she had noted my idleness. But no! Miss Lloyd had not come to lecture, and drawing from her pocket a letter with a deep black edge and a deep black seal, she said, 'Young ladies, I have I am sorry to inform you I have just had a letter to tell me that your young companion Miss Hake, of Bridgeman Square, died last Saturday night at a little before eight o'clock. I need not point out to a delicacy, my dears, how you give way to fancies. I dare say Miss Bridgman will have a little party for Miss Hake, and I shall be alone in the dusk of the evening, and took the window-curtain for Miss Hake.'"

"Bridgeman, my dears, I do not believe in ghosts."

"But, grandmamma, you saw Miss Hake quite plainly. Now, do say, as plainly as I see you at this moment."

"Quite as plainly."

"And yet you do not believe you saw a spirit?"

"Not a bit of it."

This was all we could ever get out of my grandmother; and I believe it set me thinking on these matters long afterward.

It was an Honorable Envoy Extraordinary at the Court of Saxony who informed me that his brother Alfred was living at the time of the following supernatural impression, on his living in Ireland: that there was an old aunt of theirs, also in Ireland, who had been very much attached to a clergyman, who was much looked up to by the family; that this clergyman, Mr. Stothard, was desirous to consult her on some family matters that rather occupied his mind; but that, though he knew she was living, he was ignorant of the address of parochial duties, to go to her.

Mr. Alfred and his wife were in bed, in a room which opened into their drawing-room. Having not long retired, they had scarcely yet fallen into the heaviest dreamings of their respective first sleep, when they were roused by hearing a voice in the adjoining drawing-room. Mrs. Alfred said, 'I am afraid to her husband, "it is the voice of your aunt." The clergyman at once recognized that it was so. Both he and his wife, of course, imagined that the old lady had burst upon them with a sudden visit, and perhaps on some emergent occasion. But the voice said, "Don't be frightened; but get up, Alfred, and come to me. I don't want your wife. I will not have her leave her bed on any account." Mrs. Alfred would have remonstrated, and would have got up, but her husband interposed, and she knew the old lady to have a willfulness of character that would not be trifled with, she remained where she was, while her husband, hastily throwing on a few clothes and his dressing-gown, proceeded with the light which he had struck into the next room: leaving, however, the door between it and the bedroom partly open. In the sitting-room he found his aunt, attired, as usual, in plain, old-fashioned muslin (in a brown dress), sitting erect on a chair which she did not on his entrance rise, but waving away, as it were, all ceremonials of greeting, signed to the clergyman to take his place beside her. He did so; and the old lady then entered on a long conversation with him on the subject of which, as uttered by the two colloquists, was heard by Mrs. Alfred as she lay in bed in the next room, and had been by her afterward told to me. During the whole of the interview, consisting of a skeptic on certain points connected with religion. Mrs. Alfred was first discomposed, then more assured belief than formerly. After that she entered at length upon family matters, and gave Mr. Alfred all the advice and instruction he required on the subjects then agitating his mind. When this was done the house was searched, with the same negative result. That the aunt had not been there in any way personal to the living existence, received a day or two afterward, of her having been lying in bed dying—absent, not alive, at the time when the clergyman and his wife had supposed they were receiving indubitable tokens of her further existence.

This story, not only as regards the impression on two senses, but on the two senses of one individual, is remarkable. It is not an unimpeachable source, I have always considered of the highest interest. It would show that, under some cases, the cerebral agitation of a dying person is sufficiently strong to impress two brains—certainly one brain—with a distinct sensation one to the other.

There is, moreover, reason to suspect that even those peculiarities of the mind which are termed habits can produce apparitional impression on another, or others. From a valued medical friend I have heard a remarkable story, now, I am writing to this: A gentleman and his wife, being in bed, had simultaneously the impression of a female servant, to whom the husband alone recognized (for the wife had never seen her) as a lady to whom he had been long attached to be married. It turned out afterward that the spectral impression had been produced by the habit of the mistress, and by that of another person.

With respect to visual proofs of the mortuary manes influence, I might refer to a hundred attested instances. The following narrative is so remarkable, and is well attested, that, although it has been already given to the world, I shall preface with it those histories that I can give at first hand. It is from Dr. Kerr's life of Professor Stoddart, R.A., and relates to the death of Stothard's eldest daughter, who was killed by an accident on the carriage of thirteen.

After mentioning that the poor mind had been confused religiously, and depressed by a singular dream that he had had three months previously, Stothard says, Mrs. Bray thus writes:

"But there was a more awful, a yet more mysterious circumstance connected with the boy's death, which I should not have mentioned to you, but to which Alfred Stothard, on reading my first account of it, added very important information unknown to me, as he had derived them from his parents. I do not pretend to judge of it. It might have been the effect of a powerful mind, acting by a strong and anxious imagination; or it might have been a visitation from the world of spirits. It is, however, my place to decide what it was.

"On the day the fatal accident occurred, Mrs. Bray was sitting with her husband and father, and asked him to give him some money, with permission to go and buy fruit. His request was not granted, and he left the house. As it afterward appeared, on his way to make the purchase he called on a favorite schoolfellow to go and play with him. Mr. and Mrs. Stothard that afternoon proposed, what they often did in summer months, to take a walk together in the neighborhood, or in one of the parks. They went, therefore, to Mrs. Bray's room to make some change of dress. Mrs. Stothard had desired a servant to fetch a gown and bonnet for her daughter. The servant had neglected this last part of the order, Mr. Stothard was standing before a glass with his back toward Mrs. Stothard, when she suddenly exclaimed (as if addressing her son), 'Tom, what do you here?' A boy, very often in the house, and the tell the servant to bring up my gown."

"Mr. Stothard, knowing that his son was out by his punctuality, was in extreme surprise, 'What do you mean?' Tom can not be here; he has gone out with Mary.'

"I saw him but this instant standing by the side of the bed yonder," replied Mrs. Stothard, and a cold chill descended upon my heart." And she added, that, when she spoke to him, he moved strangely, seemed to stoop down, and was heard no more. She was greatly agitated, yet retained a perfect possession of her senses; but always began to doubt their evidence, when she heard a knock at the house-door. On eagerly inquiring who it might be, the servant told her that two strangers were below, asking for Mr. Stothard. She rushed down the stairs and wanted to know their business. They would tell her nothing, but persisted in their desire to see her husband. He in a haughty manner. They expected to speak with him alone. "It is about Tom," said Mrs. Stothard. In the greatest perturbation of mind. Mr. Stothard and the gentlemen went into a front parlor: the door was shut. The anxious mother could not restrain the feelings of agonized curiosity that possessed her; she listened at the door, and heard that her son Thomas was shot dead by a school-fellow, who was accidentally handling a gun, and who, not knowing it to be charged, was at the time happy how when they were about going out together."

A well-known medical man, whom I will call Sigismond, narrated to me the following:

"I was staying," said he, "in North Wales, at a beautiful but lonely cottage. I was in a melancholy state of mind, owing to the illness of an absent friend whom I dearly loved, and whom I knew to be in dangerously ill. One evening, late in autumn, I was sitting by a fire, which was agreeable at that season, but, as I am fond of air, had left unclosed the window of my little sitting-room, which opened down to the ground, and gave access to the lawn in front of the house. There was a bright moon shining out of doors, and I could see distinctly any thing moving in the garden. Suddenly I was aware of the figure of a woman seemed to me the face and figure of my friend about whom I was anxious. I did not see him as a shadow, or as an immaterial shape and coming of the body, but as a real material being, as completely external to myself as my own hand. I went across the little territory calling out and looking round the shrubberies for my friend, but as I saw nothing I began to conclude that my mind was under my fancy. So I returned into the parlor, saying to myself, 'I don't see him.' I sat down by the fire again, but with a sort of restlessness had taken a different chair to what I had at first, and placed myself in it so that my back was toward the door. The next moment I lost my recollection, and was not aroused from a kind of trance for a few minutes by the voice of my landlady, who had heard me fall heavily on the floor, where she found me lying senseless.

"'Well,' I asked, 'and was your friend dead?'

"'Yes, he had died at the very hour that, as far as could be ascertained, at the very hour when I thought I saw him.'

"'Well,' I repeated, 'does not this strike you?'

"'It is singular, certainly,' responded the Doctor; 'but my feeling is almost that I was in a disordered state, and that I might probably produce an ocular illusion.'

"Yes, but what say you to your friend having died at the identical time of his appearing to you?'

"'Oh!' was the reply, 'that is merely a mere coincidence;' and yet I consider it only as a coincidence.

It is remarkable how generally—indeed universally—I have found that, like Dr. Sigismond, the seers of apparitions were not believers in them. I do not find that fear or superstition has grown out of these visitations, but the contrary; and this shadowing hold, this startling narrative of a fact as a fact, argues, I think, an instinctive feeling that such visitations are subject to a natural law, and are not these real presences from another world, at the idea of which we revolt as with an intense sense of horror and incongruity.

Another singular fact, respecting thought-impressing by dying friends, is that nearly all the apparitions which have been related to me by the seers themselves have not come out of the bounds of good, wild, delightful, and natural, but of decent-looking bodies, who were remarkable for what is called "good sense."

A Good Fight.

CHAPTER XIV.

MARTYN went with all speed to Sevenleigher, where he found Margaret in a terrible state, but full of resolution and energy. She was just finishing a letter to the Countess Charolais, appealing to her against the violence and treachery of Glyn brecht.

"Courage!" cried Martin, on entering. "I have found him. He is in the haunted tower—just right at the top of it. Ay! I know the place right at the top of it. Ay! I know the place; many a poor fellow has gone up there straight, and come down feet foremost."

He then told them how he had looked up and seen Gerard's face at a window that was like a slit in the wall.

"Oh, Martin! how did he look?"

"What mean you? He looked like Gerard Gardaeus."

"But was he pale?"

"A little."

"Looked he anxious? Looked he like one doomed?"

"Nay, nay; as bright as a pewter pot."

"You mock me. Ah! then that was at night of you. He counts on us. Oh! what shall we do? Martin, good friend, take this at once to Rotterdam."

Martin held out his hand for the letter, but was interrupted.

Peter had sat silent all this time, but pondering, and contrary to his usual custom, keenly attentive to what was going on around him.

"Put not your trust in princes," said he.

"Alas! what else have we to trust in?"

"Knowledge."

"Alas, Peter! your learning will not serve us here."

"How know you that? Wit has been too strong for iron bars ere to-day."

"Ay, father; but nature is stronger than wit, and also is against us. Think of the height. The ladder in Holland might reach."

"I need no ladder: what I need is a good cross."

"Nay, I have money, for that matter. I have nine angels. Gerard gave me them to keep. But what do they avail? The Burgomaster will not be bribed to let Gerard free."

"What do they avail? Give me but one crown, and the young man shall sup with us this night."

Peter spoke so eagerly and confidently that for a moment Margaret felt hopeful; but she caught Martin's eye dwelling upon him with an expression of benevolent contempt.

"It passes the powers of man's invention," said she, with a deep sigh.

"Invention?" cried the old man. "A fig for invention! Wanted we but invention, the thing were as good as done. Every thing has been said that is to be said, and done that can be done. I shall tell you how a Yarmuthis knight won't shut up in a tower higher than Gerard's; yet did his faithful squire stand at the lower door and get him a cake, with no other crime than that of your hand, Martin, and certain kickshaws I shall buy for a crown."

Martin looked at his cousin, who stood in round in his hand, and seemed to interrogate it. But the examination left him no intelligible answer to read.

Then Peter told them his story—how the faithful squire got the knight out of a high tower at Bruela. The manœuvre, like most things that are really scientific, was so simple that now their wonder was why had such a thing for impossible a thing which was not even difficult.

The letter never went to Rotterdam. They wanted to Peter's learning and their own dexterity.

It was nine o'clock on a clear moonlight night. Gerard, senior, was still away; the rest of his little family had been some hours in bed.

A figure stood by the dwarf's bed. It was Stine, and the moonlight streamed on her.

With an unearthly noise, between a yell and a snarl, the grimalkin rolled off his bed and under it by a single turbulent movement. The cat's voice followed him in his retreat.

"Why, Gaby, are you afeard of me?"

At this Giles's head peeped cautiously out, and he saw it was only his sister Kate.

She put on her finger to her lips. "Hush! just the wicked Cornelis or the wicked Sybrandt have got in."

She then revealed to Giles that she had heard Cornelis and Sybrandt mention Gerard's name, and being puzzled by a great deal of talk, she came up home all day, had listened at their door, and but made a fearful discovery: a great deal of gold was in the haunted tower of the Stadthouse. He was there, it seemed, by their father's authority. But here must be some mistake; for they could hear their father ordered the cruel act? he was at Rotterdam. She could not understand it; but to hear her company to the fort of the haunted tower, to buy a word of comfort to poor Gerard, and let him know their plans, was impossible, and there was to release him on his return.

"Dear Giles, I would go myself, but I am afraid of the spirits that men say do haunt the tower. but with you I shall not be afraid."

"Nor I with you," said he. "I don't believe there are any spirits in Tergou. I never saw one. This last week has been the one ever I saw; and it was only you, Kate, after all."

In him that half an hour Giles and Kate opened their boundless confidence to each other. The boy made him carry a lantern, though the night was bright. The lantern would be more courage against the evil spirits," said she.

The first day of imprisonment is very trying, especially if to the horror of captivity is added the horror of utter solitude. To observe that in our own day a great many persons commit suicide during the first twenty-four hours of the solitary cell. Think of doubting such a fact when one has carefully from the impertinence of watching their little experiment upon the human soul at that stage of it.

As the sun declined Gerard's heart too sank and sank; with the waning light the courage and hope went out. He was faint, too, with hunger; for he was glad to eat the piece of bread which the brought him: and hunger always comes when. He sat upon the chest, his arms and his head drooping before him, a picture of despondency. Suddenly something struck the wall beyond him very sharply; and then rattled on the floor and fell. It was not an arrow; he saw the white feather. A chill ran through him—they meant then to assassinate him from the outside. Presently there was another arrow. He crawled on all fours, and took up the arrow: there was no head to it. He uttered a cry of hope. Had a friendly hand shot it? He took it up and felt it all over; he found a soft substance attached to it. Then one of his eccentricities was of grand use to him. His tinder-box enabled him to strike a light; it showed him two things that made his heart bound with delight, nose the less thrilling for being somewhat vague. Attached to the arrow was a skein of silk, and on the arrow he saw words written.

How his eye devoured them, his heart panting the while!

"Well-beloved, make fast the silk to thy knife and leave to use: but hold the end fast: then count an hundred and haste up."

Gerard seized the oak chest, and with almost superhuman energy dragged it to the window: a moment ago he could not have moved it. Standing on the chest, and looking down, he saw figures at the lower foot. They were so indistinct they looked like one huge form. He waved his bonnet to them with trembling hand; then he undid the silk rapidly but carefully, and counted one hundred by his knife, and lowered it till it ceased to draw. Then he counted a hundred. Then pulled the silk to draw what was on its end. He found that it had he came to a large hood, and by that knot a stout whip-cord was attached to the silk. What might this mean? While he was puzzling himself Margaret's voice came up to him, low but clear. "Gerard, dear, I will tell you. Stand by your hand." At the word Gerard drew the whip-cord line up, set one end fast on the knot, another knot, and found a cord of some thickness take the place of the whip-cord. He had no sooner begun to draw that up than he found that it was fixed to a heavy weight to deal with. Then the trash sedenly flashed in upon him. The cord was tied, pulled and pulled till the perspiration rolled down him: the weight got heavier and heavier, and at last he saw in the moonlight a sight that revived him: it was, as it were, a moving snake coming up the wall out of the deep shadow cast by the tower. He gave a shout of joy, and a score more wild pulls, and he had got a rope's end in his hand. He hauled and hauled, and dragged the end into his room. It was a rope ladder. He unfastened the upper ales of the chest in succession, and knotted it firmly; then not for a moment to recover his breath and thank God fervently, but to make sure that the snake was that the chest was sound, and capable of resisting the strain he caused in making the rope and across the window. He now mounted the chest, and from the chest put his foot through the window, and sat half in and half out, with one hand on that part of the rope which was inside. It was a moment of suspense; but the rope answered to his face and gave him the courage to risk what we must all lose one day—for liberty. Many dangers awaited him, but the greatest danger was first getting on to the rope outside. Gerard resolved. Finally he resolved to go down like a swimmer, his body to the waist being in the prison, his legs outside. Then holding the inside rope with both hands, he left the chest to its fate outside rope, and when he had got it he worked it in between his two feet, and so came down hand over hand over it by his right hand, while his left hand seized the inside rope. Thus he got to the ground, and passed the wall for his fingers to get round it higher up. The next moment he left the bar and swiftly and safely with the right hand over it; but in this manœuvre his body necessarily descended about a foot, and he stifled cry when he found it so low. Gerard hung in mid-air. He clenched his teeth, and nipped the rope tight with his feet, and gripped it with his hands, and went down hand by hand below hand. He passed by one huge rough stone after another, and at last saw green moss on one or two. He looked up and he looked down. The moonshone upon his prison window: it seemed a long way off. Scattering figures below seemed an awful distance. It made him dizzy to look down: so he made a stifled cry and looked up as close to him, and went slowly down, down, down.

He passed a nasty slimy streak on the wall, it was not so long. At one point he could touch the bar with his foot. He stole another look up.

The prison window was now way off now.

Down—down—down—down.

The rope made his hands sore.

Down—down. The window was so distant he ventured now to turn his eyes downward again and then, not more than a few feet below him were Margaret and Martin, their faithful hands upstretched to catch him should he fall. He could see their eyes and their teeth shine.

"Take care, Gerard! Oh, take care! Look not down!"

"Fear me not," cried Gerard, joyfully, and eyed the wall, but came down faster.

Down—down. The window was so distant he They seized him ere he touched the ground, and all three clung together in a common, rapturous embrace.

"Hush! away to silence, dear one."

They stole along the shadow of the wall.

But ere they had gone many yards suddenly a figure started out of the shade of the tower, stood, and lay across their path like a barrier of fire, and they heard whispers and saw a sword in hand.

"Back!" hissed Martin. "Keep in the shade."

They hurried back, passed the dangling rope, and made for a little square projecting tower. They had barely rounded it when the light shot trembling past them, and flickered uncertainly into the distance.

"A lantern!" groaned Martin, in a whisper, "many of the guard."

"Give me my knife," whispered Gerard. "I'll never be taken alive."

"No, no!" murmured Margaret. "There is no way out where we are?"

"None, none! but I carry six lives at my shoulder" and with the word Martin strung his bow and fitted an arrow to the string. "In me never wait to be struck: I will kill one or two ere they shall know where their death comes from"; then, motioning his companions to be quiet, he began to draw his bow, and ere the arrow was quite drawn to the head, he glided round the corner ready to loose the string the moment the enemy should offer a mark.

Gerard and Margaret palpitated. They had never seen life taken.

CHAPTER XVI

"I HOPE 'tis the Burgomaster that carries the light," said the escaped prisoner, panting with a horrible mixture of terror and exultation. "As a soldier, he knows, would send an arrow through a cuirass or a burgomaster as he would through a bear in a wood."

But who may foretell the future, however near? The low, instead of remaining firm, and hooting the deadly shaft, was seen to waver first, then to reel, and ere Gerard could draw the arrow-head back to them, his knee knocking and his cheeks blanched with fear. He let his arrow fall, and sank upon Martin's shoulder.

"Let me feel flesh and blood," he gasped; "the haunted tower! the haunted tower!"

His terror communicated itself to Margaret and Gerard. They could barely find breath to ask him what he meant.

"Hush!" he cried, "it will hear you. Up the wall! up the wall! Martin, take the rope. Up! Up the wall, as mortal creatures walk upon green sward. If you know a prayer say it! For hell is behind us, believe!"

"I have power to exercise spirits," said Gerard, trembling. "I will venture forth."

"Go alone, then!" said Martin, "I have looked on't once and live."

Gerard looked forth, and Margaret seized his hand and held it convulsively, and they crept out. The moonlight was so bright they could see the numbed them as they stood. Half-way up the tower, a creature with fiery head, like an enormous glowworm, was moving steadily up the wall: the body was dark, but its outline visible, and the whole creature was much less than human. Its size.

At the foot of the tower stood a thing in white, that looked exactly like the figure of a female. Gerard and Margaret palpitated with awe.

"The rope—the rope! It is going up the rope that the wall! It is Gerard Cornelis!"

As they gazed the glow-worm disappeared in Gerard's late prison, but its light illuminated the wall and showed the window. Then the white figure stood motionless below.

Such as can imagine their senses after the first frustrating effect of the supernatural are apt to experience terror in one of its strangest forms, a terror so dog themselves upon a terrible object. It fascinates them as the snake the bird. Martin and Gerard scarcely dared to exist while finely in Macbeth at Basquo's second appearance. His dung himself with averted head at the horrible thing, but a strange impulse never allowed Margaret. She put down Gerard's hand quietly, and never breathed a word, all in a moment, with a wild cry, darted toward the spectre. Gerard, not aware of the natural impulse her sex obeyed, and never doubting that it was drawing her to her perdition. He fell on his knees.

"Lord Jesus, receive my poor haste Marie, exercies vos."

Whether he was shirking his incantations in extremity of terror, to his infinite relief he heard the spectre utter a feeble cry of fear. To find that hell was not all fiends, but sometimes a woman, relieved. He redoubled his exercisms, and presently he saw the shape kneeling at the convict's knees, and heard her voice piteously for mercy.

Poor little spectre! It took Margaret for the ill spirit of the haunted tower, come flying out on it—to damn it.

Kate and Giles soon reached the haunted tower. Judge their surprise when they found a new rope ladder hanging from the prisoner's window! Gerard!

"I see how it is," said the inferior intelligence, blaming their own stupidity. "Gerard and Peter have come down this rope. He has got clear. Up I go, and see."

"No, Giles, no!" said the superior intelligence blinded by prejudice. "See you not this is glamour? Gerard is a line the evil one would entice to wile you to destruction. He knows the weaknesses of all our hearts; he has seen how fond you are of Gerard. Where should Gerard get such a procure a rope? how fasten it in the very sky his hand? It is the work of the holy saints perhaps us this night, for hell is abroad!"

"Stuff!" said the dwarf; "the way to hell is down, and this leads up. I never had the luck to go up such a long rope. It may be yours ere I fall in with such a long rope all ready reserved for me. As well be knocked on the head at once as never know enjoyment."

And he began to climb the rope with a cry of delight, as a cat jumps with a mew on a table where it is all the prettier for not meant for it. And the only concession Kate could gain from him was permission to fasten the lantern on his neck first.

Up he went like the ill spirit," said she.

And so, with his huge arms, and legs like feathers, Giles went up the rope faster than his brother came down it. The light at the nape of his neck made a glow-worm of him. His sister watched his progress with trembling anxiety. Suddenly a female figure started out of the solid masonry, and came flying at her with more than mortal velocity.

Kate uttered a feeble cry. It was all she could, for her tongue clove to her palate with terror. Then she dropped her crutches, and sank upon her knees, hiding her face and moaning:

"Take my body, but spare my soul!" etc.

MARGARET (panting). "Why, it is a woman!"

KATE (quivering). "Why, it is a woman!"

MARGARET. "How you frightened me!"

KATE. "I am frightened enough myself. Oh! oh! oh!"

"This is strange. But the fiery-headed thing! Yet it was with you, and you are harmless. But why are you here at this time of night?"

"Nay, why are you?"

"Perhaps we are on the same errand? Ah! you are his poor sister, Kate."

"And you are Margaret Brandt."

"Yes."

"All the better. You love him: you are here. Then Giles went up. He has escaped."

Gerard came forward, and put the question at rest. But all further explanation was cut short by a horrible unearthly cry, like a mixture of howling and shout:

"Gerard! Gerard! Parchment! Parchment!"

At each repetition it rose in intensity. They looked up, and there was the dwarf with his hands to his mouth, shouting, and his lighted with fresh life joy, and torn with diabolical fire. The light belted up his back, a mere indirect "transparency," never startled mortal eye. With the word the awful hop hurled the parchment down at the astounded party below. Down came the parchment, like wounded wild ducks, some collapsed, others fluttering, and others spread out and whirled slowly down in airy circles. They had hardly settled when again the superhuman roar was heard:

"Parchment! Parchment!" and down pattered and sailed another flock of documents—another and another, some falling on the grass. Peter, the fire-headed imp, with his light body and horny hands, slid down the rope like a falling star, and then returned to the astounded group for more of the immediate settlement for the merchandise he had so delivered.

"Hush!" said Gerard; "you speak too loud. Gather them up and follow us to a safer place than this."

"Will you not come home with me, Gerard?"

"I have no home."

"You shall not my so, Gerard. Who is my welcome guest? Nay, you will be after this cruel wrong, to your father's house?"

"Father? I have no father," said Gi gard, sternly. "I have had that was just like a cursed my jailer. I have escaped from his hands; I will never come within his reach again."

"An enemy did this, and not our fa!" said Kate.

And she told him what she had over and Cornelis and Sybrandt say. But the injury was too recent for his heart to heal. Gerard showed a bitterness of indignation he had hitherto seemed incapable of.

"Cornelis and Sybrandt are two ill curs that have snapped at their teeth for a bone for a long while; but they could do no more. My father it is that gave that order, unconscious of my crime, or not have laid a finger on me, that am a free burgher of this town. So be it, then. I was his son, and I forgive him. He had power to punish shall play mine. Farewell the town where I was born and lived honestly, and not in prison. Which there is another town left in creation I'll never trouble you again, Tergou."

"But, my friend!" Gerard!"

Margaret whispered her, "Do not gainsay him now. Give him time to recover."

Kate turned quickly toward her. "Let me look at your face!" The inspection was favorable, it seemed, for she whispered, "I am a simple fool and no mischief-maker."

"Kate," said Margaret, in the same tone, "I could not be happy without your love as well as Gerard's."

"These are comfortable words," sobbed Kate. Then, looking up, she said, "I little thought to have you for a friend." If he is willing, that infirmity will not let me embrace you."

At this point Margaret turned gently round to Gerard's other hand, and kissed her lovingly.

"Often he has spoken of you to me, Kate, and often I longed for your like."

"You, too, Gerard," said Kate, "kiss me ere you go, for my heart lies heavy at parting with you this night."

Gerard kissed her, and she went on her crutches home. Giles, who had been out of sight, was by this patient sigh. Then the tears came and stood in the dwarf's great eyes, but Gerard was a man, and noticed it not.

As they turned to go to Sevenbergen the dwarf noticed the parchments in his hand, gathered, and sought remuneration.

Gerard dissuaded Gerard. "Why take what is not ours?"

"Oh! spoil an enemy how you can."

"Have you any use for money?"

"How can they? Think you I shall stay in Tergou after this? The Burgomaster robbed me of my liberty; I would take his life for it if I could."

"Oh fie, Gerard!"

"Fie or not, it is worth more than liberty? Well, I can't take his life, so I take the first thing that comes to hand."

He gave Giles a few small coins, with which the urchin was gladdened, and shuffled after his sister. Margaret and Gerard speedily joined by Martin, and away to Sevenbergen.

CHAPTER XVI.

GHYSBRECHT VAN SUTTEN kept the key of Gerard's prison in his pouch. He waited till ten days after he visited him; for he said to himself, "A little longer sometimes does well; it breaks them." At ten he crept up the stairs with a loaf and pitcher, followed by his trusty servant, well-armed. Ghysbrecht listened at the door. There was no sound inside. A grim smile stole over his features. "By this time he will be as down-hearted as Albert Koetstin was," thought he, and opened the door.

No Gerard.

Ghysbrecht stood stupefied.

Although his face was not visible, his body seemed to love all motion in so peculiar a way, and then after a little he fell scrambling in, that the servant behind him saw there was something amiss, and crept close to him, and peeped over his shoulder. At sight of the empty cell, and the rope, and iron bar, he uttered a loud exclamation of wonder; but his surprise doubled when his master, disregarding all else, suddenly flung himself on his knees before the empty chest, and felt wildly all over it with quivering hands, as if unwilling to trust his eyes in a matter so important.

The servant gazed at him in utter bewilderment.

"Why, master, what is the matter?"

Glyabrecht's pale lips worked as if he was going to answer; but they uttered no sound. His hands fell by his side, and he stared into the chest.

"Why, master, what avails glaring into that empty box? He is not there. See here! Note the cunning of the young rogue; he hath taken out the bar, and—"

"GONE! GONE! GONE!"

"Gone? What is gone? Holy saints! he is planet-struck!"

"STOP THIEF!" shrieked Glyabrecht, and suddenly turned on his servant and collared him, and shook him with rage. "D'ye stand there, knave, and see your master robbed? Run! fly! A hundred crowns to him that finds it me again. No, no! 'tis in vain. Oh, fool! fool! to leave that in the same room with him. But none ever found the secret spring before. None ever would but he. It was to be. It is to be. Lost! lost!" And his years and infirmity now gained the better of his short-lived frenzy, and he sank on the chest muttering "Lost! lost!"

"What is lost, master?" said the servant, kindly.

"House and lands and good name," groaned Glyabrecht, and wrung his hands feebly.

"What?" cried the servant.

This emphatic word, and the tone of eager curiosity, struck on Glyabrecht's ear, and revived his natural cunning.

"I have lost the town records," stammered he; and he looked askant at the man like a fox caught near a hen-roost.

"Oh, is that all?"

"Is't not enough? What will the burghers say to me? What will the burgh do?" Then he suddenly burst out again, "A hundred crowns to him who shall recover them; all, mind, all that were in this box. If one be missing I give nothing."

"Tis a bargain, master: the hundred crowns are in my pouch. Now you not that where Gerard Gerardsoen is, there are the pieces of Glyabrecht you rate so high?"

"That is true, that is true; good Dierich: good, faithful Dierich! All, mind, all that were in the chest."

"Master, I will take the constable to Gerard's house and seize him for the theft."

"The theft! I cry! I cry good! It is theft, I forgot that. So, as he is a thief now, we will put him in the dungeons below, where the toads are, and the rats. Dierich, that man must never see daylight again. 'Tis his own fault. He must be prying. Quick, quick! ere he hath time to hide, you know—time to talk."

In less than half an hour Dierich Brower and four constables entered the hosier's house and demanded young Gerard of the panic-stricken Catherina.

"Alas! what has he done now?" cried she; "that boy will break my heart."

"Nay, dame, but a trick of youth," said Dierich. "He hath but made off with certain skins of parchment—in a frolic, doubtless; but the Burgomaster is answerable to the burgh for their safe keeping, so he is in care about them; as for the youth, he will doubtless be quit for a reprimand."

This smooth speech completely imposed on Catherine; but her daughter was more suspicious, and that suspicion was strengthened by the disproportionate anger and disappointment Dierich showed the moment he learned Gerard was not at home—had not been at home that night.

"Come away, then," said he, roughly. "We are wasting time." He added, vehemently, "I'll find him if he is above ground."

Aflerlian sharpens the wits, and often it has made an innocent person more than a match for the wily. As Dierich was going out, Kate made him a signal she would speak with him privately. He bade his men go on, and waited outside the door. She joined him.

"Hush!" said she, "my mother knows not. Gerard has left Tergoo."

"How?"

"I saw him last night."

"Ay? Where?" cried Dierich, eagerly.

"At the foot of the haunted tower."

"How did he get the rope?"

"I know not; but this I know; my brother Gerard bade me there farewell, and he is many leagues from Tergoo at this. The town, you know, was always unworthy of him, and when it imprisoned him he vowed never to set foot in it again. Let the Burgomaster be content, then. He has imprisoned him, and he has driven him from his birthplace and from his native land. What need now to rob him and us of our good name?"

This might at another moment have struck Dierich as good sense; but he was too mortified at this escape of Gerard and the loss of a hundred crowns.

"What need had he to steal?" retorted he, bitterly.

Gerard stole not the trash: he but took it to spite the Burgomaster, who stole his liberty; but he shall answer to the Duke for it, he shall. Look in the nearest brook or sty, and maybe you shall find these skins of parchment you keep such a coil about."

"Think ye so, mistress?—think ye so?" And Dierich's eyes flashed. "Mayhap you know 'tis so."

"This I know that Gerard is too good to steal, and too wise to load himself with rubbish, going a journey."

"Give you good day, then," said Dierich, sharply. "The sheep-skin you scorn I value it more than the skin of any he in Tergoo."

And he went off hastily on a false scent.

Kate returned to the house and drew Giles aside.

"Giles, my heart misgives me: breathe not to a soul what I say to you. I have told Dirk Brower that Gerard is out of Holland, but much I doubt in his mind a league from Tergoo."

"Why, where is he, then?"

"Where should he be but with her he loves? But if so he must not loiter. Those he deep and dark and wicked men that seek him. Giles, I see in Dirk Brower's eye malice unrelish. I know not why can not I fly to Sevenbergen, and bid him away? Why am I not lazy and active like other girls? God forgive me for fretting at his will; but I never felt till now what it is to be lame and weak and useless. But you are strong, dear Giles," added she, coaxingly; "you are very strong."

"Yes, I am strong" (thumbed Pepusilles); then, catching sight of her meaning, "but I hate to go on foot," he added, sullenly.

"Ah! alas! who will help me if you will not? Dear Giles, do you not love Gerard?"

"Yes, I like him best of the lot. I'll go to Sevenbergen on Peter Buysken his mule. Ask you him, for he won't lend her me."

Kate remonstrated. The whole town would follow him. It would be known whither he was gone, and Gerard be in worse danger than before.

Giles parried this by promising to ride out of the town the opposite way, and not turn the mule's head toward Sevenbergen till he had got rid of the curious.

Kate then assented, and borrowed the mule. She charged Giles with a short but meaning message, and made him repeat it after her, over and over, till he could say it word for word.

Giles started on the mule, and little Kate retired, and did the last thing now in her power for sher-pelkes: loved brother; prayed on her knees long and earnestly for his safety.

CHAPTER XVII.

GERARD and Margaret went gayly to Sevenbergen in the first flush of recovered liberty and successful adventure. But these soon yielded to sadder thoughts. Neither of them attached any importance to the abstraction of the sher-pelkes; but Gerard was an escaped prisoner, and liable to be retaken and perhaps punished; and therefore he and Margaret would have to part for a time. Moreover he had conceived a hatred to his native place. Margaret wished him to leave the country for a while, but at the thought of his going to Italy her heart fainted. Gerard, on the contrary, was reconciled to leaving Margaret only by his desire to visit Italy, and his strong conviction that there he should earn money and reputation, and renew every obstacle to their marriage. He had already told her all that the demoiselle Van Eyck had said to him. He repeated it, and reminded Margaret that the gold pieces were only given him to go to Italy with. The journey to Italy was clearly for Gerard's interest. He was a craftsman and an artist, less in this fourth place. In Italy they would know how to value him. On this ground, above all, the unselfish girl gave her consent; but many tender cares came with it, and at that Gerard, young and loving as herself, cried bitterly with her, and often they asked one another what they had done that so many different persons should be their enemies, and combine, as it seemed, to part them.

They sat hand in hand till midnight, now discussing their hard fate, now drawing bright and hopeful pictures of the future, in the midst of which Margaret's tears would suddenly flow, and then poor Gerard's courage would die away in a sigh.

The morning found them resigned to part, but neither had slept a wink; they were both much in doubt whether the hour of parting ever would have struck.

But about three in the afternoon, Giles, who had made a circuit of many miles to avoid suspicion, rode up to the door. They had been out to him, eager with curiosity. He soon turned that light feeling to dismay.

"Brother Gerard," cried he, in his tremendous tones, "Kate bids you run for your life. They charge you with theft. I am sure given them a handle. Think not to explain. Hope not for justice in Tergoo." The parchments you took they are but a blind. She hath seen your death in the men's eyes: a price is on your head. Fly! For Margaret's sake, and all who love you, loiter not life away, but fly!"

It was a thunder-clap, and left two pale faces looking at one another, awe-struck.

All the constables were at out-house and door, and so was Dirk Brower. Kate is wise, Gerard. Best give ear to her rede, and fly."

"Oh, yes, Gerard," cried Margaret, wildly. "Fly on the instant. Ah! those parchments; my mind misgave me: why did I let you take them?"

"Margaret," said he, but a blank: Gallsorrow no matter, the old caitiff shall never see them more. Fly! I will not fly. Where is the treasure where he shall never find it." Gerard then, after thanking Giles warmly, bade him farewell, and told him to go back and tell Kate he was gone. "For I shall be gone, my own, much hence," said he. He shouted for Martin; and told him what had happened, and begged him to go a little way toward Tergoo, and watch the road.

"Ay! and Martin," said he, "and if I see Dirk Brower, or any of his men, I will shoot an arrow into the oak-tree that is in our garden, and on that you must run into the forest hard by, and meet me at the weird hunter's spring. Then I will guide you through the wood."

Surprise thus provided against, Gerard breathed again. He went with Margaret, and father of Peter and Glyabrecht.

"Why this is as much yours as his," said Gerard. "I will read this."

"Oh, not now, Gerard, not now," cried Margaret. "Every moment you lose fills us with fear;" and see, large drops of rain are beginning to fall, and the clouds lower."

Gerard yielded to this remonstrance: but he put the deed into his bosom, and threw the earth in over the others and stamped it down. While that employed there came a flash of lightning, followed by a peal of distant thunder, and the rain came down heavily. Margaret and Gerard ran into the house, whither they were speedily followed by Martin.

"The road is clear," said he, "and a heavy storm coming on."

His words proved true. The thunder came nearer and nearer till it crashed overhead: the flashes followed one another close, like the strokes of a whip, and the rain fell in torrents. Margaret hid her face not to see the lightning. On this, Gerard put up the rough shutter, and lighted a candle. The lovers consulted together, and Gerard blessed the storm that gave him a few hours more with Margaret. The sun set unperceived, and still the thunder pealed, and the lightning flashed, and the rain poured. Supper was set; but Gerard and Margaret could not eat: the longest task this was the last time they should sup together choked them. The storm lulled a little. Peter retired to rest. But Gerard was to go at peep of day, and neither he nor Margaret could afford to lose an hour in sleep. Martin sat up a little, too, for he was fitting a new string to his bow, a matter in which he was very nice.

The lovers murmured their sorrows and their love beside him.

Suddenly the old man held up his hand to them to be silent.

They were quiet and listened, and heard nothing. But the next moment a footstep crackled faintly upon the autumn leaves that lay strewn in the garden at the back door of the house. To them who had nothing to fear such a step would have said nothing: but to those who had enemies it was terrible. For it was a foot trying to be noiseless.

Martin fitted an arrow to his string, and hastily blew out the candle. At this moment, to their horror, they heard more than one footstep approach the other door of the cottage, not quite so noiselessly as the other, but very stealthily—and then a dead pause. Their blood almost froze in their veins.

"Oh, Kate! oh, Kate! She said, fly on the instant!" And Margaret moaned and wrung her hands in anguish and terror and will remorse.

"Hush, girl!" said Martin, in a stern whisper; and even at that moment a heavy knock fell on the door.

POPE PIUS THE NINTH.

WE give herewith a correct portrait of the Pope, from a late photograph. A few years ago portraits of Pius were common enough. Latterly, since the French occupation of Rome, his popularity has declined, and his face has ceased to be an object of attraction. Now, once more, the Napoleonic scheme of an Italian Confederation with the Pope at its head has revived the interest once felt in the successor of St. Peter. Not a few, moreover, may feel some curiosity to behold the features of the man who, though Vicar of Christ, ordered and approved the infamous massacre of Perugia.

Pope Pius the Ninth was born at Sengaglia in 1792, and is consequently, at the present time, sixty-seven years old. His family was ancient and wealthy; his name is Mastai Ferretti. In early youth he was destined for the army, and it is said he thought that he had been almost born to serve some time in a regiment of dragoons. However this be, he fell in love, when a very young man, with a beautiful English girl, who refused to marry him unless he would become a Protestant. Declining to pay this price for a wife, and unable to bear the mortification of losing her he loved, Mastai resigned his ambition, entered the Church, and won golden opinions by his fervor, zeal, and intelligence. At the age of thirty he was dispatched to Chili to reorganize the Church there, which had been thrown into disorder by the revolution. His mission he fulfilled with such success that, on his return, he was intrusted with an important post in the government at Rome. He shortly afterward became Papal nuncio at Naples. There he won no little fame by the courage and disinterested kindness which he displayed toward the sick; the cholera was raging among the lazzaroni, and many priests, overcome by terror, refused to perform their offices to the dying. Mastai not only spent his whole time at the bedside of the sufferers, but sold his plate and carriages and devoted the money to their use; preferring, as he said, "to walk on foot so long as the poor of Jesus were dying in the streets."

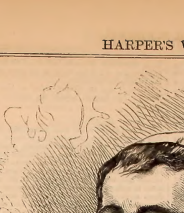
Under Gregory XVI. Mastai Ferretti, who had been appointed a cardinal, administered the diocese of Imola, in the Romagna, and by his skill and conciliatory policy contrived to soothe much of the discontent which prevailed in that region. On Gregory's death he was summoned to Rome to assist at the conclave which was to elect a new Pope. It was generally understood that Gregory's successor was to be Cardinal Lambruschini; Cardinal Ferretti was one of the warmest friends. On the third ballot he was elected Pope. His excitement when, to scrutineer, he made the astounding discovery, was so great that he fainted.

As pope Pius IX. commenced his career nobly. He liberated the thousands of political prisoners who had been thrown into jail by Gregory. He reformed many departments of the Government. He encouraged the national Italian feeling. He spoke openly against the Austrian domination. He saved a state for the head of the Church attracted the world's attention. Pius became the most popular man in Europe, and the excitable Italian people ripened for revolt. The French revolution of 1848 kindled the flame. Then Pius tried to stem the tide by reactionary measures. It was too late. He refused to be a party to any revolutionary proceedings, and provoked the most unpopular noble in Rome—Count Rossi—to be his Prime Minister. It was fatal. The Romans rose, murdered Rossi, took the government into their own hands, and imprisoned the Pope, who was only so glad to fly, soon after, afterward, in the disguise of a Bavarian valet.

He made his escape to Gaeta, where, for some months, he held his court. At length, the Austrians and their despotic allies having begun to crush out revolution, Pius was rescued by the French and Neapolitans. Ever since then he has been upheld on his throne by a French army. Now the French to leave Rome the old man's head would not be safe for an instant.

It is said by Monsieur About, who knows more about Rome than any other author of the day, that the Pope is a good man, but weak, and entirely controlled by Antonelli, who is the type of a sensual, narrow-minded, ruffianly tyrant. Certain it is that the recent policy of the Pope has not in any way confirmed the promise of his early career. His sympathies in the late contest were ever manifested on the side of oppression and bigotry, and opposed to the spirit of Italian independence. Nothing could have been written more absurd or more false in spirit than his proclamations after the massacre at Perugia, and his manifesto against his subjects in the Romagna. There are many who think that the Pope's condition will be improved by the adoption of Napoleon's plan for a Confederacy with Pius at its head. We are not of this number. Napoleon can well enough thwart the Pope's temporal authority has become intolerable. By-and-by, when he has accepted his new dignity, we shall probably see him quietly stripped of the temporal power which he has so shamefully abused, and his people freed from the worst despotism on earth.



POPE PIUS THE NINTH.

A TALE OF TWO CITIES.

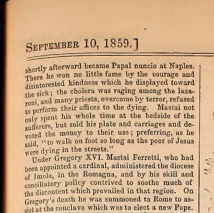
By CHARLES DICKENS.

BOOK II.

THE GOLDEN THREAD.

CHAPTER XXII.

THE SEA STILL RISES.



HAGGARD Saint Antoine had had only one exultant week in which to soften his modicum of hard and bitter bread, to such extent as he could, with the relish of fraternal embraces and congratulations, when Madame Defarge sat at her counter, as usual, presiding over the customers. Madame Defarge wore no rose in her head, for the great brotherhood of Spies had become, even in one short week, extremely chary of trusting themselves to the Saint's mercies. The lamps across his streets had a portentously elastic swing with them.

Madame Defarge, with her arms folded, sat in the morning light and heat, contemplating the wine-shop and the street. In both there were several knots of loungers, equally and unusually quiet, but with a manifest sense of power enthroned on their distress. The raggedest nightcap, awry on the weariest head, had this crooked significance in it: "I know how hard it has grown for me, the wearer of this, to support life in you?" Every lean, bare arm, that had been without work before, had this work always ready for it now, that it could strike. The fingers of the knitting women were vicious, with the experience that they could tear. There was a change in the appearance of Saint Antoine; the image had been hammering into it for hundreds of years, and the last finishing blows had told mightily on the expression.

Madame Defarge sat observing it, with such suppressed approval as was to be desired in the leader of the Saint Antoine women. One of her sisterhood knitted beside her. The short, rather plump wife of a starved grocer, and the mother of two children withal, this lieutenant had already assumed the complimentary name of The Vengeance.

"Hark!" said The Vengeance. "Listen, then! Who comes?"

As if a train of powder, laid from the outermost bound of the Saint Antoine Quarter to the wine-shop door, had been suddenly fired, a fast-spreading murmur came rushing along.

"It is Defarge," said madame. "Silence, patriots!"

Defarge came in breathless, pulled off a red cap he wore, and looked around him. "Listen, everywhere!" said madame, again. "Listen to him!" Defarge stood, panting, against a back-ground of eager eyes and open mouths, formed outside the door; all those within the wine-shop had sprung to their feet.

"Say then, my husband. What is it?"

"News from the other world!"

"How, then?" cried madame, contemptuously. "The other world?"

"Does every body here recall old Foulon, who said the famished people that they might eat grass, and who died and went to Hell?"

"Every body!" from all throats.

"The news is of him. He is among us!"

"Among us!" from the universal throat again. "And dead?"

"Not dead! He feared us so much—and with reason—that he caused himself to be represented as dead, and had a grand mock-funeral. But they have found him alive, hiding in the country, and have brought him in. I have seen him but now, on his way to the Hôtel de Ville, a prisoner. I have said that he had reason to fear us. Say all! Had he reason?"

Wretched old sinner of more then threescore years and ten! if he had never known it yet, he would have known it in his heart of hearts if he could have heard the answering cry.

A moment of profound silence followed. Defarge and his wife looked steadfastly at one another. The Vengeance stooped, and the jar of a drum was heard as she moved it at her feet behind the counter.

"Patriots!" said Defarge, in a determined voice, "are we ready?"

Instantly Madame Defarge's knife was in her girdle; the drum was beating in the streets, as if it and a drummer had been together by magic; and The Vengeance, uttering terrific shrieks, and flinging her arms about her head like all the forty Furies at once, was tearing from house to house, rousing the women.

The men were terrible in the bloody-minded anger with which they looked from windows, caught up what arms they had, and came pouring down into the streets; but the women were a sight to chill the boldest. From such household occupations as their bare poverty yielded, from their children, from their aged and their sick crouching on the bare ground famished and naked, they ran out with streaming hair, urging one another and themselves to madness with the wildest cries and actions. Villain Foulon taken, my sister! Old Foulon taken, my mother! Miscreant Foulon taken, my daughter! Then a score of others ran into the midst of these, beating their breasts, tearing their hair, and screaming, Foulon alive! Foulon who told the starving people they might eat grass! Foulon who told my old father that he might eat grass, when I had no bread to give him! Foulon who told my baby it might suck grass, when these breasts were dry with want! O mother of God, this Foulon! O Heaven, our suffering! Hear me, my dead baby and my withered father: I swear on my knees, on these stones, to avenge you on Foulon! Husbands, and brothers, and young men, Give us the blood of Foulon, Give us the head of Foulon, Give us the heart of Foulon, Give us the body and soul of Foulon, Rend Foulon to pieces, and dig him into the ground, that grass may grow from him! With these cries numbers of the women, lashed into blind frenzy, whirled about, striking and tearing at their own friends until they dropped in a passionate swoon, and were only saved by the men belonging to them from being trampled under foot.

Nevertheless, not a moment was lost; not a moment! This Foulon was at the Hôtel de Ville, and might be loosed! Armed men and Saint Antoine knew his own sufferings, insults, and wrongs! Armed men and women flocked out of the Quarter so fast, and drew even those last dregs after them with such a force of suction, that within a quarter of an hour there was not a human creature in Saint Antoine's bosom but a few old crones and the wailing children.

No. They were all by that time choking the Hall of examination where this old man, ugly and wicked, was, and overflowing into the adjacent open space and streets. The Defarges, husband and wife, The Vengeance, and Jacques Three, were in the first press, and at the great distance from him in the Hall.

"See!" cried madame, pointing with her knife. "See the old villain bound with ropes. That was well done to tie a bunch of grass upon his back. Ha, ha! That was well done. Let him eat it now!" Madame put her knife under her arm, and folded her hands as in a play.

The people immediately behind Madame Defarge, explaining the cause of her satisfaction to those behind them, and those again explaining to others, and those to others, the neighboring streets resounded with the clapping of hands. Similarly, during two or three hours of drawl, and the winnowing of many bushels of words, Madame Defarge's frequent expressions of impatience were taken up, with marvelous quickness, at a distance: the more readily because certain men, who had by some wonderful exercise of agility climbed up the external architecture to look in from the windows, knew Madame Defarge well, and acted as a telegraph between her and the crowd outside the building.

At length the sun rose so high that it struck a kindly ray, as of hope or protection, directly down upon the old prisoner's head. The favor was too much to bear; in an instant the barrier of dust and chaff that had stood surprisingly long went to the winds, and Saint Antoine had got him!

It was known directly to the furthest confines of the crowd. Defarge had but sprung over a railing and a table, and folded the miserable wretch in a deadly embrace—Madame Defarge had but folded her arms, and turned her hand in one of the ropes with which he was tied—The Vengeance and Jacques Three were not yet up with them, but the men at the window had not yet swooped into the Hall, like birds of prey, from their high perches—when the cry seemed to go up, all over the city, "Bring him out! Bring him to the lamp!"

"HE TOOK OUT A BLACKENED PIPE."

Down, and up, and head foremost on the steps of the building; now, on his knees; now, on his feet; now, on his back; dragged, and struck at, and stifled by the bunches of grass and straw that were thrust into his face by hundreds of hands; torn, bruised, panting, bleeding, yet always entreating and beseeching for mercy—in all of vehement agony of action, with a small clear space about him as the people drew one another back that they might see; now, a log of dead wood drawn through a forest of legs; he was hauled to the nearest street corner where one of the fatal lamps swung, and there Madame Defarge let him go—as a cat might let a mouse go—and silently and composedly looked at him while they made all ready and while he remained for the women passionately screeching at him all the time, and the men sternly calling out to have him held with grass in his mouth. Then, he went aloft, and the rope broke, and they caught him shrieking; twice, he went aloft, and the rope broke, and they caught him shrieking; then, the rope was mercifully and held him, and his head was not yet upon a pike, but high enough in the mouth for all Saint Antoine to dance at the sight of."

Nor was this the end of the day's bad work, for Saint Antoine so shouted and danced the angry tune that it led to trouble afterwards, bearing when the day closed in that the son-in-law of the despatched, another of the people's enemies and insulters, was coming into Paris under a guard five hundred strong, in cavalry alone. Saint Antoine wore the branches, this darling object of paper, seized him—would have torn him out of the midst of an army of the best—in small company—set his head and heart on pikes, and carried the three spoils of the day in Wolf-procession through the streets.

Not before dark night did the men and women come back to the children, who were breathless. Then the miserable bakers' shops were beset by long files of them, patiently waiting for so long bad and; and when the sky was veiled with stomachs faint and empty, they beguiled the time by embracing one another on account of the triumphs of the day, and achieving them again in gossip. Gradually these strings of ragged people shortened and fell into knots, and then poor blighted things were to be seen in high windows, and since fire fires were to be seen at doors, at which neighbors cooked in common, afterward supping at their doors.

Scarce and insufficient suppers those, and innocent of meat, as of most other sauce to wretched bread. Yet human fellowship sweetened even nourishment into the finny viands, and struck some spark of cheerfulness out of them. Then came and mothers, who had had their full share in the worst of the day, played gently with their meagre children, who, tired out, fell asleep and so passed from before them, loved and hoped.

It was always evening when Defarge's wine-shop parted with its last knot of customers, and Monsieur Defarge said to madame his wife, in husky tones, while fastening the door:

"At last it is come, my dear!"

"It will be welcome, monsieur." "Almost."

Saint Antoine slept, the Defarges slept; even The Vengeance slept with her starved grocer, and the drum was at rest. The drum's was the only voice in Saint Antoine that should and hurry had not stopped. The tocsin, appointed to sunsolon of the drum, could have wakened him up and had the same speech out of him as before the Bastile fell or old Foulon was seen with a bundle of hay in his mouth, and the women in Saint Antoine's bosom.

CHAPTER XXIII.

FIRE RISES.

There was a change on the village where the fountain fell, and where the mender of roads went forth daily to hammer out of the stones on the highway such morsels of bread as might serve for grass and leaf, his poor grandmother and his poor reduced body together. The prison on the crag was not so dominant as of yore; there were seen to guard it, labourers repairing there were officers to guard the soldiers, but not one of them was what his nose was there to suspect and think that it would probably not be what he was employed as.

Far and wide lay a ruined country yielding nothing but desolation. Every green leaf, every blade of grass and cake of earth seemed shriveled and poor as the miserable people. Every thing was burned, down, dejected, oppressed, and broken. Habitations, fields, domestic animals, men, women, children, and the soil that bore them, all worn out.

Monsigneur was undoubtedly a national blessing, a gentleman of a chivalrous tone to things, a polite example of luxurious and weeding life, and a great deal more to equal purpose; nevertheless Monsigneur as a class, somehow or other, brought things to this. Strange that Creation, favouring especially for Monsigneur, should be so soon wrung dry and squeezed out! There must be something short-sighted in the eternal arrangements surely! But, there it was: over; and the last drop of blood having been extracted from the flint, and the last screw of the rack having been turned so often that its purchase crumbled, and it now turned and turned with nothing to bite, Monsigneur began to run away from a phenomenon so low and unaccountable.

But this was not the change on the village, and on many a village like it. For scores of years gone by Monsigneur had squeezed it and wrung it to his heart's content, and had seldom graced it with his presence except for the pleasures of the chase—now found in hunting the people; now found in hunting the bears, for whose preservation Monsigneur made edifying spaces of barbarous and barren wilderness. No. The change consisted in the appearance of strange faces of low caste, rather than in the disappearance of the high-caste faces, and the rise in the beautiful and bestifying features of Monsigneur.

For in these times, as the mender of roads worked, solitary, in the dust, not often troubling himself to reflect that dust he was kneading in two water, being for the most part too much occupied in thinking how little he had for it and how much he wanted it, looked at it as he had it—in these times, as he raised his eyes from his lonely work and viewed things around, he would see some rough figure approaching on foot, the like of which was once a rarity in those parts, but was now a frequent presence. As it advanced the mender of roads would discern that it was a shabby man of rough and homely man, of almost barbarian aspect, tall, in wooden shoes that were clumsy even to the eyes of a mender of roads, grim, swarthy, unkempt, ragged in the mud and dust of many highways, dark with the sunburn of summer and winter, and sprinkled with the thorns and leaves and moss of many by-ways through woods.

Such a man would come with, like a ghost, at noon in the July weather, as he sat on his heap of stones under a bank, taking such shelter as he could get from a shower of hail.

The man looked at him, locked at the village in the hollow and the mill, and the prison on the crag. When he had identified these objects in what he brought with him, he said, in a dialect that was just intelligible:

"How goes it, Jacques?"

"All well, brother!"

"Touch then!"

They joined hands, and the man sat down on the heap of stones.

"No chance?"

"Nothing but supper now," said the mender of roads, with a hungry face.

"It is the humour," grumbled the man. "I meet no dinner any where."

He took out a blackened pipe, filled it, lighted it at a match, and smoked, pulled at it until he was in a bright glow: then suddenly held it from his mouth and spoke, stretching the arm between his finger and thumb, that blazed and went out in a puff of smoke.

"Show me!" he said, with a turn of the mender of roads to say it this time, after observing those operations. They again joined hands.

"To-night?" said the mender of roads.

"To-night," said the man, putting the pipe into his mouth.

"Where?"

"Here."

He and the mender of roads sat on the heap of stones looking silently at one another, with the hot light of midsummer on the dry, stony ruins of the village, and the sky began to clear over the village.

"Show me!" said the traveler then, moving to the brow of the hill.

The mender of roads the mender of roads, with extended finger. "You go down here, and straight through the village, and past the fountain—"

"To the Devil with all that!" interrupted the other, rolling his eyes over the landscape. "I go through no streets and past no fountains. Which?"

"Well! About two leagues beyond the summit of that hill above the village."

"Good. When do you work?"

"At sunset."

"What! You will wake me before departing? I have walked two nights without resting. Let me finish my pipe, and I shall sleep like a child. Will you wake me?"

"Surely."

The stranger smoked his pipe out, put it in his breast, slipped off his great wooden shoes, and lay down on his back on the heap of stones. He was fast asleep directly.

As the road-mender plod his dusty labor, and the stranger lay asleep, the pair on the heap of bars and streaks of sky which were responded to by silver gleams upon the landscape, the little man who wore a red cap on the back of his blue cosy seemed fascinated by the figure that lay sleeping on the heap. He seemed to be turned toward it that he used his tools mechanically; and, one would have said, to very poor account. The bronze face, the rough swarthy hair and beard, the coarse woolen red cap, the rough hempen frock of home-spun stuff and hempen skins of beasts, the powerful frame attenuated by spare living, and the sullen and desperate expression of the lips in sleep, inspired the mender of roads with awe. The traveler had travelled far, by all indications; certainly far on ankles chafed and bleeding; his great shoes, stuffed with leaves and grass, had been tied to his feet with hempen cords, that had now mostly given to the track or were cut to pieces by the stones. Stockings, soft once, had long since yielded to the same fate. Hands and face, neck and body, were bruised, scratched, and torn; and the dust of many highways, dark in the sunburn, lay thick upon him.

Who was this man? thought the mender of roads, one hand on his heap of stones. Was he a messenger from the village? Was he broken out of the prison on the crag? Was he a soldier? Was he a deserter? Was he a bandit? Was he some one who had taken life in a quarrel? He might be any thing that was bad, but he looked like a man to whom violence was familiar. Public violence, rather than private, for in his sleep he had the air of one who was used to be waited on, not of one who waited on himself.

Then the mender of roads, having got his tools together and all things ready to go down into the village, roused him.

"Good!" said the sleeper, rising on his elbow. "Two leagues beyond the summit of the hill?"

"About."

"About. Good!"

The mender of roads went home, with the dust going on before him according to the set of the wind, and was soon at the fountain, squeezing himself carefully through the crowd gathered there for drink, and appearing even to whisper to them in his passage. He remained there, however, but a few moments, to take his poor supper it did not creep to bed, as it usually did, but came out of doors again, and remained there. A certain contagion of whispering was upon it, and also upon the gathered groups at the doors of houses, in the dark, another curious contagion of looking expectantly at the sky in one direction only. Monsieur Defarge, as the mender of roads happened to see, was not among the people out, but his wife was, and so was the bronze woman, and so were many women whom he knew. Some of these were at their doors, but the majority were in the street. Instead of going to bed, or lighting candles within doors, the people of the village were enjoying the coolness of the outside air.

The village had its little wine-shop, since the mender of roads went to work in it, as usual. Thither he directed his way, purposing to drink, and appearing even to whisper to them in his passage. He came out presently, with a jug of wine, and took it to his place of work, and other workers resorted thither and brought drinking vessels, and shared it in little knots.

Monsieur Defarge, prominent in the midst of these knots, was drinking and talking with the rest, when the mender of roads went by him, and hailed him by name, as a friend whom he expected to see shortly.

Monsieur Defarge responded, and sauntered over to where he sat on his stones, and stood over him, talking.

"Show me!" said the traveler, when he came within hearing.

"Show me!" said the mender of roads, with a stretched

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
FOR SEPTEMBER.
Whoever has had occasion to consult the past volumes of the Magazine must have been struck with the great intrinsic value of its contents, its important geographical, historical, and scientific facts, its spirit, its humor, and its selections of entertaining reading. It is of no small use as a work of general reference, and as a great variety of subjects. The "Monthly Record of Current Events," which is published, presenting little immediate interest at the date of its publication, increases in importance from year to year, and now furnishes a work of chronological summary, the convenience and substantial value of which will be best known to those who are indebted by those who have the most frequent occasion to consult its columns for reference.
HARPER'S MAGAZINE is, emphatically, the household Magazine of America. Sound in religion, conservative in politics, pure in taste, useful in instruction, abounding with sympathy and humor, and gilded all the time by a cheerful optimism, it is a welcome guest in every household. We rejoice in its prosperity.—New Orleans Christian Advocate.

NAVY YARD, WASHINGTON, NOV. 24, 1858.

SIR,—

Agreeably to your order of the 1st inst., we have witnessed a series of satisfactory experiments made with T. A. DELANO'S Life-Preserving Vest, and have the honor to report that we consider it a valuable invention—well adapted to the purpose intended, simple in its construction and form, and the readiness with which it can be inflated, and slight liability to get out of order.

With respect, your obedient servant,

CHARLES C. TURNER,
Commodore U. S. Navy.
WM. S. MAURY, Lieutenant.
T. W. PATTERSON, Lieutenant.
GEORGE WILMARTH, Boatswain.
W. B. HAMILTON, Gunner.

To ISAAC TOUCEY, Secretary of the Navy.

NEWARK, N. J., October 6th 1858.

Delano Life-Preserving Coat and Vest Company:

GENTLEMEN—I have examined the improved Life-Preserving Vest, invented by T. A. Delano, and have seen it tested in the water, both of which it has no objection, and should consider it a perfect protection against drowning. The elastic straps will admit a large amount of inflation without inconveniencing or fatiguing the body, and, as far as I am aware, are an entirely new device and a very useful invention.

Yours, very respectfully,

GEO. W. CULLUM,
Capt. U. S. Engineers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. III.—No. 142.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

Our Serials and our Circulation.

For several months past we have printed from EIGHTY TO NINETY-THREE THOUSAND COPIES per week of HARPER'S WEEKLY, more than DOUBLE that of any other Illustrated Newspaper in the country.

We commenced in No. 134 a new serial tale, entitled "A Good Fight," by CHARLES READE, author of "Love me Little, Love me Long;" with Illustrations by Tenniel. This exquisite Story is printed from early proof-sheets PURCHASED exclusively by us from the Author.

In reply to several inquiries, we beg to say that Mr. DICKENS'S new serial, "A TALE OF TWO CITIES," was commenced in HARPER'S WEEKLY on May 7, and Mr. CURTIS'S delicious Story of American Society, entitled "TRUMPS," on April 9. We can send the back numbers from those dates, or from the beginning of the year, to any person who remits the money.

REV. MR. SPURGEON'S NEW TABERNACLE.

We engrave herewith the stupendous edifice which is to serve as Mr. Spurgeon's chapel in the city of London. Long ago the fame of the young preacher spread so wide that a chapel in Park Lane, in which he made his début, became too small to contain a quarter of the crowd which flocked to hear him. His friends then hired a public building—the Surrey Music Hall, which, besides being a secular edifice, was, after trial, found rather unsuitable for religious purposes. A collection was then set on foot among Mr. Spurgeon's admirers to raise a fund to build a chapel for the youthful orator. The result of that subscription will be the edifice of which we now give a view.

The Tabernacle is to cost about $150,000; but it is estimated that extras and fittings will swell the sum to $220,000 or $250,000 before it is finished. Several members of Mr. Spurgeon's church have given $500 toward the work; one member gave $15,000. From the spirit with which the work has begun, it appears likely that it will be prosecuted with energy to the end.

The dimensions of the building are in harmony. The frontage will be 80 feet, the depth 195 feet, and the height 85 feet. The ground-floor of the chapel will contain 11,242 superficial feet. A lecture-room, capable of containing 800 persons, with four large class-rooms, is also contained in the building.

The Tabernacle is calculated to accommodate 6500 persons, 5500 of whom will have seats, while the others can find standing room in the aisles, etc. Of this vast number all but about fifty, in the top gallery, will see, if they can not hear, the preacher. The business of acoustics has received careful attention; the powerful voice of the young preacher will be assisted by every appliance that modern scientific skill can devise. The pews on the ground-floor are to be arranged in concentric semi-circles, the pulpit being in the centre; thus the aisles, instead of being parallel to the walls, as usual in churches, are to converge to the pulpit.

Excellent provision is made against fire. The aisles are so arranged that the doors could be reached without delay; and there are sixteen separate exits, all of which are wide and spacious. Thus the chance of an accident, such as narrowly befell the congregation at the Surrey Gardens, is materially diminished.

The corner-stone of this fine edifice was laid on the 17th ult., in presence of a large crowd of spectators, lay and clerical. We take from an account of the proceedings the following extract:

"After speeches were delivered by Mr. Spurgeon and Sir S. M. Peto, a friend at Bristol, through Mr. E. T. Inskip, placed on the stone a check for the munificent sum of £5000 sterling. Mr. Inskip, while placing this generous contribution on the stone, stated that if forty gentlemen could be found to give £50 each, or twenty to give £100, his friend would undertake to double the total amount. Mr. Spurgeon expressed a hope that this challenge would be taken up; on which it was announced that Sir Morton Peto had given £100. Mr. Spurgeon himself then gave £100, and said that the persons on the platform were requested to quit it, and those friends who might wish to contribute were desired to come up to the platform by the left hand side, deposit their offerings upon the stone, and quit it by the opposite entrance. The company then obeyed the request of Mr. Spurgeon, and passed over the platform, depositing their various offerings upon the counter as they passed. The ministry did as they were individually thanked by the reverend gentleman, who struck each of the contributors very politely on the hand. Mr. Passmore gave £50, Mr. Morgan £20, and Mr. James Low £147. In addition to these there were many sums of £5, £10, £50, and £20; the total amount given being between £6000 and £7000."

THE REV. MR. SPURGEON'S NEW TABERNACLE, BLACKFRIARS ROAD, LONDON.

Mr. Spurgeon is so well known and so popular in this country—his books have a much larger sale here than in Europe—that we make no apology for thus illustrating his new church. Our Brooklyn neighbors, who are about to build a church for Mr. Beecher, may perhaps study it with interest.

The old subscribers of the WEEKLY will remember that we gave, in October of '58, a fine portrait and biographical sketch of Mr. Spurgeon.

THEODORE PARKER'S LETTER.

MR. THEODORE PARKER has written a letter to his congregation in Boston; and his congregation, of all by some odd chance, has published it. It was a very foolish thing of Mr. Parker to write the letter, it was still more foolish for the people to print and to circulate it; and if, after it is printed and generally read in Boston, there is left a sensible man in that city who is not heartily ashamed of Mr. Theodore Parker, he will be the illustration of an extreme of human folly.

What can have possessed the man to make a laughing-stock of himself? Had he no friend in the Church to warn him of the danger he was in? Had he no friend in Boston to suppress it after he reached that head-quarters of intelligence and sound judgment?

If he designed to make his life a monument for the avoidance of others, it is all very well; for the Antislavery Trust Society or the Antislavery Portion of Publication could not do a better thing than reprint it without note or comment. No human mind could fail to receive the coming estimate that if this is all Mr. Parker has to say for himself, he has wasted his life to worse than nothing.

In fact, Mr. Parker's book is the grand summing-up of Rationalism, and the whole of the book is Rationalism. There is not one second, in ten times this number of pages, an equal amount of fulsome self-praise, blind self-adoration, pious, complacent, stimulating egotism. We have sometimes heard of Mr. Parker as a man of intellect, and we have always given him credit for accuracy; but we have never before known why he could not see clearly the errors of his own vagaries. Here is the explanation, simple and unmistakable. Mr. Parker can see anything but the concave mirror before which he stands, and in which is reflected the image of Theodore Parker—a gigantic if not monstrous that it hides even God himself. No wonder the poor man can not see the earliest principles of truth and duty.

Then we are not too severe in our estimate of the book when it abundantly pleas to any one who will read it.

Mr. Parker's first view of himself is at a very early age—when he was in his own early years. By that time, "after a severe but silent struggle," he assures us, "I made way with the ghastly doctrine of eternal damnation and a wrathful God;" . . . "from my seventh year I have had no fear of God." Precocious boy! Solomon was not to this young prodigy a mode of Reason. For Solomon, when he was old thought the fear of the Lord but the beginning of wisdom; and the young Parker had attained all that sort of wisdom while he was learning to talk!

He thrived well on a farm in the country where, long before he concluded to become a minister, he had mastered most of the grand doctrines of theology, and was in the same way with the doctrine of God's justice. This youth had mingled not only one, but several Hydras. "The doctrine of the Trinity, the great 'mystery of Revelation,' had long since gone the same road." Thus he writes. "I had found no evidence which to me could authorize a belief in the supernatural birth of Jesus of Nazareth." Wonderful intellect of the child Parker! "Many miracles related in the Old and New Testament seemed incredible to me even when not impossible, others ridiculous, and a few were wicked." This precocious boy would have saved Hume a world of trouble. His sweeping common sense would have ended the argument, but saw clearly the impossibility of the thing. And then, "I had no belief in the plenary, literal, verbal inspiration of the whole Bible; and strong doubts as to the miraculous inspiration of any part of it!"

It is remarkable that a boy in his teens should have accomplished all this; but the question suggests itself, "What was left for him to believe?" He did not fear God nor believe in his Son; he doubted the inspiration of the Bible, and believed parts of it positively incredible and wicked. It is somewhat curious to find a young boy with this sort of mind selecting "the ministry" as a profession. Ministry of what, on earth or in heaven?

After a man has got rid of God, Christ, and the Bible, we should like to see the person who can show him any thing left to admire, love, and worship, among men or out of them, to be found, to wit—if. Something to worship we must have. That our humanity demands; and the object of worship we should say, in the modern style, must be either subjective or objective. It must be either within or without one's self. And having lost sight of the God of Abraham and Paul, and being too sensible to worship a stone, it was very natural that this young wonder of intelligence should begin to worship himself. Having once begun this worship, he has never been able to get over it.

But what is left to worship? God, he said, with such mental power as this, after disposing of God and all the ordinarily received notions of religion, he reveals, and, to our simple phrase, such a fool, as not to know that egotism was stupid, and might be dispensed with, as he has this was his very religion. He deliberately determined to preach himself. "I determined not to preach nothing as religion but what I have experienced inwardly and made my own, knowing it by heart." Paul (a distinguished and learned man once) meant time, and Peter (a man generally accorded some sense and a little ability, although not up to the Parker standard) determined to preach Christ by experience and the self but Jesus. Parker differed from Paul, and, to say the least of it, it is refreshingly cool to find one of no pretensions to either learning or piety preach "the natural laws of man as they are writ in his constitution, no less and no more," and to make his own heart the text-book.

Such, from beginning to ending, is his work. Every page is overloaded with this egotism. Even pages—Paul and Peter would have exhausted the capitol I's in the printing-office. No ordinary office could stand such a drift of the uppercase. Mr. Parker goes on to the last page, with the repetition of his self-satisfaction. He is not an old man, but he is superabundantly satisfied with his conceptions of himself. It has done one-tenth part of what he declares he has done, if he has studied one-tenth part of what he states he has studied. No human hand nor one-thousandth part of what he professes to have learned, he has lived long enough. Human nature could not stand such egotism and he would be either a God or a fool in another year. If the reader imagines that there is any reason in any argument in the book, he is mistaken. It is a pure impertinence from title-page to finis. It is the assertion, repetition, and accumulation of the same idea of self, and of self only, from the wonder ceases and the reader goes to the end with an impression of profound disgust.

Disgust mingled with a feeling of pity. It is the most hopeless book that man ever penned. Without God, it is of course without a hope. Other and one class from Mr. Parker's will be the conviction that this man, who knew nothing beyond the little circle of his own mind—as to its former opinions, a mere blank—is for ever; that this poor egotist, who acknowledged no religion but that of self and his own unbearable, uncheated heart; that this poor lover of self could not see one ray of light beyond the hole in which that self must forever grovel.

Here is a pastoral letter from a preacher to his congregation, miserable sinners all and born in sin—and this is the man of whom they must be supposed to look with considerable anxiety into the mists before them; here is a letter of spiritual consolation from a spiritual adviser! in which there is no one word of promise, reward, or expectation for the future.

A thinking man can have come over the members of Mr. Parker's congregation when they heard this letter read. Neither for himself nor for them is there one word of hope. No one sorrow with which he laments the failure of his health and the possibility of his apostleship being suddenly cut off sinks into the melancholy of despair, unrelieved by any satisfaction in the result of past labors, or any prospect of rest after the active duties. Never was a minister more or more frigid, freezing religion; never more desperate cry to one's companions in a sinking ship.

We have nothing to do with one or another form of religious creed or doctrine. For the purposes of this article it matters nothing to us whether Jesus is the Christ or only a Christ as Mr. Parker calls him, though what he means by that term is not clear to us. But as reviewers of books printed, published, and scattered over the land, we are but fulfilling a duty to the public, which, where it is wrong as a self-demolishing piece of literary work.

While preparing this article another minister of spiritual matters has been at work, and the books lie side by side. This other is the story of the ministry of William H. Milburn, the blind preacher. The book is a pleasant volume, by similar in design, but miraculously unlike in accomplishment to Mr. Parker's autobiography. Here is a miracle that Mr. Theodore Parker has yet to revise his boyish accomplishments before he can expect to see or understand. Nay, he will never see or understand it. He is past all that, long ago, when he was seven years old. He will die, perhaps not now, but some time, he will die, and every word that he has uttered, every doctrine he has taught, will die and vanish forever, and name and fame of him and his ministry will perish utterly, because there is no life in him or them. That his sentiments should prevail for a day, or an hour, or a moment after he has given them utterance is simply impossible, because they are founded on no principles of truth, they commend themselves to no reason, they are without form and void. No one need fear damage from them. This book, and Mr. Parker's preaching, if this is a specimen, are harmless. It is impossible that any soul worth saving can be conversed to the idolatry of worshiping the God of the whole. Let us let the speaker of the Boston book, when he has finished that, take up the thrilling story of the poor blind boy, and be thankful that there is no self-admiration, though certainly the boy who could see nothing outwardly could well have fallen to worshiping and loving his own soul. Neither is there any of the nonsense of transcendentalism, except that he tells us very frankly that he once (when a man, not when a boy) went through the course in which it appears that Mr. Parker has stuck at and forever.

Mr. Milburn tells one of the simplest and most satisfactory stories of his experience in the manner that could be desired. He sees the egotism, he confesses it, he laughs at it. One would think he had written his story as a commentary on Mr. Parker's. His work preceded his school. But he was not the giant at seven that the Boston boy was. He could not then—as Mr. Parker could—tell Christ exactly what he was one fact, however, that always stood in my way—the person and work of the Redeemer of the world. Such queers of cosmic analysis are more never competent to dispose of that." Poor fellow! How easily the Boston boy did it at seven or two! But what a pigmy appears he then compared with the cold story of the Boston minister!

We have done with Mr. Parker, and should have stopped sooner but for the opportune arrival of Mr. Milburn's book. Again we commend those who, in every way, are in the habit of comparing the religion of self with the religion of God. One book is the story of a selfish egotist who has lived in a world of his own, the world and, bat-like, flying about blind in a blaze of sunlight, and finding nothing, always nothing; the other is the story of a blind boy sitting in darkness and alone on a Western prairie, and, like Bartimeus of old, hearing the footsteps of the Saviour of men as he went by. If Mr. Milburn's experience is not joyous enough to make men love his creed, Mr. Parker's is utterly dark and desperate enough to make the man a man into believing in Brahma or Vishnu, or any God but the self of a transcendentalist.

THE FRANKING PRIVILEGE.

This journal has more than once protested against the absurd privilege accorded by the law to members of Congress in regard to franking. Under the present system every member of Congress is entitled to send by post, without paying postage, as many letters and printed documents as he pleases to any section of the Union. This right we have always considered a dangerous one, and one susceptible, which it cheats; unfair to the Post-office, which it burdens with masses of political matter "of no value to any but the owners;" and altogether unreasonable.

But it seems that we were ignorant of the true intent and meaning of the law. Not only have members of Congress the right of using the mails gratuitously, but a generous usage confers the same privilege on their wives, their sisters, their mothers, their sons, their daughters, their daughter's husbands, their nieces, and cousins to the thirtieth and fortieth remove of consanguinity.

Lest any uninitiated person should doubt the fact, we subjoin the evidence, which we find in a "Card" published over the signature of "A. C. Cheshire, who has been elected to the office of 'Secretary of the National Republican Association.'" Mr. Clephane says:

"It is a shame to this whole country, and certainly to every individual who has visited Washington, that but very few members ever do their own document franking, but get persons outside of Congress, including clerks to do it for them.

"I am aware that different political organizations have been in the practice of sending out from here documents bearing the franks of the members to have them sent by clerks employed by their organizations, and no exception can be taken to such practices.

"The clerks of the Post-offices inform me that it has been the universal practice to distribute all such matter coming to the office."

The present Postmaster, Mr. Holt, objected to the application of the right of franking, and refused to forward documents on which the frank was forged.

But we will not give the abuse full swing? Why try to govern by the rules of common sense a system so palpably absurd?

In the latter days of the old French monarchy, we are told that not only could a grand seigneur obtain a lettre de cachet for a troublesome father who objected to the seduction of his daughter, or a tiresome tailor who wanted his bill paid, but the same delightful luxury was within reach of all the relatives of the great man. A sprig of nobility used his father's name to have his rival locked in the Bastile; the daughter claimed the same privilege with regard to the cavalier who had jilted her; the country cousin availed himself of a family connection to dispose of a usurious neighbor. Things reached such a pitch at last that a nobleman's valet could have a bourgeois incarcerated under a lettre de cachet. Then came the Revolution.

We rather think that Mr. Holt—who, passing for a sensible man, must be opposed to the franking system—had better have recorded this decision at once. When Bridget and Patsyne frank their letters to Cullen Bridget, the origin of their having a cousin who was nearly being engaged by a man who ran unsuccessfully for Congress, will begin to see daylight on the franking matter.

THE LOUNGER.

NEW YORK AGAINST THE WORLD.

WHY Baltimore should be the most unruly of our cities, and the nearest to a Vigilance Committee, is not an easy question to answer. Yet the last few years we have been accustomed to hear of riots whenever the elections came—and to expect trouble whenever there was a political rousing. Barbarous murders, too, have not been unknown. But the last summer, the taxing of a party of pleasure by a band of banditti among its passengers, has roused the spirit of the citizens, so that we may look either for a cessation of the villainies, or for a popular assumption of the civic responsibility.

The question which is involved in the Baltimore difficulty is the same which that of New York and Philadelphia, is simply, whether the American system be a failure or not. In the case of the former city the issue is the will of the people. The Legislature of three years ago virtually said the same thing, by the appointment of the Police Commissioners, as a method of allowing the majority have answered the question, and the democratic system is a failure.

But if we leave that—and test the system by its results—assuming that the government is truly what it is intended to be, that is, a democracy. That is to say, does the New Yorker get more personal security and more comfort for his money than the Parisian or Londoner? If he does not, then again the system is a failure.

Now how rarely a citizen may deplore the mud and turmoil and danger of New York—however he may rail at the filthy streets and loose pails, and the strict observation of the class-lines of society, it is well known that our worst villains are not native, and that they were organized by the state of things in those cities; and that the improvement in the police means to be public knowledge here is very much larger than elsewhere. And this is said, certainly not by way of compliment, but for the truth's sake. For now we forget, that while the whole English world is one of subordination and the Latin world is so enormous and well-drilled—and while Paris, besides its system and police, has an army at hand to put any disturbance speedily down—a disturbance so the sudden violence or conflict of the chief municipal authority should occur, the most frightful result might be apprehended, while here a year ago, such a phenomenon did occur and lasted for a week, and nobody was troubled, but every body thought it a bore.

WHY?

Because lawlessness is not the law. And it is not so, because it is the interest of such a vast majority to keep down all such attempts, that no people commit all the crimes they want to.

If we compare the great foreign cities, during the year with the New York city newspapers, with New York, we shall probably find the pleasures not of good other cities more conspicuous than here. And there is plenty to be done so long as we can not surpass them. If, for instance, it is impossible that the streets of the best trunk-lines must be filthy and flayed by hackmen—that the great Broadway Bloods of Paris and London are left to Babel the evening of the confusion—that New York may diddle Dr. Primrose out of twenty or two hundred thousand dollars, in a night—that Rob Roy Swamps—that the municipal elections shall be utterly unknown, as to the taste of a single bad or fourth more than they should be—that all the city work should cost twenty times what it would cost anywhere else—that the poor or left-undone, at that—that the proportion of police officers to the ordinary duties should be as four hours at a watering-place dinner-table—if all these things are part of the republican system, it is very clear that, however good it might be to any other, it is not yet quite perfect. And it can only be made perfect by time and experiment. Let all the citizens vote, taking care that every body votes and votes only once, and our municipality will not be a by-word. Let the Legislature control dressmaking himself a gentleman, who buys dresses for an indistinct lady friend to vote, will lose consideration as much as if he had been caught cheating at cards, and the work is done.

"Give me a point in the air seventeen thousand feet high, to rest my foot upon," said the philosopher Mogalasaura, "and I will look over Mont Blanc."

THE LAST IMPERIAL MOVE.

SINCE the Lounger has undertaken to have his say about Louis Napoleon, he ought not to omit the amnesty which Louis Blanc refuses for himself, but advises other people who want to, to accept, and which Victor Hugo refuses altogether.

The amnesty is a stroke of good policy. It shows a conciliatory spirit, and it indicates consciousness of strength. Of course those who think the Emperor had no right to tear men from their families and send them away, on the ground that they were opposed to his coup d'état, was the doing but trying to get control of their country?), cannot see any peculiar force conferred by the amnesty.

If my pocket is picked of twenty dollars, and I am told after a few years that I may have five of the value of I will call a particular day, and behave particularly well, I shall hardly be overwhelmed by any sense of gratitude.

As for Italy, as Walter Savage Landor justly says, an emperor who owes his throne to a popular vote (nominally, at least) is not likely to seriously thwart the result of a popular election in Tuscany or Modena or Parma. No, he can not do it consistently, if consistency happen to be the motive of his actions.

Finally, however, if Tuscany and the other Duchies do hold popular elections, and are allowed to abide by the result, some palpable political advantage will have accrued from the Italian war. But we do not see that this is to be supposed to have been the intention of the French Emperor. That he and many other people saw that it might happen, and that it might be in his interest if it did, is very probable. But he does it in that case from the same ambition which led him to exile the Republican generals after the counter-stroke. The only standard by which we can judge any politician is his antecedents. If they have been always simple, noble, and honest, we believe that he will act from honesty. When they have not been so, even if in a particular case his interest and his duty is in harmony, we believe that he will act from interest. Dick Turpin may throw a guinea to a blind old woman. But it by no means follows that he is not a robber.

GROGGY GOVERNMENT.

The people of our neighboring little sister State of California are fortunate in their two United States Senators. Hoc fortunatos, these gentlemen are themselves always. It is no longer a question of party—it is a question of individual self-respect for Californians whether such persons ought to represent them.

It has been sometimes fondly hoped by the enthusiastic that the Governor of the Golden State would not utterly degenerate into a Bear garden. But, after all, there are worse things than Bear gardens. It is easy to tolerate ursine manners when the morals are tolerable. But the authentic documents produced in the Latin controversy about the fools of light" upon political morality. The United States Senate is a body in every citizen of the United States has a direct interest; and the exposure in California show us what kind of legislation may be expected from the gentlemen to whom common honesty seems to be simply unknown.

Political corruption has been suspected before. It has even been whispered that the State of New York is not altogether unstained. But when it begirten in a young and frisky State like California—ah, really, it is New York, a grave, sedate, Revolutionary, original State.

"It sad, cried Paul Pry, and he wept like a nodgy."

Sure, then, it is neither peculiar to young nor old States, but is true in all. If any person has any chance to read these lines let him reflect a little. He has politics; you think them dull and stupid and mean, and that whoever touches pitch will be defiled. Well, how did they become so? And if politics are dirty now, will they not be dirty always, or as long as you leave them in the hands of dirty men? If your wagon wheels stick in the mud, Mr. Two Forty, will you leave it stuck because your hands will be so dreadfully soiled if you lay to and lift it out? If you think it unbecoming to be settled in a gog-shop, you must not be surprised to find gogs in your government. So long as you and other respectable persons hold that because it is such a bore to knock round at Primary meetings, just so long will the Primary Government will be a much more shameful and intolerable bore.

"In good old Colony times" freemen who did not go to run out and vote were fined. And surely if any duty and malfeasance of public servants rested upon every citizen, not less should be the duty of the franchise. Let every man show cause for not voting. And if any man should be fined for neglect of police, let him be triply fined as the real cause of their impunity. If all were made aware of the meanness of politics, let him be cautioned not to bear at him even so.

In this country any man who believes in the democratic principle, and who has an interest himself in politics enough to vote, and to know why he votes, hasks his duty to his country, and is so far a traitor.

ANAGRAMS.

ANTHONY SIMS the Lounger the following note upon Anagrams. Originally the word signified the production of anagrams, and subsequently of a word backward—as evil—live. But later use mentions any transposition.

Anagrams, which a few centuries ago were classed among the sciences, and frequently made the subject of learned disquisition, are now exceedingly rare, having almost entirely superseded by conundrums, enigmas, and the like. During the reigns of Elizabeth and James, the process of anagrammatizing names and sentences became fashionable among the European courts, and finally acquired a settlement to a large class of people. The French have succeeded in having exceedingly skilful and appropriate anagrams. Among the best of which is an anagram on the name of Marie Touchet, the mistress of Charles IX. The letters on being arranged formed Je charme tout leur. I charm all which I should to have selected. Nearly portrayed her disposition. This was considered by the fair object of the anagram on Pierre Jacques Brissot, the assassin of Henry III., who, on the discovery of his crime, was transformed into C'est l'enfer qui m'a crée (or, he'll hell which created me).

It was customary in these days to anagrammatize the names of poets, authors, and various distinguished men. Of the poet Waller it was said—

"His brows need not with laurel to be bound,
Since in his name with Laurel he is crowned."

And of the celebrated Horatio Nelson, "Honor est a Nile." Basile Holmes, the author of a book on heraldry, received the anagram, De Mors Holbein; perhaps the best anagram was made by John Dunyan upon his own name.

"Witness my name; if anagramm'd to thee
The letters make Jo Jonny in a B."

LOUNGERS LITTER-BOX.

—"We sent to Mr. Smith's Lodge of a room which he almost 'sat up' at the rate of 'a stick and a half an hour, more than any student since the type before.' The lines are pleasant, but there are rather too many of them. But was ever author Charles Lamb's "Hipsham Hotes, Round thy dwelling," etc.

—"Sir J. Y. The Polish game of draughts obedient is sometimes played for five guineas the hundred of a hundred squares. In the Polish game the pieces are likewise moved, and the board has seven rows, and a 'Handbook of Games,' in Bohn's Scientific Library.

—Mr. Kerr. "Sweetness" and "a respect to" are both correct, for good usage sanctions both.—"Can you tell me where I can find a genteel home for a lady he should certainly send up both cards.

—GRAY EYES. The verses are respectfully declined, but the Lounger thanks you. "Merrily shall I live now" as you insinuate that they do. Gray Eyes is a poet who will be heard from hereafter.

—"You want a mask. Also an assumed name.
"Your obedient servant.
"You carry a thin, slender rapier. You carry it constantly. Your obedient servant.
"You sit in your office like a spider in his den and patiently watch for the unsuspecting victim to approach you.
"Their tracks will point inward. When they enter, they can remain a month low, you extend a courteous welcome to them. Have your rapier through and through the dolorous victim."

A RIDE THROUGH ORANGE COUNTY.

SOME months since we published an article, which was based on the report of a Legislative Committee on the Insane Asylums of the State throughout the State. It drew down upon us shameful abuses which prevailed in many of those establishments. We then promised the intention of visiting some of the more prominent New York Asylums, and stating, in this journal, the results of an honest inspection. Circumstances have delayed the fulfillment of that purpose. Last week the gold which is the open sesame to everything, was at that institution to be found in Orange County, and of that institution we are prepared to speak.

Orange, it should be premised, is one of the great and rich counties of this State. It has an area greater than many of the European states. It square miles; and its population is probably 50,000 souls—considerably more than are ruled by some independent German princes. The Hudson, from the Hudson, on which it owns the flourishing towns of Newburgh and Cornwall, to the State of New Jersey and Pennsylvania, on the east and southeast, on the north, Ulster County excels it in size, but not in population, in wealth, and in the Revolutionary and Civil wars. Sweet.

It is a little wonderful that with all its beauty and its beautiful mountain and pretty hill; the fine and small rivulets; lakes in abundance, teeming with pickerel; rivers, which yield fine varieties of the finny race; thousands of acres of land whose surface is covered with grass, and thousands of acres in the highest state of cultivation; lovely valley, on which vines sun purple grapes, and glowing orchards of fruit-laden apples staggers to find a footing; marble quarries and mines which produce iron ore, the finest quality; hay, potatoes, barley, rye, and vegetables of every description; and barren stony wastes, where the grasshopper can scarcely find a spot on which respectable bird will waste a single moment. The finest prefect, however, is the abundance of fine grass. Years and years ago Orange grew a surplus of wheat; but years ago this ceased to be, and Orange became a grazing and dairy county. Years before the Erie Railroad was built New York City took the product of Orange. In the form of butter which was carted by the farmers to Newburgh or Cornwall, and shipped by water to the city. Now the Erie Railroad runs through the valleys. Farmers have received the milk, on account, in great tin cans; sold by the quart, and the cans returned. Dealers are two and three cents a quart, it is duly watered and chalked here, and retailed to the inhabitants of the city at the highest rates of the season. It is more profitable, say the Orangemen, to keep stock and sell milk than to grow wheat. Of course any grain or vegetable; and accordingly the staple export of Orange is milk. Every meadow and hill-side throughout the county is covered with fine cattle. Some farmers own thirty, some a hundred and fifty; and Dove Island, between Newburgh and Durham of England to the famous breeds which are such favorites in Ohio, are represented here; the Durhams are large, fine animals, some weighing half a dozen barels, and, when represented in dollars, are worth still more. In no part of the State are more or finer cattle to be seen than in Orange.

Our friend, Mr. M——— of Monroe, took us up in his wagon at an early hour of the morning; and we drove out of the village of Newburgh, which, where the Rev. Mr. Rice was preaching to some twelve hundred people, we made the best of our way, through a fine country, to Chester, and thence to Florida. Some of the road-side farms, among others that of Mr. Seeley, of Chester, attracted particular attention by their evident completeness: the barns were numerous and "running over;" the meadows clean and smooth as an Episcopalian's chin; every thing—from the honey-suckle on the porch to the pig-pen—indicated thrift and perfect order, and just as clean as constant use would permit.

Florida is a fine town, with a big hotel. There are two points about it. All the pretty girls in the county are gathered there. There is a prevailing opinion that pretty girls have been seen elsewhere. A rumor lately found vent to the effect that a lovely young creature had been seen at Goshen. But we incline to the belief that this is an error or an exaggeration. Every body knows that all the pretty girls of Provence are at Arles; and all the pretty girls of Orange County are at Florida. Bachelors will be so good as to make a note of the fact.

The second point about Florida is that it is the birth-place of Governor Seward. His father, the Hon. Samuel Seward, who was a doctor by profession, died here some eight years ago, worth half a million; the Governor's brothers, Polydore and George, live in the village. The old house has left its mark here pretty deeply indented. The finest house in the village is the mansion occupied by the children of George Seward—cost $30,000. An other prominent building is the Seward mansion, where the Governor's aged and frail mother lives; is the Seward Institute, a famous school for girls. Nowhere in the country was a man whose Seward connected life as a doctor, keeping, at the same time, a small shop on the ground-floor; here William H. Seward was born.

The Judge was a prudent, wary, and, many say, a hard man. Governor Hamilton tell a touching story about his only daughter; how she fell in love with his partner, a young doctor, was forbidden by her father to see him, received instructions to break off up for customary, and at length ran away and was married. Then, it is said, the Judge swore great oaths that he would never see her face more; yet, falling ill, and feeling the hand of death upon him, here he sent for her, and in the greatest imaginable tenderly, and she came, and staid in his house till he died, and left her boys and her self well provided for; how the stern old man, only half relenting, utterly disinherited her son, because they bore not his name. He left an integral fortune of a million to his daughter's daughter; and so on, with like sweet sentiments, which we have not space to relate. The old Judge, dying, groaned in spirit at the thought that the great estate he had amassed by a life of misery and thrift would probably be squandered by his children; to prevent which he left his property entire to his eldest son, Frederick, stipulating expressly that none of the heirs could inherit till he and all his co-heirs were of age. By this provision controversy and litigation has never been divided, and, from present appearances, never will be.

Of Governor Seward there are no reminiscences at Florida. He studied law at Goshen; and removed, on his admission to the bar, to Auburn, since when the Floridians have seen little of him. It is revered by his father shut it. He is said that he was wont to be seized with sudden bursts of affection toward his children. He once sent to New Jersey for his brother's brother's brother's boy, professions of kindness to him, and when he left Florida to return to Auburn, a piece of paper in his hand, bidding him not look at it till he was in his own home. The son-in-law, dreadfully excited, hastened home, and found in the folded precious slip of paper was—a ten-dollar note! On another occasion Governor Seward's son Frank was the recipient of a similar surprise; but this time the slip of paper was a check for ten thousand dollars to the order of Frank Seward.

Two or three miles from Florida stands the Orange County Lunatic Asylum, a respectable stony stone building, with a farm of 170 acres of good land attached. It was built about thirty years ago. At that time it cost as the act declares for all the care of the county: now Newburgh produces for her own share, and the Asylum is now supported by the rest of the county, at a cost of about $30,000 a year.

The number of lunatics at the present time is one hundred and twenty-four, one-third of whom are males, seventy-six females, and sixty-two men. Of these about twenty are lunatics. Idiots, who usually muster so strong in country poorhouses, are not known here. We were told that there was one, but we did not see him. Evidently the rule all over Orange County is not to be able to the development of idiocy; we commend the fact to the notice of the Fecility.

The lunatics are mixed in each establishments, here divided into two classes—new-comers, who had been picked up wandering, and those who, as shortly forwarded to an asylum where they may receive suitable treatment; and cases deemed "incurable." The latter class are the harmless and the lunatic asylums in the State. One young man had come here from Iowa. He was a good-looking youth, with well-tended mustache and imperiale; he paced his corridor with restless steps, and talked to himself in strong vertex. He seemed to the keeper of the poor-house, a very intelligent person, although he was not communicative with him, as he was excitable when addressed. Under Dr. Rumey's care the young man would probably recover more long. He was one case of seemingly incurable mania, apparently superinduced by habitual intemperance. This was the exception, none of the male lunatics seemed to have gone mad from sensual excesses; and none of the female lunatics of which mania was the occasion.

There were a few female lunatics—one, sent from Utica, evidently, in the present state of science, incurable; another, reduced to semi-idiocy by epilepsy; and a few others, all of them harmless, in general rule, rather hopeful cases. So far as we could judge, the alleged purveyors of cases for this asylum had been intemperance and starvation. One withered old lady is kept there who seemingly should be at home. She is said to be very hottempered, and apt to quarrel with her husband and relatives; but if all the husbandsread people were locked up in mad-houses, we should need several cities to hold them. To all appearances this old lady is harmless, and is well treated.

Among the lunatics we found a young woman with a child a few months old. She is perfectly sane. Her crime is that she is frail, and incapable of husbanding the wiles of unprincipled men. Thrice, we believe, she has become an inmate of the poor-house in a state of pregnancy, each time burdening the county with her own support during her confinement, and with that of her child afterward. She was barely sixteen when she first sought leave to bring her burden to the world under that hospitable roof. A few months ago she was again admitted. The Superintendent of the Poor endeavored to ascertain from her the name of the man who was thus burdening the county with the expenses of his pitiful sport; but the girl refused to tell. She was threatened—she was punished; but she would not tell her lover's name. She was told that when her child was born she would be confined in the lunatic asylum with the mad people; when she kept her secret. So there she was carried into effect; she was, and is, shut up, as we have seen, in company with the insane; but still she will not tell.

We come to the people of Orange whether common decency and humanity will justify this proceeding!

Block here is the chief source whence the poorhouses are peopled. There are about forty children in the Orange County Poor-house. Nearly all of these are illegitimate. We saw them in school, under the care of a venerable-looking, white-haired old gentleman, who seemed a most comfortable pride in their looks and performances. They were all well-dressed, and their manners—clean and well clad, and seemed well fed and healthy. We noticed a beautiful yellow-haired boy of four years, than whom a more beautiful child we have never seen little fellow. He and two sisters have been thrown on the county by the shameless mother. Another boy, with sharp black eyes, and a face upon which the officials knew well, is the son of an Orange County girl. She has eloped in her turn, and succeeded the shame here; subsequently married well, and is now the wife of a wealthy farmer. From time to time she visits the poor-house to see her boy. But latterly, the officials say, these visits have ceased, as she is afraid her husband may discover the terrible secret of her youth. We found the boy at play, and asked him would he like to come with us and work for his father. He assented joyfully.

As illicit love peoples the children's department, it also keeps the women's chambers full. Three-fourths of the women here have come here to become freed. There are mostly Irish; it seems some management to keep them clean and orderly. Some of them are kept in the cells belonging to the establishment. We visited one of their rooms; the women were sewing. A friend remarked, seemed to "feel their cats." When addressed seeing, the poor-house must seem a very convenient institution.

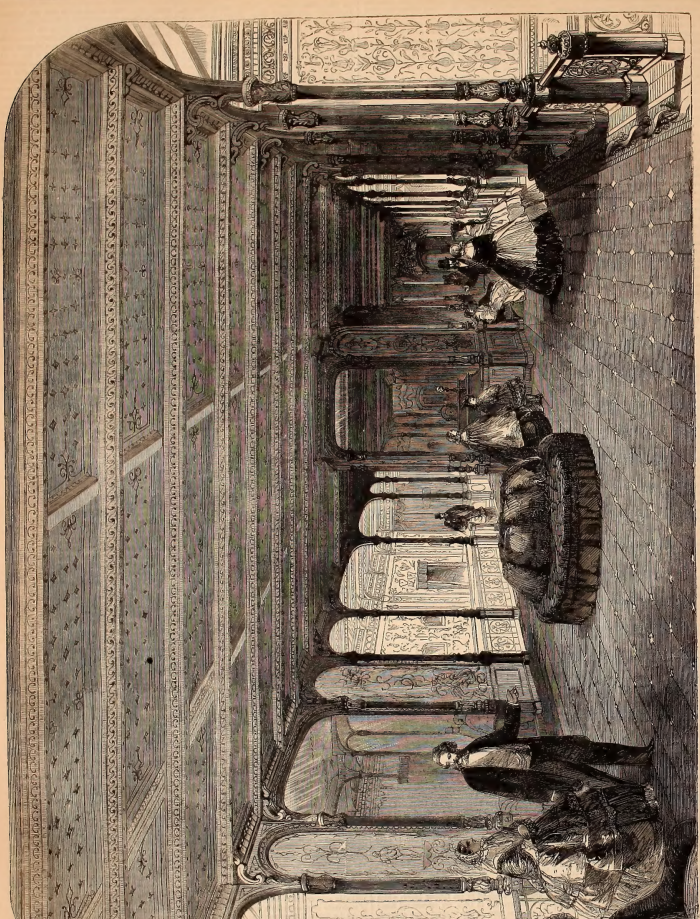
A visit to the paupers of a country poor-house should be a matter of every man's curiosity. Here, and here alone, is seen the denouement of a successful life-struggles. We see the comedy in Fifth Avenue and the tragedy in the Alms-House simply. This country is so prosperous, honest industry is the sure of its reward, that the poor-house is a by no prominent institution here than it is in Europe. But it exists; there are, even in New York State, more paupers than were any time, in all the country house; where lost hours are spent in such unusual hour of the day, and such work to perform, in requital of the crust and bed which county charity provides. Our companion was deeply moved at the sight of one old man whom he had known a thriving farmer in former days; here he sat in a chair which he had tenanted in the same measure of a window to get as much sun as possible to warm his old blood: he had lost most of his poor wits, and barely remembered that he had once lived in the town of M——. Another feeble old man, tottering across the yard, was once a leading merchant of Goshen. Once his word was final on questions of trade; his paper—why, Sir, the banks seemed to type for it, and the Bank of ——, one spectacle day, he failed; tumbled down, down, into the county poor-house. We saw him, and tried to see my one, and, steadying his old frame with his staff, says Sir" to little boys who call him Mr. Jones as he is, did no pre-arrangement Fellow-some at Gray Friars?

But a sadder man is there, who does a little work, when it is not too hot, in the fields of the house. He can not work much, for he is very old, and his legs and arms are very thin and weak; but he has a high-minded feeling which will force him to do what he can to earn the bread he eats. He, too, was well off once; his brothers are wealthy still; but, said our guide, the law don't oblige brothers to keep each other, and they refuse to help poor old pauper prefer to leave him to the keeping of the county. We regret that we have forgotten this old man's name.

The sexes persons seem comfortable and happy. We visited every room in the building, and found every where cleanliness and order, and perfect comfort, except at Block's cells. Each, well, considering, passage, all were admirably clean. The rooms were good; a stout straw pallasse, well shaken up, sufficient bedding, and every thing else, constituted a bed on which an emperor might repose contentedly. The dormitories, moreover, as well as the rest of the house, very clean. Here the inmates have their meals: for breakfast, cold meat and bread, and coarse drab, as much as desires brown bread as they can eat, and, for those who prefer it, butter; for dinner, meat, with sometimes fresh, sometimes salt, vegetables of every kind from the country, and, now and then, pie, rice and milk, or succotash, etc., etc. Every pauper is allowed to eat as much as he can. The farm produces milk, vegetables, eggs, and beef in profusion; and the rule of the humane Superintendent is, that in that building no one shall suffer hunger.

The whole building is heated throughout by hot-water pipes, and must be very comfortable in winter.

If all our poor-houses were like this one, critics would find their vocation gone.



THE SALOON OF THE STEAMSHIP "GREAT EASTERN."

THE SALOON OF THE "GREAT EASTERN."

In the two last numbers of the Weekly we gave very full descriptions of the cabin of the great ship; we now give an engraving which shows it to advantage. It is of course needless to observe that our picture only shows a part of this gigantic room.

The total length of the main saloon is 62 feet by 36 feet wide; at one end is the ladies' saloon, which is 20 feet long. Through the saloon protrude two of the funnels; but they have been so skillfully surrounded by mirrors that they appear positively ornamental.

The furniture of the saloon is very rich and beautiful. The carpet is a simple pattern, in which maroon color predominates. The sofas are covered with Utrecht velvet; the buffets are of walnut, richly carved, with green marble tops. The sides of the saloon are covered with mirrors and arabesques personifying the arts and sciences employed in the construction of the ship. The state-room doors are provided with curtains of rich crimson silk.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER LIII.

DEATH.

THE clover-blossom perfumed the summer air. The scythe and the sickle still hung in the barn. Grass and grain swayed and whispered and sparkled in the sun and wind. June was spent all the gentle hills and peaceful meadows and winding brooks-sides. June was in the sweet-briar that climbed the solid stone posts of the gateway, and clustered along the homely country stone wall. June blossomed in the yellow buttercup by the roadside, and in the tremulous anemone and the bright violet in the woods. June sang in the whistle of the swan swinging on the limb and the chirrup, and the gushing warble of the bobolink tumbling and darting and fluttering in the warm meadow. June twinkled in the keen brightness of the fresh green of leaves, and swelled in the fruit buds. June filled the air with delight, and covered the earth with glory in the cloudy of apple blossoms and covered Old England with flowers. June clucked and crowed in the cocks and hens that stepped about the yard, followed by the multitudinous peep of little chickens. June loved in the cattle in the pasture. June sprang and sprouted and sang and grew in all the sprouting and blooming, in all the sunny new life of the world.

While among the dark pine-trees stood the old house of Pinewood—a temple of silence in the midst of the teeming, overpowering murmur of new life; of silence and darkness in the midst of jubilant sunshine and universal song, that seemed to press against the very windows over which the green blinds were drawn.

But it seemed a little hushed and subdued, that long wave of rich life, as it glided across the lawn and in among the solemn pine-trees. There was a little space of silence even about the house. The birds sang in the trees beyond —the bobolinks gushed in the meadows below. There is a line drawn between life and death.

In the large drawing-room, draped in cool-colored chintz, where once Gabriel Perrott and Abel Newt had seen Hope Wayne, on the table where books had lain like precision ornaments, by a strange piece of furniture, long, and spreading at one end, smelling of new varnish, studded with high silver-headed nails, and with a lid. It was lined with satin. Yes, it was a casket.

The room was more formal, and colder, than ever. Puffs of air crept through it as if frightened—frightened to death before they got out again. The smell of the varnish was stronger than that of the clover-blossoms, or the rose or honey-suckles outside in the garden, and about the piazzas.

Upon the wall hung the portrait of Christopher Burt at the age of ten, standing in clean clothes, holding a hoop in one hand and a hoop in the other. It was sixty-four years before that the portrait was painted, and if one had come searching for what he would have found him—by lifting that lid he would have seen him; but in those sunken features, that white hair, that startling stillness of repose, would he have recognized the boy of the soft eyes and the tender heart, whose June clover had not yet blossomed?

There was a creaking, crackling sound upon the gravel in the avenue, and then a carriage emerged from behind the hedge, and then another, and another. They were handsome carriages chiefly, and stopped at the front door, which was swung wide open. There was no sound but the lesting down of steps and stamming of carriage doors, and the rolling away of wheels. People with grave faces, which they seemed to have put on for the occasion as they put on white gloves, blue dingus, stepped out and came up the steps. They were mostly clad in sober colors, and the clothing, or conversed in a low, murmuring tone, or in whispers. They entered the house and found themselves in the library, with a large solemn family Bible and the empty inkstand on the clean pen-wiper and the paper knife and the melancholy recesses of books lock at into their proper.

Presently some one would step to the door and beckon with his finger to some other one sitting in the silent library. The latter arose and walked out quietly, and went with the beckoner and looked in at the door. Some one had once been a boy there. And coming back to the library the smell of varnish was for a moment blown out of the wide entry by the cool gale from the meadows, and then the mingled the silent company of the song and the sunshine and bloom that were outside.

By-and-by Rosa Wynne and his mamma in Sunday clothes walked up the avenue, and entered the house, and looked at the inscription of the casket, sat down in the hall, while the old man looked out into the peaceful, perfumed June weather, and heard the birds, till some body came down the stairs and touched him, and gave him a message, and then he touched his wife, and they went up stairs.

Mr. Snowy Grey came also in black gaiters and white cravat, pondering many things as he seated himself quietly and waited.

It was a most solemn meeting. No more carriages came; no more people. There was no more looking into the casket, no more weeping and moaning. The rooms were full of a silent company, and they were all waiting. The clock ticked audibly. The wind sighed in the pine-trees. What next? Would not the master of the house appear to welcome his guests?

He did not come; but Mr. Gabriel Perrott, at the head of the stairs, near a room in which Hope Wayne, and Rosa Wynne, and Mrs. Simcoe, and Fanny Dinks, and Alfred, and his parents, and Horee Wamley, and his wife, and a few others, was heard the voice of Dr. Parsons, saying "Let us pray!"

And he prayed a long prayer. He spoke of the good works of this life, and the sweet promises of the mercy of the Christian God. He fights the good fight encompassed by a crowd of witnesses; of those who do justice and love mercy, and walk in the way of the Lord. He referred to our dear, departed brother, and eulogized Christian merchants, and Christian citizens, and, being rich, are almoners of the Lord's bounty. He prayed for those who remained, reminding them that the Lord chastiseth whom he loves, and that they who die, although full of years and honor, do yet but exchange the decrease from troubling, and the weary are at rest, and at last pass beyond to enter into the joy of their Lord.

His voice ceased, and silence fell again upon the house. Every body was still. Some had fanned themselves, and the men looked about. Here was again the sense of waiting—of vague expectation. What next?

Three or four workmen went into the parlor. One of them put down the lid and locked it tight. The casket was closed forever. They lifted it and carried it out carefully, down the steps, and placed it into a hearse that stood upon the gravel, and the man who closed the lid buttoned his black coat and got into the hearse.

The same man went to the front door and read several names from a paper in a clear voice. The people descended the marble stairs, went out of the door, and stepped into carriages. The company rose in the library and left the room, and, moving toward the hall, looked at the mourners—at Hope Wayne and Mrs. Simcoe, at Mr. and Mrs. Budlong Dinks, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Dinks, and others, as they passed out.

Presently the carriages began to move slowly along the avenue. Those who remained stepped out upon the piazza and watched it: then began to talk about for their own carriages. One after another they drove away. Mr. Kingo said to Mr. Sutter that he believed the will was in the hands of Mr. Budlong Dinks, and would be opened in the morning. They looked around the place, and remarked that Miss Wayne would probably become its mistress.

"Mrs. Alfred Dinks seems to be a very—a very—" said Mr. Kingo, gravely, pausing upon the last word.

"Very much so, indeed," replied Mr. Sutter, with equal gravity.

"And yet," said Mr. Grabeau, "if it had been so ordered that young Mr. Dinks should marry his cousin, Miss Wayne, he would—that is, I suppose he would—" and he too hesitated.

"Undoubtedly," replied both the other gentlemen, decisively, "without question it would have been a very good thing." Mr. Burt must have felt a very big pecuniary."

"He made every one tell," said Mr. Sutter, taking the reins and stepping into his carriage.

"Home—mother—to dinner, perhaps?" inquired Mr. Grabeau, gravely, as he took out his whip.

"Awful!" replied Mr. Kingo, as he drove away.

The last carriage went, and the stately old mansion stood behind its trees deserted. The casket and its contents had been borne away forever, but somebody had opened all the windows of the house, and June, with its song, and bloom, and sunshine, overflowed the silent chambers and banished the smell of the varnish and every thought of death.

CHAPTER LIV.

THE REDRESS.

THE next morning it was hard to believe in the spectacle of the preceding day. The house of Pinewood was pleasantly open to the sun and air. Hope Wayne, in a black dress of the lightest possible texture, so thin that her arms could be seen through the sleeves, sat by a window. Lawrence Newt sat beside her. Dr. Peewee was talking with Mrs. Dinks. Her son Alfred was sitting alone in a chair, looking at his mother, and Mrs. Fanny Newt Dinks was looking out at the window upon the lawn. Mrs. Simcoe was near Hope Wayne. There was a table in the middle of the room from which every thing had been removed. The Honorable Budlong Dinks was walking slowly up and down the room; and Horace Wamley, another gentleman, friend of his, were conversing and smiling among themselves.

Mr. Dinks stopped in his walk, and leaning upon the table with the tips of two fingers and the thumb of his left hand, he thrust the right hand into the pocket, by the side of the ruffle of his shirt, as if he were about to address the company upon a weighty question.

"In accordance," said he, with an air of respect and resignation, "with the wishes of the late lamented Mr. Burt, as expressed in a paper found in his secretary drawer after his decease, I am about to do what I will."

The Honorable Mr. Dinks cleared his throat. Mrs. Fanny Newt Dinks turned back from the bright green representation outside. All eyes were fixed upon the speaker, who became more and more conscious every moment. He took out his glasses and placed them upon his nose, and slowly surveyed the company. He then drew a paper from his pocket, cleared his throat with great dignity as he did so:

"'I, Christopher Burt, merchant,' said he, again pausing about the room. At this point Hiram stepped gently in, and stood by the door.

"'I, Christopher Burt,' repeated he, and as if it had been sacramental bread, and with occasional pauses for groups around him to partake it—shook it—crossed it back—smoothed it—and held it carefully in the attitude of reading.

"'I, Christopher Burt,' he said, again, when he considered the audience had been sufficiently impressed with its ceremony, and with a proper appreciation of the fact that he had been selected to reveal the contents of that important paper to mankind, he began, and read that, word for sound and word, body, etc., etc., Christopher Burt, etc., etc., as an humble Christian, and loving the Lord in forms, gave his body to the ground, his soul to his God, in the hope of a happy resurrection, etc., etc.; and devised and bequeathed his property, etc. etc., in the manner following, to wit: that is to say:

"'First. I give, devise, and bequeath to my grandson Alfred, the son of my deceased daughter Fanny, the sum of five thousand dollars per annum, as hereinafter specified.'

"'Second. I give and bequeath to my grandson Alfred Dinks, who changed the position of his name without authority within himself—' By Jove!

"'Second. I give to Francis Dinks, the daughter of Francis Dinks, deceased, late of Boston, the sum of five thousand dollars.'

The voice of Mr. Budd Dinks ceased. His wife half rose and sat down again; her face was of a deep ashy color. Fanny Newt sat perfectly still and looked narrowly at her father-in-law, but very black and dangerous. Alfred had an air of troubled consternation, as if something fearful were about to happen. The whole company were disturbed. They seemed to be in an electrical condition of apprehension like the air before a thunder-burst.

Mr. Dinks continued:

"'Third. I give to Alfred Dinks, my grandnephew, my silver shoe-buckles, which belonged to his great-grandfather Bird.

"'Fourth. And all the other estate, real and personal, of which I may die seized, I give, devise, and bequeath, to Budlong Dinks, Timothy Dinks, and Sarah Sutter, in trust, nevertheless, and for the sole use, behoof, and benefit of my dearly beloved grand-daughter, Hope Wayne.'"

Mr. Dinks stopped. There were some papers annexed, containing directions for collecting the moneys to be paid to Mrs. Simcoe, and a schedule of the property. The Honorable B. Dinks looked hastily at the schedule.

"Miss Wayne's property will be at least a million of dollars," said he, in a formal voice.

There were a few moments of utter silence. Even the legal gentlemen ceased buzzing; but presently the forefinger of one of them was laid on the palm of his other hand, and as he stated his proposition a light conversation began.

Mrs. Fanny Dinks Newt seemed to have been smitten. She sat crushed up, as it were, biting her nails nervously; her face wrinkled incredulously, and glaring at her father-in-law, as he folded the paper. Her face grew altogether as black as her hair and her eyes; as if she might discharge a doubtful flash and burst of tempest if she were touched, or spoken to, or even looked at.

But Mrs. Dinks the elder did look at her, not at all with an air of fallen triumph, but, on the contrary, with a singularly inquisitive glance of apprehension and alarm, as if she felt that the petty trial of wits between them was insignificant compared with the chances of Alfred's happiness. In one moment it flashed upon her mind that the consequences of this will to her Alfred—to her son whom she loved—would be overwhelming. Good Heavens! she turned pale as she thought of him and Fanny together.

The young man had merely muttered "By Jove, that's too d——bad!" and flung himself out of the room.

His wife did not observe that her mother-in-law was regarding her; she did not see that her husband had left the room; she thought of no matter of wife, of no game she had won or lost. She thought only of the tragical mistake she had made; the dull, blundering crime she had committed; and still bowed over, and gnawing her nails, she looked sideways with her hard, vixen, black eyes, at Hope Wayne.

The heiress sat quietly by the side of her friend Lawrence Newt. She was holding the hand of Mrs. Simcoe, who glanced sometimes at Lawrence, calmly, and with no sign of regretful or vengeful remembrance. The Honorable Budlong Dinks was walking up and down the room, stroking his chin with his hand, not without a curiously vague indignation with the late lamented proprietor of Pinewood.

There was something strange in the spectacle. A room full of living men and women who had just heard what some of them considered their doom pronounced by a dead man. They had carried him out of his house, cold, powerless, screwed in the casket. They had laid him in the ground beneath the village spire, and yet it was his word that troubled, enraged, disappointed, shocked, and overwhelmed them. Beyond their gratitude, reproaches, taunts, or fury, he lay helpless and dumb—to them the most terrible and inaccessible of despots.

The conversation was cool and indifferent. The legal gentlemen moved about with a professional and indifferent air, as if they assisted at such an occasion as medical students at dissections. It was in the way of business. As Mr. Quibble, the confidential counsel of the late lamented Mr. Burt, looked at Mrs. Alfred

READING THE WILL.

Dinks, he remarked to Mr. Baze, a younger member of the bar, anxious to appear well in the eyes of Quiddy, that it was a pity the friends of deceased parties permitted their feelings to overpower them upon these occasions. Saying which, Mr. Quiddy waved his forefinger in the air, while Mr. Baze, in a deferential manner and tone, answered, Certainly; it was a final thing. There was no getting round a will drawn as that will was—here a slight bow to Mr. Quiddy, who had drawn the will, was politely made, and if people didn't like what they got, they had better grin and bear it. Mr. Quiddy concluded, marked, with the forefinger still wandering in the air as if restlessly seeking for some argument to point, that the silver shoe-buckles which had so long been identified with the easy gaunt costume of Mr. Sort would be a very pretty and interesting heir-loom in the family of young Mr. Dinks.

Upon which the eminent confidential counsel took snuff, and while he flirted the powder from his fingers looked at his young friend Baze.

Young Mr. Baze said, "Very interesting!" and continued the attitude of listening for further wisdom from his superior.

Lawrence Newt meanwhile had narrowly watched his niece Fanny. Her head had almost been supported by her; but he went over to her, presently.

"Well, Fanny."

"Well, Uncle Lawrence."

"Beautiful place, Fanny."

"Is it?"

"So peaceful after the city."

"I prefer town."

"Fanny!"

"Uncle Lawrence."

"What are you going to do?"

She had not looked at him before, but now she raised her eyes to his. She might as well have closed them. Drooping them, she looked upon the floor and said nothing.

"I say, Fanny, what?"

She looked fierce. There was a snake-like obstinacy in her appearance which Alfred's mother saw across the room and trembled. Then she raised her eyes again to her uncle's, and said, with a kind of hissing sneer,

"Indeed, Uncle Lawrence, thank you for the thing. It's not very hard for you to ask it now. Not dismayed, not even surprised by this speech, Lawrence was about to reply, but she struck in,

"No no. I don't want to hear it. I'm disheartened, but I have my revenge. As for you, my respected uncle, you have played your cards better.

He was surprised and perplexed.

"Why, Fanny, what cards? What do you mean?"

"I mean that an old fox is a sly fox," said she, with the hissing sneer.

Lawrence looked at her in amazement.

"I mean that sly old foxes who have lined their own nests can afford to pity a young one who gets a silver shoe-buckle," hissed Fanny, with bitter malignity.

"Fanny, my child," Alfred Dinks went on hopelessly, and he'd break the will. Better wills than this have been broken by good lawyers before now. Probably," and he added suddenly, with a sarcastic smile, "my dear uncle does not wish to have the will broken?"

Lawrence Newt was pondering what possible interest she thought he could have in the will.

"What interest could it make to you in existence, Fanny?"

"Only the difference of a million of dollars," said she, with her sneer set.

Gradually her meaning dawned upon Lawrence Newt. With a mingled pain and disgust and surprise, and a half-startled apprehension that others might have read his poetry, and that all kinds of disagreeable consequences might flow from such misapprehension, he perceived what she was thinking of, and what she suddenly and sharply that even Fanny started,

"You think I want to marry Alfred Dinks?"

"Of course I do. So does every body else. Do you suppose we have not known of your intentions? Do you think we have not watched you of your meetings all winter with that artist and Amy Waring, and your reading poetry, and that kind of disg daughters. The fire broke out in the basement kitchen, and it is supposed to have been burning for some time, as the heat through the upper story was intense. Mr. Bond was the first one to discover the fire, having been kept awake by a sore hand. Mr. Reiss and the next to the eldest daughter, sixteen years of age, attempted to escape from the third story, and their bodies were found on the landing outside. The two younger daughters were found suffocated in their beds. Mrs. Reiss escaped on to the roof of the piazza, and from thence was rescued by the firemen. Mr. Reiss and his eldest daughter were still breathing when found, but died soon after. The house is owned by Mr. Reiss, and is a three-story and double-stoop brick, and was occupied by the family and two boarders. The fire was still smouldering when the firemen left the premises, and was kept under control by the police.

DEATH OF THE OLDEST MERCHANT IN NEW YORK.

The Times has the following: "George Griswold, the oldest merchant in the city, and the head of one of the oldest mercantile firms in the country, died very suddenly indeed, on Monday afternoon, at the residence of his son-in-law, John C. Green, No. 63 Fifth Avenue. He was born in the house of Capt. Griswold, in Lyme, Conn., and was engaged in the Canton trade more than half a century. He retired in 1830. Griswold & Co. were rich men, though he is supposed to have been about eighty-three. He was the last surviving member of the eighteen partners in this city in partnership with his elder brother in 1810, and for fifty years was the most prominent position in our mercantile community. During all the revolutions of trade, he was the last to suspend the mercantile world during that period his firm has never suffered in credit. He took no active part in the great enterprises of the country, not only in those of a commercial character, but in those of a public and educational, and has been known rather as a capitalist than as a manager of great enterprise. He was a man of remarkable personal appearance, tall, erect, and handsome. He singularly black, piercing eye, and a stateliness of manner which did not forsake him to the last day of his life. He was the last of the race of mercantile magnates who laid the foundations of the commercial greatness of the city by their intelligent enterprise and integrity of purpose. He had been a benefactor of the New York Chamber of Commerce for fifty-two years, and that body will to-day pass resolutions of appropriate tribute to his memory. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church in University Place, Dr. Prime's. His funeral will take place on Thursday at 10 o'clock A.M.

ANOTHER AFFECTIONATE SOLDIER.

A correspondent of the Charleston Mercury, writing from Denver's Spring, Kansas Territory, says: "A gentleman visitor, named Henry, residing there, who was in the battle of King's Mountain, says:

"He is nearly ninety-five years old, and still reads without spectacles. He was a mere boy when he joined the battle, but stood his ground when Ferguson's troop charged with the bayonet, and in running escaped a shot through the hand and into the thigh. His rifle, which he had just loaded, was found empty when the moment he received the ThrusT. This filled his sabaigand, and he used the butt of his rifle with such effect that he felt sure he had killed his man. He was then charged upon and ridden by his thigh. He observed because a dismounted continental was about to be cut down by another more desperate criminal case than any other was in the field. As he lit immediately upon his account of the affair, he gave by himself, with the aid of Venus, another of the participators in that battle, who, in the course of his simple narrative was not the 'Game Cock,' but 'Tuck.' That he was so called by his comrades, who stood in awe of his prowess for bare-combickers. That a celebrated fighter named 'Tuck' was one of the best fighters in the army that is compliment to Sumter's pluck Gilmore gave him the sobriquet, 'Game Cock,' who afterward changed into the 'Game Cock.'"

PERSONAL.

Colonel Samuel Green died at Hartford on Tuesday, in the ninety-second year of his age. He was the founder of the New London Gazette for more than forty years, taking the paper in 1796. He was also a bookseller and publisher by his father. For more than fifty years he issued the Connecticut Register, a political manual, the first of which was commenced in 1795 by his father, Timothy Green.

Mr. Thomas Ritchie, Jr., who died at Richmond on Saturday, is the last child of the late Thomas Ritchie, Esq., for a quarter of a century the leader of his father, Benjamin Green, who emigrated from England in 1795, was one of the first to establish the business of type-selling in this country.

The English correspondent of the Southern Agriculturist says: "Strange as it may appear, your distinguished guest has made Mr. Powlson a serious offer of £2000 a year to accompany him in America as his agricultural adviser and gentleman's direction and supervision. No one but Barnum would have the impudence to have made such an offer to Mr. Powlson of such an unbalanced kind. Mr. Powlson flatly rejected and ignored the offer, and I am glad of it, seeing it is Mr. Barnum: 'O, full of subtlety and mischief, thou art the chief of the race enemy of all good.' Powlson, still blue pet cause to prevent the right ways of the world."

A Troy journal tells of a man who has lived to be a aged negro, and one of the oldest inhabitants of Niagara County, who entered his ninety-second year on the last Sabbath. Uncle Lewis has been a slave, an abolitionist, and now is another slave. He is as full of life as he will be as fairy spirit was, and on the death of a most prominent citizen he is believed to have become one of the daughters, whom he was compelled to leave behind. A number of years since he was a slave in Virginia, and for the lands of a young abolition lecturer, who promised to bring his youngest daughter to see him. He was discharged, either by stealing her from her master, or by her father-in-law. The latter was a slave, and the former the master, the master in case with his pet cow, yoke of oxen, and a few dollars in money, and the daughter in the other. Uncle Lewis emigrated distinctly several incidents of the Revolutionary War, and is still remembered to be terse it.

Simeon Owen, of Southampton County, Va., died a few days since, aged 106 years and 6 months. He was engaged in the battle of Yorktown, and also that of Petersburg, Virginia. The old soldier had never been confined to his bed, and to all appearances was capable of living for a number of years.

THE "GREAT EASTERN" STEAMSHIP AT SEA.

MY VISION.

I STOOD alone upon a narrow bridge just as the shadows of a September evening were falling. Above my head angry clouds drifted along like sunbriven spirits doomed to wander in the blackness of darkness; beneath my feet whirled the turbulent little stream, foaming over gray pebbles, and lashing the tender lilies that bloomed upon its banks, until their quivering stems broke, and they dropped, sobbing, into the current, fragrance and beauty gone forever!

A dreary wind, sweeping up from the east, dashed a shower of rain against my face, and then warned me to hasten on and seek shelter for the night before the storm began in good earnest; but I had only to laugh at the suggestion. With not a dollar in my pocket, nor even the prospect of one, who would welcome the wanderer to his house-door and bid me welcome to the warmth and good cheer of a home?

The last wood, which bounds my breath, proved the corner-stone of a castle in the air.

Because I was a poor outcast, seeking my fortune, with half my worldly possessions on my back, and the other half tied in a handkerchief, I carried along over a hickory staff upon my shoulder, it did not follow that there was nothing rich or fine within. I did not think that every one's spirit must plod along, keeping even pace with my feet and hands; and so, at the entrance of that sweetsmelling forest, my vision presented itself.

I sat in the parlor of a cottage nigh the sea, holding my wife by the hand, and looking from her calm face to the child that lay in her lap, and slept on her bosom. There were pictures hanging against the walls, and books lying upon the table within easy reach, and a bright fire of pine-cones smiled invitingly from a corner opposite, and a bright fire glowed on the hearth-stone. The sun turned away from them all, for within the circle of my sight arm was clasped a fairer picture than Raphael ever painted. A sweeter one I have never dreamed. Music! I had it in every low whisper my dear wife murmured, in every smile that blew forward from her lustrous eyes, from her glowing lips, from the magic touch of her slender fingers threading the soft hair of my child. I paint this down for the sake of contrasting it with my actual circumstances.

That morning I was the adopted son of Job Forrester, an eccentric old man, and heir-prospective to an estate of half a million; but when the doors of the Grange were shut behind me, and I was adrift upon the world, I was as poor in my expectations as night it may provoke a smile.

"It is true, Philip," said the old gentleman, in the full tide of a remonstrance against my folly, that the strong of hell are paved with the bones of infants. They have their vision upon the mercy—not the slightest, and of course will never be admitted there.

This mode of Mr. Forrester's theology I boldly averred to be false, and with more warmth than wisdom declared that no man deserved to be ultimately worthy the hottest rest in the adversary's kingdom; and as this irate remark of course assigned all believers a share in the future eternal reward, its result was my immediate ejection from the fine old mansion where I had been taught from boyhood to regard as my own.

But let this pass.

My vision floated away on a drift of rain-drops, and I turned and gazed, through mist and gathering gloom, up the road over which I had just come. Then I was a dweller in a dwelling in sight. I had not passed one for the last two miles, and for aught I knew I might go as much further before I came upon one. It was quite time I were moving. I pushed my hat down over my eyes, and, shielding good-sight to the darkling river, with its freight of willows, started on my way, when the cheerful jangle of a cow-bell fell upon my ear, and in few moments the sleek, white-faced animal who bore it drew near, gladdening me with gentle, sweet human eyes. Close behind followed a small child, her little foot moving wearily, and her hands full of yellow-mantled buttercups. I met the little stranger with shy glances as he walked along on the edge of the road, for my mood was, just suppose the foolish head was running over with the stories she had read and heard of bandits, murderers, and the like. But it pleased me to see that she did not quicken her pace, and presently, instead of whistling as a boy would have done, she began to hum a song to keep up her flagging spirits. It was a pleasant little voice, and reminded me of a honey bee in a field of red clover; and the fancy that it trembled with fear led me to interrupt it, and answer the little one that I was neither bandit nor murderer, but simply a poor man seeking his fortune, and very doubtful under what shelter to-night he was to be spared the chilling little heart! She held out her hand to me with a child's supreme confidence, and said, in the sweetest of accents,

"Poor man! I am very sorry you haven't any home, but my grandmother will let you stay at our house; she never turns any body away. We are almost there. I see the light in the kitchen window now."

I saw it too, and as we drew nearer the door was opened and a girl appeared, holding a lantern in her hand.

"Is that you, Milicent?" cried my little boy, dropping my hand and running forward; and the reply came in a quiet voice, "Yes, and I am glad you have come, Tiny, for I was beginning to feel anxious, for you've been gone more than two hours."

"It was all Bonnie's fault. She had strayed away into the woods, and it was hard work to find her. I tore my gown in two places, and cut both of my hands; but I've got some lilies, and—all! Milicent!" What followed I only guessed from Milicent's next words addressed to me.

"Come in, Sir, if you please. My grandmother will bid you welcome."

Tiny led the way into the kitchen, where by the chimney corner the old lady sat drowsing over her knitting work. She opened her eyes, however, as the little ones entered, and, seeing me also, laid the touch of the small brown hand on her shoulder, and smiled benignly in the face of the stranger, who stood, hat in hand, on the threshold.

"I have only a handful of corn and the widow's cruse to set before you, Sir," she said, in the following accents of age; "but the Lord has an overflowing store of winter to spare at full. Sit down by the fire, if you please. You are welcome, Sir, very welcome!" and the aged woman's voice fell away into softly out.

Truly it was the handsomest of humble apartments. Each cottage-kitchen, and destitute of any thing in the form of ornament, with the solitary exception of a wooden mantel-shelf, on which upon a pine light stand filled with wild flowers. The floor was unpainted, the window curtainless, the chairs, and the carpenter's handiwork would have scorned such poverty; but for me, the existence of the place having overtaken me, I was too weary to be fastidious, and accepting the simple hospitality with a grateful heart, I drew a chair to the kindled wood in front of the fire, and in a moment was so comfortable that I would not have exchanged it for the monarch-shadowed of a palace.

The two girls were gone, it seemed a long time, for the good old lady could not shake off her drowsiness, and the supper was so intensely still I could hear the clicking of my watch and the faint purring of the cat beside it, as she lay before the fire-place with marvelous distinctness. The stillness had its effect upon my overtaxed nerves, and I fell asleep, for the next I knew was the sound of Milicent's voice as she bade me welcome to the supper—and I took my eyes upon a picture which I cannot describe. I will only say that the streak of bell and turned and gazed, through mist and gathering gloom, up the road over which I had just come. Then I was a dweller in a dwelling in sight. I will only say that the streak of bell

"I am going to wake him up, Milicent."

"Not just yet, dear," Milicent answered. "Do not let Uncle Job disturb you."

I half unclosed my eyes, and saw her as she stood near the table, with the lamp-light shining full upon her. And here I might pause and tell you the color of her hair, the hue of her eyes, and the cast of her features; but I remember with more vivid impression of her matchless loveliness that genius must be dismissed, for no pencil would convey a correct idea of its mystic charm to a man blind from his birth.

"It is almost nine o'clock," persisted Tiny. "I think he might eat his supper, and then go to bed. I'm sure he must be very tired, for I am, Milicent."

Milicent laughed at this ebullition of impatience, and at the same moment I quite opened my eyes, and more with a view of looking at the child's face than chagrin. A bowl of new milk and a loaf of Indian bread awaited me upon the table, and a simple preparation for my supper—and I took my place before it, pleased at the prospect of a conversation with Milicent. I had a fine appetite, for as I broke the bread into my bowl the girls resumed quietly out, and I saw them no more that night.

This happened ten years ago. At the time it was the most unpleasant thing in the world to be taken by the wayside—the dwelling of the Widow Allen had not been built; Milicent was only a child, but as I look back to-night I think I recognize something higher, even a divine guidance.

I stationed myself in the door of my room outskirts this cottage stood (for there was no reason why I should not further live on board), and looked about for work. It presented itself first in a printing-office, which I entered in the capacity of a "type-setter." I was then about the twenty-first year the door of the editor's sanctum was thrown open, and I slipped into the easy chair before the critic's table.

Every night I saw Milicent More; and I may as well say here that from the first moment I had a sooner said to her, I loved her—not with the flaming passion of youth, but with the calm knowledge it is words, but with an affection so tranquil and quiet I mistook it for friendship. She was my friend. I could tell her my love, after the usual trouble of the day, and look into her calm eyes, as I could look into heaven, and see no error in it, but rest the quickening of a single pulse. No matter to what mood I came to her, she never failed to meet it, to sympathize with it, or, if I was wilful and wayward for her meekness, she softened it by words of comfort. She was a counselor, but never inclined to wound or offend my pride. I loved to call her sister, but it was not until years afterward I remembered that the name of sister should succeed the word brother.

One evening after a long walk, we paused on the little bridge which I have mentioned before. It was a warm summer night. Milicent's hat hung over her arm, and I could see her soft brown long spears of meadow grass and daisies in her hand. She was in a gay mood that was a grave mood than usual. I had tried in vain to look into her lips; and now, as I held her look down into the shining water, I saw that she was in the mood wherewith I had made her my queen, a tear fell upon its placid surface, and I, as slight a drop, toppled the water and wetted her glowing cheek. I had never thought Milicent nervous before; but now she covered her face with her hands, and I though in a moment the wave was as clear as crystal, I could not persuade her to look again.

"I will tell you, Philip," she said, softly, "but you must promise to be very tender, and not laugh at me. Then she pointed at the little bridge, and said, trembling now her tears, and laying her hand upon mine, "I have had a strange dream on that very spot, looking into the water. We had been walking just as we have to-night, and you had made me your queen, and called me by that endearing name which I have used to you so often, and which I could speak of now without a blush. I believed; then before I could speak there came between us a splendid woman's face. Oh! it was proud and handsome, and the long black hair that fell over her neck was threaded with diamonds that flashed and glittered so they dazzled my poor eyes and hid you from me. Then she pointed at my wreath with a gay, mocking laugh, and held her fingers on it, and just at their touch the little daisies faded and the wreath grew grass withered. Then I awoke, and said to myself, 'It was only a dream!' But, Philip, it came to me three times, without change, before dawn; and you may laugh if you will, but I am sure there is a cloud coming between us."

I did laugh, of course, and kissed the soft hand that trembled in mine, and I told her that not all the beautiful stars or shining stones in the universe should charm me away from my own treasure, gentle little sister. I was sincere; but I did not know myself half as well as did the simple girl at my side. That very hour proved it. In the midst of the sweet words there gulped up behind us a woman on horseback, a dark-faced, handsome lady, who smiled down on the glance fell, in passing, upon Milicent's crown of daisies. Her queenly figure was draped in a riding-habit of the newest pattern, and her head crept the rich plenty of her cheek; her dainty hands seemed too small to wield the spirited bridle and the prancing white whip. I stood gazing after her as though the wide world were filled with her regal presence, and when a shower of dust rose between my vailing her from my sight, I turned to Milicent, and said, with an air which I meant to be lofty,

"I believe in love at first sight."

"I thought so, Philip—and I have seen the lady of my dream!" Milicent spoke quietly, but her face was white, and her lips and eyes had a cold, proud look that startled me. Again without her hand from mine; for we were at the cottage door, and as she stood upon the unpainted wooden step, looked with grateful liberality. "Will you come in, Mr. Thornton?"

"No, not to-night; I am still under subjection to your mood, Milicent. I hope you will be yourself when we meet again." I was conscious that my voice and manner were quite cold, and was afraid I had gone a few paces from the door I heard her call me back. Then—Then—I am ashamed to say, with emphasis so sad that I turned and looked back. She stood white and motionless as a spirit in the moonlit portal, with the shadow of a rose at her, her long, fair hair drooping over her neck and bosom, and the dusky mellowing on her brow—a picture so full of touching sweetness that I was fain to retrace my steps and beg her to forgive my impatience. But a moment's reflection arose, as I were, from the earth, the splendid vision which had dazzled my eyes—the queenly lady with the drapery of royal purple, the sweeping plumes, the flashing, brilliant face, smiling upon Milicent and me, the air perfumed with fragrance of the ever-changing Heaven forgive me!—I left my sister grieved and in tears.

For the next three months I worshiped at the feet of Sybil Gardiner, like a blind fool. She was down from the city, spending the summer with a friend, to whose house I had free access. I had forgotten Milicent, the Law is a dull, stupidly good-natured individual; but suddenly she became the marvel of intellectual brilliancy, for every thing that Sybil touched or loved was made precious. I would listen for hours to her friend's idle gossip, for the sake of being in the same room; I might watch her brilliant face, her bewildering smile, and pretty, careless ways, for a month, when as I stood near the piano, seemed to carry my soul on its siren strains to the gates of Paradise. The woman that had been my heart-love and health came to me laden with fragrance; the crimson flowers which she decked her dark tresses with, and which she suffered to lie against the oval of her cheek, I would have given worlds to possess. She put papers in my hand, touched me with her slight fingers, and the little round-mouthed Law baby had his appointed share in the mere aspect of my dislike and jealousy. Ah! but she knew her power, and she used it well—now torturing me with coldness and scorn, and now by a rare smile, a whispered word, binding me thrice her slave. I think I was almost insane with excitement, and at last when so neglected the dear girl who dwelt with the old grandame and the child Tiny in the wayside cottage. Sometimes, in the wilfulness and blindness of my own apartment, her meek face would dawn upon me with a faint, silent terror, like the unsatisfied heart eyes that innocent, girlish face, into which I had never looked for consolation or comfort in vain, and then for a moment, I would feel that, in comparison with Sybil, Milicent More was a mere child, and not a fit companion. One summer I chanced to meet Tiny just as I was opening Mrs. Law's gate. The child did not speak, but she looked up in my face with questioning eyes, and a grave, troubled expression that I could in nowise forget, until the sight of her face was lost in a bewildering smile from her scarlet lips dispelled every upbraiding thought. And there was one other event which I must remember, when my agony at an article which had just appeared in a contemporary journal, a severe criticism on a critique of my own, and almost my stage breath—Milicent's humble home, half hoping, half fearing to meet her. The cottage-door was open, and the sunset in full bloom (how long it seemed since I helped her train its wayward tendrils over the slender lattice!) in a flood of enigmatical splendor which confused and bewildered me, as I stood, with clenched fists, and my head bowed, and comprehended at last the whole truth. Milicent was gone, and with her the only friend who could have spoken to me with the voice of truth. I was alone in the world, and I knew it.

"Where is Milicent?" I asked, of the old woman, who sat knitting, as usual, in the chimney corner.

"Milicent is gone, Sir," she said, in the feeble, quivering accents of age, "and the Lord has an overflowing store of winter to spare at full. Sit down by the fire, if you please. You are welcome, Sir, very welcome!" and the aged woman's voice fell away into softly out.

Truly it was the handsomest of humble apartments. Each cottage-kitchen, and destitute of any thing in the form of ornament, with the solitary exception of a wooden mantel-shelf, on which upon a pine light stand filled with wild flowers. The floor was unpainted, the window curtainless, the chairs, and the carpenter's handiwork would have scorned such poverty; but for me, the existence of the place having overtaken me, I was too weary to be fastidious, and accepting the simple hospitality with a grateful heart, I drew a chair to the kindled wood in front of the fire, and in a moment was so comfortable that I would not have exchanged it for the monarch-shadowed of a palace.

The two girls were gone, it seemed a long time, for the good old lady could not shake off her drowsiness, and the supper was so intensely still I could hear the clicking of my watch and the faint purring of the cat beside it, as she lay before the fire-place with marvelous distinctness. The stillness had its effect upon my overtaxed nerves, and I fell asleep, for the next I knew was the sound of Milicent's voice as she bade me welcome to the supper—and I took my eyes upon a picture which I cannot describe. I will only say that the streak of bell

"I am going to wake him up, Milicent."

"Not just yet, dear," Milicent answered. "Do not let Uncle Job disturb you."

I half unclosed my eyes, and saw her as she stood near the table, with the lamp-light shining full upon her. And here I might pause and tell you the color of her hair, the hue of her eyes, and the cast of her features; but I remember with more vivid impression of her matchless loveliness that genius must be dismissed, for no pencil would convey a correct idea of its mystic charm to a man blind from his birth.

"It is almost nine o'clock," persisted Tiny. "I think he might eat his supper, and then go to bed. I'm sure he must be very tired, for I am, Milicent."

Milicent laughed at this ebullition of impatience, and at the same moment I quite opened my eyes, and more with a view of looking at the child's face than chagrin. A bowl of new milk and a loaf of Indian bread awaited me upon the table, and a simple preparation for my supper—and I took my place before it, pleased at the prospect of a conversation with Milicent. I had a fine appetite, for as I broke the bread into my bowl the girls resumed quietly out, and I saw them no more that night.

This happened ten years ago. At the time it was the most unpleasant thing in the world to be taken by the wayside—the dwelling of the Widow Allen had not been built; Milicent was only a child, but as I look back to-night I think I recognize something higher, even a divine guidance.

I stationed myself in the door of my room outskirts this cottage stood (for there was no reason why I should not further live on board), and looked about for work. It presented itself first in a printing-office, which I entered in the capacity of a "type-setter." I was then about the twenty-first year the door of the editor's sanctum was thrown open, and I slipped into the easy chair before the critic's table.

Every night I saw Milicent More; and I may as well say here that from the first moment I had a sooner said to her, I loved her—not with the flaming passion of youth, but with the calm knowledge it is words, but with an affection so tranquil and quiet I mistook it for friendship. She was my friend. I could tell her my love, after the usual trouble of the day, and look into her calm eyes, as I could look into heaven, and see no error in it, but rest the quickening of a single pulse. No matter to what mood I came to her, she never failed to meet it, to sympathize with it, or, if I was wilful and wayward for her meekness, she softened it by words of comfort. She was a counselor, but never inclined to wound or offend my pride. I loved to call her sister, but it was not until years afterward I remembered that the name of sister should succeed the word brother.

One evening after a long walk, we paused on the little bridge which I have mentioned before. It was a warm summer night. chimney corner the old lady sat drowsing over her knitting work. She opened her eyes, however, as the little ones entered, and, seeing me also, laid the touch of the small brown hand on her shoulder, and smiled benignly in the face of the stranger, who stood, hat in hand, on the threshold.

"I have only a handful of corn and the widow's cruse to set before you, Sir," she said, in the following accents of age; "but the Lord has an overflowing store of winter to spare at full. Sit down by the fire, if you please. You are welcome, Sir, very welcome!" and the aged woman's voice fell away into softly out.

WHAT THE ROMANS READ.

It is one of the numerous festivals kept in honor of the Madonna we will suppose. The scene, a hill village among the Apennines, which the traveler crosses between Rome and Naples. There is not very far from either of them grand march of accredited temples, the "Holy House of Loretto" and Assisi, the birth and burial place of the great Mendicant, St. Francis. Almost the whole population of the village and the neighboring hills is gathered in and in front of the church. In the midst of all this crowd, and by the side of the church-door, and backed against the wall of the building, is the temporary stall of the itinerant vender of devotional appurtenances.

Truly extraordinary is the variety of objects for sale here. Little prayer-books illustrated in gaudy; little crucifixes cast in mixed metal of various colors; vile wood-cuts, some coarsely daubed with paint, representing some saint with a glory-halo sticking in his skull, or the naked bodies of half a dozen men and women crowded in sheets of flame up to the middle; rosaries; little waxen dolls reclining on beds of white wool in glass-topped boxes surmounted by a cross; ornamented with holy-water vases for hanging up at the font head; and larger crucifixes for sticking in the ground over the hand-door. Then there is the literature, of which one little book I buy is a choice specimen. And for all these articles—excepting the books—the proprietor, as the chief-covered-house at the opposite end of the village, notwithstanding the modern-sounding license inside the church, and nevertheless standing here first, here last, and very poorly furnished cupboards at home, is the sole vender.

Such was the sort of scene which was going on when and where I bought the book. The character of which I humbly think it welcome that some shroud should know of.

My book is entitled, "Copy of a Prayer found in the Sepulchre of our Lord in Jerusalem." It is printed in Italian. "By very great revelation," runs without date. It is a misnomer to call it a prayer —which it is not, in any sense. A few lines of preface state that it was many years ago after having been found at Jerusalem, it is to be supposed—"by his Holiness and by Christians." It is printed in letters, in boxes of silver." The author seems to consider the present pontiff and Charles the Fifth contemporaries; but that is a trifle, and a slip of the pen.

The work opens thus: "Saint Elizabeth, Queen of Hungary, Saint Matilda, and Saint Bridget, being anxious to know some particulars of the Passion"—I omit the queen and the saints here—"made especial prayer, in answer to which" the Divine Teacher, whose presence was then visible, "appeared to them, speaking to them as follows." The text proceeds (I translate it with scrupulous and literal exactness) thus: "Ye shall number and, know that the armed soldiers were a hundred and twenty-five in number. Of these I had taken in the garden, to make me get up from the ground, they gave me a hundred and twenty blows. On being given by hand on my head and on my breast were a hundred and sixty-eight. I received mighty blows on the shoulders, all lacerated with cords and by the hair twenty-three times. The spittings on my face were three and a thousand soldiers who smashed six hundred and sixty-six. On my body I received a hundred wounds, and a hundred on my head. They gave me a thrust, which was mortal. I remained on high on the cross, by the hair, two hours and a half, one I breathed forth a thousand and twenty-nine sighs. I was dragged by the beard twenty-three times. The pricks of the crown of thorns were a hundred. Mortal punctures on the forehead were three. The wounds which I received from a thousand soldiers who conducted me, were five hundred and eight. They who guided me were three. The drops of blood which I shed were five thousand three hundred and eighty.

"To any person who will recite seven Paters and seven Aves for the souls of twelve successive years, to make up the number of the drops of blood which I shed, and who shall live like a good Christian, I grant five bones."

The five bones are set forth as follows:

"1. Plenary indulgence, and remission of all sins.

"2. He shall be free from the pains of purgatory.

"3. If he should die before completing the twelve years, it shall be all the same as if he had completed them.

"4. He shall be as if he were a martyr, or had had his blood for the holy faith.

"5. I will come down from heaven to earth for his soul, and for those of his relatives to the fourth generation."

These are the advantages to be obtained by the twelve years' Paters and Aves. But these promises do not by any means comprise all the benefits obtainable from this remarkable book, which is worth at least one hundred and fifty times its price. The wonderful book proceeds as follows:

"Whoever shall carry this Oration about him shall not die by drowning, or by other disastrous end, nor by sudden death. He shall escape from contagion, from the pestilence, from being struck by lightning; and he shall not die without confession. He shall be freed from his enemies, from the pursuit of justice" (a great temptation this to certain likely classes of purchasers), "and from all malevolent and false witnesses. Women in childbed, having this about them, shall be safely and easily delivered, and shall be out of all danger. In the houses where there shall be a copy of this Oration there shall be no treachery or other evil things; and forty days before his end (which is late literally, and without omission) he shall see the blessed Virgin Mary."

Who would not spend a halfpenny on such terms, even if it were his last? It is not necessary, observe, even to read a word of the miraculous little book. That might exclude a large number of purchasers from the market. But neither will one copy—except in the case of that household copy which is to protect an entire family from ever having a thief under his or more than one individual. The talisman must be carried about the person.

The book concludes with an anecdote explanatory and exemplificatory of the operation of the remarkably strong case of its efficacy under difficult circumstances has been selected.

"A certain man, in a drunken revelling, saw a head which had been cut from the body. That decapitated head spoke. It said, 'Since you are going to Barcelona, oh traveler, bring me a message, that I may confess myself; for three days ago I was killed by a certain assassin, and I am not able to die without confessing myself.' A confessor having been conducted to the spot, the head spoke the living head confessed itself, and then forthwith died. And this Oration was found upon it."

Now is it not matter for sadness in all true men, whether their creeds or opinions, that a book like this, which has been compounded together, as a wonderful exhibition, shutting out from its people the rudiments of real revelation, and teaching them with such mental food as this? Providing them with it, and selecting it for them; for the system of the Romish church is the system of the vendors of such articles, which is most strictly enforced in the Papal States, and which is maintained under this responsibility. Is it not evident that a people among whom such statements and promises can find credence, must be far from any conception of real Christianity?

MORE REAL GHOSTS

In the following case, for which I am personally responsible, there is a singular complication of causes and transmission of thought.

There was a time, four friend of my younger days, whom I will call Owens. When we were both at a private boarding-school in a second-rate village in Surrey, he, I, and a third young man were almost inseparable, and used to spend our leisure time constantly side by side, through the romantic lanes that are so beautiful any where in a small district—indeed, in its small green, shady banks of Surrey.

Imagine the three friends scattered into various paths of life. I am married; Owens, who ran down from business to be present at that marriage, is in his father's business in London; and his next youngest friend (give him the name of Insos) is studying for the Church at Cambridge. Years passes, we have settled to a comfortable life, hard gallops over the Surrey heaths, and exercise of all kinds, good dinners, and occasional mysterious kind, to which all the resources of medicine bring no relief. Owens, in the full vigor of health, in a north way at East Sheen, where his family had taken a cottage for the sake of affording him country air. Insos remained at his studies undisturbed. Only intensee was known remained behind the three friends, and seemed to that year patiently was placed on a fortifying diet, and was promised eventual restoration. I found him dressed as usual, lying, with his head on a low chair, his accustomed seat in his face. Always handsome, it was now refined into something more than mere large blue eyes, the crimson lips, the hectic tinge upon a waxen ground, were indications not to be mistaken.

Still, I did not think the end near at hand. He had a good deal to say, and I was glad to listen, and so were those about him. When his two sisters came, smiling, into the room to warn me that I must not excite, or fatigue him, they, in accompanying me into the drawing-room, they expressed their hopes about dying from the same terror. Close behind me she came. I knew that she urged me to leave at the moment I did, and that I was on we rode—silent and swift—enveloped in the same dread, nor ever checked our pace till we reached the door of my own house, where we stayed.

Note again this remarkable thing. We neither of us said one word respecting the facts, to each other, to any body, when we withdrew to prepare ourselves for tea, or during the whole evening. We did not even dress together at night, I began:

"Did you see it?"

"Yes!"

"Can you bear to think of it or talk of it?"

"Hardly!"

"Do you shudder when you think of it?"

"Yes!"

But now a strong curiosity took possession of me, and I (without a word) might suggest an explanation, and more particularly:

"What did you see?" How did you feel?"

Each described what he had seen and had not seen, felt, and thought. Moreover, the description was given, throughout, that I was feeling just as she did, and that we were thinking and acting as one person.

"When," she said, "you urged on your horse I knew that it was to pass the ugly figure as rapidly as possible. I felt a fear that the man (for it seemed to be a man) would seize hold of my horse's bridle. I thought only we shall ride over this man! I saw the dark figure lean on one side and recline, as it were, upon the bank. Almost in the same moment it disappeared. I looked through and over the hedge, almost incredulously—as if, to use an old expression, I did not believe my own eyes. I saw that the figure had really disappeared; and then I felt a creeping all over me, and a wish to get away, and to reach home, as if there would be something real there. I knew very well that you urged on your horse for the same reason that I urged on mine. But I could not have spoken to you for the world!"

After this conversation we agreed that we would not speak about it—speak of this thing again.

But I never thought of Owens.

Three or four days after (while we were still staying at the same friend's house where we had been at the time of the appearance) we went with our hosts in an open carriage to the neighboring town. The ladies were in a mercer's shop, when a groom with black crape round his hat rode up to the carriage in which I sat with the coach-door, and gave into my hands a letter sealed with black. Instantly I opened it, and found that it contained rather a detailed account of the death of my dear friend Owens: which had occurred on the previous Saturday and evening—on the evening when I had seen the dark figure in the lane, and at a little before nine o'clock—the hour of the appearance. The letter stated that an apoplectic attack had occurred in the morning. Bleeding had relieved the threatening. Toward evening the patient became conscious, and, from his own feelings, declared that he was about to die. He then sent farewell messages to various friends. I was particularly mentioned, almost at the moment of death, and the circumstance was expressed that I should be present at his funeral. According to the letter invited to the funeral. Cross stoun to that ed ceremony, which was to take place in a day or two, at a village in Surrey, about ten miles from Impossible, after this, not to connect the appearance in the lane with the death of Owens. Besides, there now suddenly came into my head a crowd of circumstances singularly connected with the appearance—the appearance, as it would perfectly be called. In those lanes Owens and myself had often ridden, and when I had dismounted these haunts of our youth, Owens, the time being winter, had constantly worn a large cloak or cape-coat (as the article was called at that time), of a dark-blue color, which he was accustomed to drop from his back on the grave's edge to sketch.

Curiously, too, I had a miniature picture of Owens in that very cloak. Insos, a brilliant draughtsman had painted the cloak as effected and Byronic; and so, in that young season, I was apt to play the part of the elf among the trees, and to try to please every lady (let the reader believe I have given this story a large clear margin) who, at that very time, in the hands of the artist (Miss Kentish) to be altered. All this occurred to me in a flash, and had no place in my remembrance before.

The story is not quite finished yet.

Let the reader imagine the funeral long over. Time has passed and I am down at Cambridge to visit Insos, my friend. I find the room (the third of the private-tutor trio, be it remembered) in which the appearance occurred occupied by two baby orders. Still he has time to talk to me of old days, of the death of poor Owens, and of the sorrow which it caused him. Then he named him. I will take the story of the appearance in the lane.

The latter considers way Insos said, "Do you not remember what took place in that lane?"

"No."

"Good Heaven!" exclaimed Insos, "it was there, if I rightly understood your description, that you saw the figure which solemnly swept past other, that he of us who died first should appear to the others—that it, if there were a future state, that he of the young skepticism, were not quite sure of."

The words of Insos were to me as the application of fire to a revelation written in sympathetic ink. Every syllable came out clearly. A connection of events, which had been entirely lost from recollecting, now shot into its place, and that, too, with an astonishing vividness. How could I have lost that memory until now! Just there! Yes, indeed, it was the very spot where we had always met the dark figure, and where and where that the first dead should appear to the other two.

Is there any thing to have failed to recognize that spot? Surely it was marked enough by the long vista of lane, the turn at the end, the bough's gutting through, the light coming through!

Why, now, enlightened as I was, I could have identified every foot of the way. Every bank, every bit-hole, even a species of hemlock that grew there-about.

And we had not on that bank. And I had not remembered it.

Is it strange this case of my own as a most beautiful and interesting proof of the power of soul and brain, at the moment when the former is the severest, to manifest their existence to another soul and brain—as a remarkable instance of a power there is in the latter energy, at that great extremity and verge of change, to impress humanity with kindred thought; and that so strongly that the two shall be impressed together, either simultaneously or by conveying the electric impulse from one to the other.

Be it remembered Owens had been present at my marriage with Mrs. Cranstoun. He was not well at the time. He had left a sick room to come to the church where the marriage took place. Those circumstances would naturally impress his mind, and connect Mrs. Cranstoun and myself in one idea, as it were. Naturally he might connect us two in a dying thought, and so, by the wondrous celestial agitation of the act of dissolution, might make the idea of himself apparent to both of us at the same moment.

Or the dying spirit and agitated brain might impress my brain and optic nerve alone; and I recall at the time my own cerebral impressions. I might convey my own cerebral impressions to the person who was close to me and in strict relation with me.

CHAPTER XVII.—Continued.

As if this had been a concerted signal, the back door was struck as rudely the next instant. They were hemmed in. But at these alarming sounds Margaret seemed to recover some share of self-possession. She whispered, "Say he was here, but is gone." And with this she seized Gerard and almost dragged him up the rude steps that led to her father's sleeping-room. Her own lay next beyond it.

The blows on the door were repeated.

"Who knocks at this hour?"

"Open, and you will see!"

"I can not do so unless—honest men are all abed now."

"Open to the law, Martin Wittenhagen, or you shall rue it."

"Why that is Dirk Brower's voice, I trow. What wake you me for, then Tergoz?"

"Open, and you will know."

Martin threw the bolt, and in rushed Dierich and four more. They let in their companion who was at the back-door.

"Now, Martin, where is Gerard Geerardssen?"

"Gerard Geerardssen? Why he was here but now."

"Was here?" Dierich's countenance fell. "And where is he now?"

"They say he is gone to Italy. Why? What is to do?"

"No matter. When did he go? Tell me not that he went in such a storm as this!"

"Here is a cell about Gerard Geerardssen," said Martin, contemptuously. Then he lighted the candle, and, seating himself coolly by the fire, proceeded to whip some fine silk round his bowstring at the place where the nick of the arrow frets it. "I'll tell you," said he, carelessly. "Do you know his brother Giles—little misbegotten imp, all head and arms? Well, he came tearing over here on a mule, and bawled out something. I was too far off to hear the creature's words, but I heard its noise. Any way, he started Gerard. For as soon as he was gone there was such crying and kissing, and then Gerard went away. They do tell me he is gone to Italy—mayhap you know where that is, for I don't."

Dierich's countenance fell lower and lower at this account. There was no law in it. A commonger man than Martin would perhaps have told a lie too many, and betrayed himself. But Martin did his task well. He only told the one falsehood he was bade to tell, and of his own head invented nothing.

"Mates," said Dierich, "I doubt he speaks sooth. I told the Burgomaster he should be. He met the dwarf galloping Peter Buykens's mule from Sevenbergen. 'They have sent that imp to Gerard,' says he, 'to, them, Gerard is at Sevenbergen.'—'Ah, master!' says I, 'tis too late now. We should have thought of Sevenbergen before.' Instead of wasting our time hunting all the odd corners of Tergoz for those cursed parchments that we shall never find if we had the search all day, that took 'em. If he was at Sevenbergen, quoth I, 'and they have sent the dwarf to him, it must have been to warn him we are after him. He is leagues away by now,' quoth I. Confound that chuckle-head girl! she has outwitted us bravely mates; and so I told the Burgomaster, but he would not hear reason. A vet jerkin a piece, that is all we shall get, mates, by this job."

Martin grinned coolly in Dierich's face.

"However," added the latter, "just to content the Burgomaster, we will search the house."

Martin turned grave directly.

This change of countenance did not escape Dierich. He relented a moment.

"Watch outside you of you, one on each side of the house, that no one jump from the upper windows. The rest come in with me."

And he took the candle and mounted the stairs, followed by three of his comrades.

Martin was left alone.

The stout stolker hung his head. All had gone so well at first, and now this fatal delay. He ardently it scurried to him that all was not yet lost. Gerard was but close in Peter's room or Margaret's; they were not so very high from the ground. Gerard would leap out. Dierich had left a man below; but a man is a man. In a minute Gerard and he would be two to one, and, in that brief space, what might not be done?

Martin then held the back-door ajar and watched. The light was in Peter's room. "Curse the fool!" said he, "he is going to let them take him like a girl!"

The light passed now into Margaret's bedroom. Still no window was opened. Had Gerard intended to escape that way he would not have willed till the man was in the room. Martin was at that ease, and left the door, and came to the foot-stair and listened. He began to think Gerard must have escaped by the window while all the men were in the house. The longer the silence continued the stronger grew this conviction.

He softly and rudely dissipated.

Piercing shrieks issued from the inner bedroom —Margaret's.

"They have taken him," groaned Martin; "they have got him."

It flashed through Martin's mind in one moment that if they took Gerard away his life was not worth a button; and that if evil befell him Margaret's heart would break. He cast his eyes wildly round like some savage beast seeking an escape, and in a twinkling he formed a resolution terribly characteristic of those iron times and of a soldier driven to bay.

CHAPTER XVIII.

He stepped to each door in turn, and imitating Dirk Brower's voice, said sharply, "Watch the window!" He then quietly closed and bolted both doors. He then took up his bow and six arrows; one he fitted to his string, the others he put into his quiver. His knife he placed upon a chair behind him, the bolt turned him: and there he waited at the foot of the stair with the calm determination to slay those four men, or be slain by them. Two he knew, he could dispose of by his arrows, ere they could get near him, and Gerard and he must take their chance, hand-to-hand, with the remaining pair. Besides, he had seen men panic-stricken by a sudden attack of this sort. Should Brower and his men hesitate but an instant, he should shoot three instead of two, and then the odds would be on the right side.

He had not long to wait. The heavy steps sounded in Margaret's room, and came nearer and nearer.

The light also approached, and voices.

Martin's heart stood as it were still, then hard, to hear men coming that to their death, and, perhaps, to his; more likely so than not; for four is long odds in a battle-field of ten feet square, and Gerard might be bound, perhaps, and powerless to help. But this man, whom we have seen shaken in his sheet at a Giles-o'-lanthorn, never wavered in this awful moment of real danger, but stood there, his bow at full brace for caution, and his eye glowing, ready to take life and lose it. Desperate game! to win which was exile instant and for life, and to lose it was to die that moment upon that floor he stood on.

Dierich Brower and his men found Peter in his first sleep. They opened his cupboards; they ran their knives into an alligator he had nailed to his wall; they looked under his bed: it was a large bed, apparently full of hiding-places, but they found no Gerard.

Then they went on to Margaret's room, and to very sight of it was discouraging—it was small and bare, and not a cupboard in it: there was, however, a large fire-place and chimney. Dierich's eye fell on these directly. Here they found the beauty of Sevenbergen sleeping on an old chest, not a foot high, and no attempt made to cover it; but the sheets were snowy white, and so was Margaret's own linen. And there she lay, looking like a lily fallen into a rut.

Dierich's eye awoke, and sat up in the bed, like one amazed; then, seeing the men, began to scream violently, and pray for mercy.

She made Dierich Brower ashamed of his errand.

"Here is a to-do," said he, a little confused. "We are not going to hurt you, my pretty maid. Lie you still, and shut your eyes, and think of your wedding-day, until I look up this chimney to see if Master Gerard is there."

"Gerard! in my room?"

"Why not? They say that you and he—"

"Cruel! you know they have driven him away from me—and him from his native place, where he is a blind. You are thieves; you are wicked men. You are not sons of Sevenbergen, or you would know Margaret Braudt better than to look for her lover in this room of all others in the world. Oh fie, fie! Cruel! cruel! talking such a tongue, and to-ed to the teeth, to assist one poor honest girl! The women that live in your own houses must be naught, or you would respect them too much to insult a girl of good character."

"There, come away, before we hear worse," said Dierich, hastily. "He is not in the chimney. Plaster will sand what a codged breaks; but a woman's tongue is a double-edged dagger, and a girl is a woman with her mother's milk still in her." And he beat a hasty retreat. "I told the Burgomaster how twould be."

CHAPTER XIX.

Where is the woman that can not act a part? Where is she who will not do it, and do it well, to save the man she loves? Nature on these great occasions comes to the aid of the simplest of the sex, and teaches her to throw dust in Solomon's eyes. The men had no sooner retired than Margaret stepped out of bed and opened the long chest on which she had been lying down in her skirt and petticoat and stockings, and night-dress over all, and put the lid, bed-clothes and all, against the wall: then glided to the door and listened. The dectogue died away through her father's room, and down the stairs.

Now in that chest there was a peculiarity that it was almost impossible for a stranger to detect. A part of the boarding of the room had been broken, and Gerard being applied to to make a leak neater, and bring short of materials, had ingeniously sawed away a space sufficient just to admit Margaret's mi-diesse bed, and with the materials thus acquired he had repaired the whole room. As for the bed or chest, it really rested on the rafters I first below the room. Consequently it was full two feet deep, though it looked scarce one.

All was quiet. Margaret kneeled and gave thanks to Heaven. Then she glided from the door, and leaned over the empty chest, and whispered, tenderly, "Gerard!"

Gerard did not reply.

She then whispered, a little louder, "Gerard, all is safe, thank Heaven! You may rise; but, oh! be cautious!"

Gerard made no reply.

She laid her hand upon his shoulder. "Gerard!"

No reply.

"Oh! what is this?" she cried, and her hands

ran wildly over his face and his bosom. She took him by the shoulders; she shook him: she lifted him; but he escaped from her trembling hands, and fell back, not like a man, but like a body. A great cloud fell on her. The lid had been open, She had lain upon it. The men had been some time in the room. With all the strength of frenzy she tore him out of the chest. She bore him in her arms to the window. She dashed the window open. The sweet air came in. She laid him in it, and in the moonlight. His face was the color of ashes, his body was all limp and motionless. She felt his heart. Horror! it was as still as his rest! Horror of horrors! she had stilled him with her own body!

CHAPTER XX.

This ended can not all at once believe so great and sudden and strange a calamity. Gerard, who had got alive into that chest scarce five minutes ago, could he be dead?

She called him by all the endearing names that heart could think, or tongue could frame. She kissed him, and called for kisses in return. She implored him to speak to her.

No answer to words of love, such as she had never uttered to him before, nor thought she could utter. Then the poor creature, trembling all over, began to go over that white face little touches of things that were at once terrible and pitiable.

"Oh, Gerard! I am very sorry you are dead! I am very sorry I have killed you! Forgive me for not letting the man take you; it would have been better than this! Oh, Gerard! I am very, very sorry for what I have done!" Then she began suddenly to rave. "No! no! such things can't be, or there is no God! It is monstrous! How can my Gerard be dead? How can I have killed my Gerard? I have him! O God! you know how I love him! He does not. I never told him. He must have seen how he would speak to me; he would not be so deaf to his poor Margaret. It is all a trick to make me cry out and betray him: but no, I love him too well for that. I'll duke first." And she seized her own throat to check her wild desire to scream in her terror and anguish.

"If he would but say one word. Oh, Gerard! don't die without a word. Have mercy on me, and speak one! but speak to me; if you are angry with me, scold me! curse me! I deserve it. The idea that killed the man she loved better than herself in the world, and was killed by him in all the world. Help, help! I have murdered him. Ah! ah! ah! ah!"

She tore her hair, and uttered shriek after shriek so wild, so piercing, they fell like a knell upon the ears of Dierich Brower and his men. All started to their feet, and looked at one another.

CHAPTER XXI.

Martin Wittenhagen, standing at the foot of the stairs with his arrow drawn nearly to the head, and his knife behind him, was struck with amazement to see the men come down without Gerard: he lowered his bow, and looked open-mouthed at them. Dierich, for his part, was equally surprised at the attitude they had found him in.

"Why, mates, was the old fellow making ready to shoot one of us?"

"Stuff!" said Martin, recovering his stolid composure, "I was but trying my new string. Till summoning my bow, if you think that."

"Humph!" said Dierich, dubiously, "there is something more in you than I understand; yet a lag on, and a bow-string is but a bit ex ye."

A blazing fire was soon made, and the men gathered round it, and their clothes and long hair were soon smoking in the cheerful blaze. Then it was that the shrieks were heard in Margaret's room. They all listened, and one of them seized the candle, and ran up the steps that led to the bedroom.

Martin rose hastily, too, and being confused by these sudden screams, and apprehending danger from the man's activity, tried to prevent him from going there.

At this Dierich threw his arms round him from behind, and called on the others to keep him. The man that had the candle got clear away, and all the rest fell upon Martin, and after a long and fierce struggle, in the course of which they were more than once all rolling on the floor, with Martin in the middle, they succeeded in mastering the old Samson, and binding him hand and foot with a rope they had brought for the purpose.

"That is a good job," said Dierich, panting; "our lives weren't safe while this old fellow's fiber bones were free. He makes me think Gerard is herashotes, for all we can't find him. Halle, mates! Julian Ketel's a long time in that girl's bedroom.

The rude laugh caused by this remark had hardly subsided when loud screaming were heard proceeding along overhead.

"Oh! here he comes, at last. Well, Jorian, what is to do now?"

CHAPTER XXII.

Jorian Ketel went straight to Margaret's room, and there he found the man he had been in search of, pale and motionless, his head in Margaret's lap, and she kneeling over him, mute now, as if stricken to stone. Her eyes were dilated, yet glazed, and she neither saw her lover's enemy, nor the man, nor cared for any thing on earth but the white face in her lap.

Jorian stood awe-struck; the candle shaking in his hand.

"Why, where was he, then, all the time?

Margaret heeded him not. Jorian went to the empty chest and inspected it. He began to comprehend. The girl's dumb and deep despair moved him.

"This is a sorry sight," said he; "it is a black night's work; all for a few skins! Better have gone with the men so. She is past answering so, poor wench! Stop—she is crying!"

He took down a little round mirror, no bigger than his hand, and held it to Gerard's mouth and nostrils, and held it there. When he withdrew it, it was clear. Jorian Ketel gave a joyful cry:

"There is life in him yet!"

At that word, it was as if a statue had started into life. Margaret's eyes shot fire, and she threw her arms round Jorian's neck.

"Oh, blest the tongue that tells me so!" and she kissed the great man's fellow again and again, eagerly, almost fiercely.

"There, there, let us lay him warm," said Jorian; and in a moment he raised Gerard, and laid him on the bedclothes. Then he went to fetch his cordial, and, taking up his hand twice with Schiedam, and flung it sharply each time in Gerard's face, he began to administer it internally for his recovery—he gave a faint sigh. Oh, never was sound so joyful to human ear! She fell on her knees, and began stopping, quivering for fear she should hurt him. She had lost all confidence in her power.

"That is right—let him alone," said Jorian; "don't go rushing him as you did me, or you'll drive his breath back again. Let him alone: he is sure to come to. 'Tisn't like as if he was an old man."

Gerard sighed deeply, and a faint streak of color stole to his lips. Jorian saw it with joy. He had hardly reached it, when he found his legs seized from behind.

It was Margaret. She curled round his knees like a serpent, and kissed his hand, and fawned on him. "You won't tell? You have saved his life; you have not the heart to thrust him back into his grave, to undo your own good work?"

"No, no! It is not the first time I've done you two a good turn; 'twas I told you in the church porch where he used to take him. Besides, what's Dirk Brower to me? I'll see him hanged ere I'll ed him. But I wish you'd tell me where the parchments are? There are a hundred crowns offered for them. That would be a good windfall for my Joan and the children, you know."

"Ah! they shall have those hundred crowns." "What are the things in the house?" asked Justas, eagerly.

"Why, but I know where they are: and, by God and St. Barzee, I swear you shall have them to-morrow. Come to me for them when you will, to-morrow."

"I were mad, else. What I share the hundred crowns with Dirk Brower? And now may my rust on in my skin if I let a soul know the poor boy is here!"

He then ran off, lest by staying longer he should excite suspicion, and have Master Justas hang, and Margaret knelt, quivering from head to foot, and prayed beside Gerard, and for Gerard.

"What is to do? Why, we have scared the girl out of her wits. She was in a trance of fear."

"Who had better fill pot and doctor her, then."

"Oh yes! and frighten her into the churchyard. Her father is a doctor, and has skill in him, and set him to bring her round. Let us see to her, will ye?"

His offhand way disarmed all suspicion. And soon after the party agreed that the kitchen of the Three Kings was much warmer than Master Justas's house, and departed, having first untied Martin.

"Take note, mate, that I was right, and the Burgomaster wrong," said Dietrich Brower, at the door: "I said we should be too late to catch him, and we were too late."

Then Gerard, in one terrible night, grazed the gates of the grave!

And how did he get clear at last? Not by his cunningly-contrived hiding-place. Master Justas was really wit; but by a good impulse in one of his captors—by the bit of humanity left in a somewhat reckless fellow's heart, aided by his sense of pain. So mixed and seemingly incongruous are human motives, so short-sighted our shrewdest counsels!

They whose moderate natures, or gentle fates, keep them in life's passage from the fierce extremes of grief and anguish our nature is capable of, have perhaps the best, and certainly the happiest, of mankind. But to such readers I should try in vain to convey what bitter sorrow and woe rest upon those persecuted lovers. Even to those who have joyed greatly and greatly suffered, my feeble art can present but a pale reminiscence, and a faint reflection of Margaret's and Gerard's ecstasy.

To sit and see a beloved face restored from the grave to the world, to health and beauty by swift gradations; to see the rose return to the loved cheek, love's glance to the loved eye, and his words to the loved mouth: this was Margaret's joy by instance years of waiting. It was Gerard's to awake from a trance and find his head pillowed on Margaret's arm; to feel her warmth so adored murmur new words of eloquent love, and shower tears and tender kisses and caresses on him. He never knew, till that moment, how he ardently, how tenderly she loved him. He thanked his enemies. They wrenched their enamoured round each other, and trouble and danger seemed a world, an age, behind them. They asked of each other husband and wife. Had they not stood before the altar together? Was not the blessing of Holy Church upon them? Clear were curses on all who would part them?

But as no woman's nerves can bear with impunity so terrible a strain, presently Margaret turned faint, and sank on Gerard's shoulder, smiling feebly, but quite speechless. Then Gerard was anxious, and would seek assistance. But she held him with a gentle grasp, and implored him not to leave her for a moment. "While I can lay my hand on you I feel you are safe, not else. Fool-ish Gerard! nothing ails me. I am weak, dearer but happy, oh! so happy!"

Then it was Gerard's turn to support that dear head, with its great waves of hair flowing loose over him, and nurse her, and soothe her, quivering on his bosom, with soft, encouraging words and murmurs of love and gentle caresses. Sweetest of all her charms is a woman's weakness to a manly heart.

Poor things! they were happy. To-morrow they must part. But that was nothing to them now. They had seen death, and all other troubles seemed light as air. While there is life there is hope: while there is hope there is joy. Separation for a year or two, what was it to them, who were so young, and had caught a glimpse of the grave? The future was bright, the present was heaven: so passed the blissful hours.

Alas! their innocence ran other risks besides the prison and the grave: they were in most danger from their own hearts and their inexperience, now that visible danger there was none.

A DOUBTING HEART.

WHERE are the swallows fled?
Frozen and dead,
Perchance upon some bleak and stormy shore.
Oh doubting heart!
Far over purple seas,
They wait, in sunny ease,
The balmy southern breeze,
To bring them to their northern home once more.

Why must the flowers die?
Prisoned they lie
In the cold tomb, heedless of tears or rain.
Oh doubting heart!
They only sleep below
The soft white ermine snow,
While winter winds shall blow,
To breathe and smile upon you soon again.

The sun has bid its rays
Those many days
Will dreary hours never leave the earth!
Oh doubting heart!
The stormy clouds on high
Veil the same sunny sky,
That soon (for spring is nigh)
Shall wake the summer into golden mirth.

Fair hope is dead, and light
Is quenched in night.
What sound can break the silence of despair?
Oh doubting heart!
Thy sky is overcast,
Yet stars shall rise at last,
Brighter for darkness past,
And angels' silver voices stir the air.

A TALE OF TWO CITIES.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

BOOK II.
THE GOLDEN THREAD.

CHAPTER XXIV.

DRAWN TO THE LOADSTONE ROCK.

IN such risings of fire and clashing of the firm earth shaken by the rushes of war upon ocean, which had now so ebb, but was always on the flow, higher and higher, to the terror and wonder of the beholders on the shore—three years of tempest were consumed. Three more birthdays of little Lucie had been woven by the golden thread into the peaceful tissue of the life of her home.

Many a night and many a day had its intricacies listened to the echoes in the corner, with hearts that failed them when they heard the thronging feet. For the footsteps had become to their minds as the footsteps of a people, to be beaten under a red flag, and with their country declared in danger, changed into wild beasts, by terrible enchantment long persisted in.

Monseigneur, as a class, had dissociated himself from the phenomenon of his not being appreciated: of his being so little wanted in France as to incur considerable danger of receiving his dismissal from it, and this life elsewhere. Like the exiled rentier who raised the Devil with infinite pains, and was so terrified at the sight of him that he fled and ask the Devil no question, but immediately fled; so Monseigneur, after boldly reading the Lord's Prayer backward for a great number of years, and performing many other potent spells for compelling the Evil One, no sooner beheld him in his terrors than he took to his heels.

The shining Bull's Eye of the Court was gone, or it would have seen the mark for a hurricane of national bullets. It had never been a good eye to see with, had long been an eye, full of Lucifer's pride, Sardanapalus's luxury, and a mole's blindness—but it had drooped and sunk inherently poor, from that exclusive inner circle to its outermost rotten ring of intrigue, corruption, and disanimation, was all gone together. Royalty was gone; had been besieged in its Palace and "suspended," when the last tidings came over.

The August of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two was come, and Monseigneur was by this time scattered far and wide.

As was natural, the head-quarters and great gathering-place of Monseigneur, in London, was Tellson's Bank. Spirits are supposed to haunt the places where their bodies most resorted, and Monseigneur, without a guinea, haunted the spot where his guineas used to be. Moreover, it was the spot to which such French intelligence as was most to be relied upon came quickest. Again: Tellson's was a munificent house, and extended great liberality to old customers who had fallen from their high estate: Again: those nobles who had seen the coming storm in time, and, anticipating plunder or confiscation, had made provident remittances to it, were always to be heard of there by Tellson's, were always to be communicated with by their needy brethren. To which it must be added that every new-comer from France reported himself and his tidings at Tellson's, almost as a matter of course. For such variety of reasons, Tellson's was at that time, as to French intelligence, a kind of High Exchange; and this was so well known to the public, and the inquiries made there were in consequence so numerous, that Tellson's sometimes wrote the latest news out in a line or so and pasted it in the Bank windows, for all who ran through Temple Bar to read.

On a steaming, misty afternoon, Mr. Lorry sat at his desk, and Charles Darnay stood leaning on it, talking with him in a low voice. The penitential den once set apart for interviews with the Honest were now the News Exchange, and was filled to overflowing. It was within half an hour or so of the time of closing.

"But, notwithstanding, Mr. Darnay," said Mr. Lorry, "you certainly did outstay your welcome in France."

"I understand. That I am too old?" said Mr. Lorry.

Unsettled weather, a long journey, uncertain means of traveling, a disorganized country, a city that was hardly safe to live in."

"My dear Charles," said Mr. Lorry, with cheerful confidence, "you touch some of the reasons for my detention: not for my staying away. It is safe enough for me; nobody will care to interfere with an old fellow of hard upon fourscore when there are so many people there much better worth interfering with. As to its being a disorganized city, if it were not a disorganized city there would be no occasion to send somebody from our House here to our House there, who knows the city and the business of old, and is in Tellson's confidence. As to the uncertain travelling, the long journey, and the winter weather, if I were not prepared to submit myself to a few inconveniences for the sake of Tellson's, after all these years, who ought to be?"

"I wish I were going myself," said Charles Darnay, somewhat restlessly, and like one thinking aloud.

"Indeed! You are a pretty fellow to object and advise!" exclaimed Mr. Lorry. "You wish you were going yourself? And you a Frenchman born? You are a wise counselor!"

"My dear Mr. Lorry, it is because I am a Frenchman born that the thought (which I did not mean to express aloud) has passed through my mind often. One can not help thinking, having had some sympathy for the unhappy people, and having relations connecting them"—he spoke here in his former thoughtful manner—"that one might be intrusted to, and might have the power to remain to some restraint. Only last night, after you had left me, when I was talking to Lucie—"

"When you were talking to Lucie!" Mr. Lorry repeated. "Yes. I wonder you are not ashamed to mention the name of Lucie. Wishing you were going to France at this time of day!"

"However, I am not going," said Charles Darnay, with a smile. "It is more than suppose that you say you are."

"And I am, in plain reality. The truth is, my dear Charles," Mr. Lorry glanced at the distant House, and lowered his voice, "you can have no conception of the difficulty with which our business is transacted, and of the peril in which our books and papers over yonder are involved. The Lord above knows what the compromising consequences would be to numbers of people if some of our documents were seized or destroyed; and they might be, at any time, you know, for who can say that Paris is not set alire to-day, or sacked to-morrow? Now, a judicious selection from these with the least possible delay, and the burying of them, or otherwise getting of them out of harm's way, is within the power (without loss of precious time) of scarcely any one but myself, if any one. And shall I hang back, when Tellson's knows this and says this—Tellson's, whose bread I have eaten these sixty years—because I am a little stiff about the joints? Why, I am a boy, Sir, to half a dozen old codgers here!"

"How I admire the gallantry of your youthful spirit, Mr. Lorry!"

"Tut! Nonsense, Sir!—And, my dear Charles," said Mr. Lorry, glancing at the House again, "you are to remember that getting things out of Paris at this present time, no matter what things, is next to an impossibility. Papers and precious matters were this very day brought to us here (I speak in strict confidence, it is not business-like to whisper it, even to you) by the strongest hands you can imagine, every one of whom had his head hanging on by a single hair as he passed the Barriers. At another time our parcel would come and go easily as in business-like Old England; but now, every thing is stopped."

"And do you really go to-night?"

"I really go to-night, for the case has become too pressing to admit of delay."

"And do you take no one with you?"

"All sorts of people have been proposed to me, but I will have nothing to say to any of them. I intend to take Jerry. Jerry has been my body-guard on Sunday nights for a long time past, and I am used to him. Nobody will suspect Jerry of being any thing but an English bull-dog, or of having any design in his head but to fly at any body who touches his master."

"I must say again that I heartily admire your gallantry and youthfulness."

"I must say again, nonsense, nonsense! When I have executed this little commission I shall, perhaps, accept Tellson's proposal to retire and live at my ease. Time enough then to think about growing old."

This dialogue had taken place at Mr. Lorry's usual desk, with Monseigneur swarming within a yard or two of it, boastful of what he would do to avenge himself on the rascal-people before long. It was too much the way of Monseigneur under his reverses as a refugee, and it was much too much the way of native British orthodoxy, to talk of this terrible Revolution as if it were the one only harvest ever known under the skies that had not been sown—as if nothing had ever been done, or remained to be done, that had led to it—as if observers of the wretched million in France, and of the misuses and perverted resources that should have made them prosperous, had not seen it inevitably coming, years before, and had not in plain words recorded what they saw. Such vaporing, combined with the extravagant plots of Monseigneur for the restoration of a state of things that had utterly and finally passed away, would have exhausted credulity and worn out Heaven and earth as well as itself, was hard to be endured without some remonstrance by any sane man who knew the truth. And it was a fact weighing all about his ears, like a troublesome confusion of blood in his own head, added to a latent uneasiness in his mind, which had already made Charles Darnay restless, and which still kept him so.

Among the talkers was Stryver, of the Ring's Bench Bar, far on his way to state prosecutions, and therefore loud on the theme: broaching to Monseigneur his devices for blowing the people up and exterminating them from the face of the earth, and doing without them: and for accomplishing many similar objects akin in their nature to the abolition of eagles by sprinkling salt on the tails of the race. Him Darnay heard with a particular feeling of objection; and Darnay stood divided between going away that he might hear no more, and remaining to interpose his word, when the thing that was to be went on to shape itself out.

The House approached Mr. Lorry, and laying a soiled and unopened letter before him, asked

CHAPTER XVII.—Continued.

As if this had been a concerted signal, the back door was struck as rudely the next instant. They were hemmed in. But at these alarming sounds Margaret seemed to recover some share of self-possession. She whispered, "Say he was here, but is gone." And with this she seized Gerard and almost dragged him up the rude steps that led to her father's sleeping-room. Her own lay next but yond it.

The blows on the door were repeated.

"Who knock at this hour?"

"Open, and you will see!"

"I open not to thieves—lomet men are all abed now."

"Open to the law, Martin Wittenhagen, or you shall run it."

"Why that is Dirck Brower's voice, I trow! What make you so far from Tergos?"

"Open, and you will know."

Martin drew the bolt, and in rushed Dierich and four more. They let in their companion who was at the back-door.

"Now, Martin, where is Gerard Gerardssen?"

"Gerard Gerardssen? Why he was here but now."

"Was here?" Dierich's countenance fell. "And where is he now?"

"They say he is gone to Italy. Why? What is to do?"

"No matter. When did he go? Tell me not that he went in such a storm as this."

"Here is a note Gerard Gerardssen," said Martin, contemplatuously. Then he lighted the candle, and, seating himself coolly by the fire, proceeded to whip some fine silk round his bow-string at the place where the nick of the arrow frets it.

"I'll tell you," said he, carelessly. "Do you know his brother Giles—a little misbegotten imp, all head and arms? Well, he came tearing over here on a mule, and he'did out something. I was too far off to hear the creature's words, but I heard its noise. Any way, he started Gerard. For as soon as he was gone there was such crying and kissing, and then Gerard went away. They do tell me he is gone to Italy—anyhap you know where that is, for I don't."

Dierich's countenance fell lower and lower at this account. There was no flaw in it. A cunninger man than Martin would perhaps have told a lie too many, and smelt suspicion. But Martin did his task well. He only told the one falsehood he was bade to tell, and of his own head invented nothing.

"Mate," said Dierich, "I doubt he speaks sooth. I told the Burgomaster how matters were. He met the dwarf galloping Peter Beyskens's mule from Sevenbergen. They have sent after him to Gerard,' says he, 'so, then, Gerard is at Sevenbergen.'—Ah, master,' says I, 'tis too late now. We should have thought of Sevenbergen before, instead of wasting our time hunting all the odd corners of Tergos for three cursed parchments that we shall never find till we find the man that took 'em. If he was at Sevenbergen, quoth I, 'and they have sent the dwarf to him, it must have been to warn him we are after him. He is leagues away by now,' quoth I. Confound that shuffle-faced girl! she hot outwitted us hearded men:' and so I told the Burgomaster, but he would not hear reason. A wet jerkin a piece, that is all we shall get, master, by this job."

Martin grinned coolly in Dirrich's face.

"However," added the latter, "just to content the Burgomaster, we will search the house."

Martin turned grave directly.

This change of countenance did not escape Dierich. He reflected a moment.

"Watch outside two of you, one on each side of the house, that no one jump from the upper windows. The rest come with me."

And he took the candle and mounted the stairs, followed by four of his comrades.

Martin was left alone.

The stout scoundrel put his head. All had gone so well at first: and now this fatal turn! Suddenly it occured to him that all was not yet lost. Gerard must be in Peter's room. Gerard and Margaret; they were not so very high from the ground. Gerard would leap out. Dierich had left a man below; but what then? For half a minute Gerard and he would be two to one, and, in that brief space, what might not be done?

Martin then held the back-door ajar and watched. The light was in Peter's room. "Come the fool!" said he; "is he going to let them take him like a girl?"

The light passed now into Margaret's bedroom. Still no window was opened. Had Gerard intended to escape that way he would not have waited till the men were in the room. Martin saw that at once, and left the door, and came to the foot-stair and listened. He began to think Gerard must have escaped by the window while all the men were in the house. The moment after he discontinued the stranger grew this conviction. But it was suddenly and rudely disappointed.

Piercing shrieks issued from the inner bedroom of Margaret's.

"They have taken him," groaned Martin; "they have got him."

It flashed through Martin's mind in one moment that if they took Gerard away his life was not worth a button; and that if evil befell him Margaret's heart would break. He cast his eyes wildly round like some savage beast seeking an escape, and in a twinkling he formed a resolution terribly characteristic of those iron times and of a soldier driven to bay.

CHAPTER XVIII.

He stepped to each door in turn, and imitating Dirck Brower's voice, said sharply, "Watch the window!" He then quietly slipped and bolted both doors. He then took up his bow and six arrows; one he fitted to his string, the others he put into his quiver. His knife he placed upon a chair behind him, the hilt toward him: and there he waited at the foot of the stair with the calm determination to slay those four men, or be slain by them. Two, he knew, he could dispose of by his arrows, ere they could get near him, and Gerard and he must take their chance, hand-to-hand, with the remaining pair. Besides, he had seen men panic-stricken by a sudden attack of this sort. Should Brower and his men hesitate but an instant, he should shoot three instead of two, and then the odds would seem the right side.

He had not long to wait. The heavy steps sounded in Margaret's room, and came nearer and nearer.

The light also approached, and voices.

Martin's heart, above all, was hard hard, to hear men coming thus to their death, and, perhaps, to his; more likely to them not; for four to long odds in a battle-field of this nature, and Gerard might be bound, perhaps, and powerless to help.

But this man, whom we have seen shake in his shoes at a Giles-o'-Lanthorn, never wavered in this awful moment of real danger, but stood there, his bow drawn to the combat, and his eye glowing, equally ready to take life and lose it. Desperate game! to win which was exalt instant and for life, and to face it was to die that moment upon that floor he stood on.

Dierich Brower and his men found Peter in his first sleep. They opened his cupboards; they ran their knives into an alligator he had nailed to his wall; they looked under his bed: it was a large room, and apparently full of hiding-places, but they found no Gerard.

They went on to Margaret's room, and the very sight of it was discouraging—it was small and bare, and not a cupboard in it; there was, however, a large fire-place and chimney. Dierich's eye fell on these directly. Here they found the beauty of Sevenbergen sleeping on an old chest, not a foot high, and no attempt made to cover it; but the sheets were snowy white, and so was Margaret's own linen. And there she lay, looking like a lily fallen into a rut.

Dierich, very much, and sat up in the bed, like one amazed; then, seeing the men, began to scream violently, and pray for mercy.

She made Dierich Brower ashamed of his errand.

"Here is a to-do," said he, a little confused. "We are not going to hurt you, my pretty maid. Let you still, and shut your eyes, and think of your wedding-night, while I look up this chimney to see if Master Gerard is there."

"Gerard is not in my room!"

"Why not? They say that you and he—"

"Cruel! cruel! that they have driven him away from me—driven him from his native place. This is a blind. You are thieves; you are wicked men. You are not men of Sevenbergen—you would know Margaret Brandt better than to look for her lover there—of all others! Gerard is not here, but brave! Four great hulking men to come, armed to the teeth, to insult one poor honest girl! The women that live in your own houses must be naught, or you would respect them too much to insult a girl of good character."

"There, come away, before we hear worse," said Dierich, hastily. "He is not in the chimney. Plaster will need what a cudgel breaks; but a woman's tongue is a double-edged dagger, and a girl in a woman with her mother's milk still in her." And he beat a hasty retreat. "I told the Burgomaster how 'twould be."

CHAPTER XIX.

WHERE is the woman that can not act a part? Where is she who will not do it, and do it well, to save the man she loves? Nature on these great occasions comes to the aid of the simplest of the sex, and teaches her to throw dust in Solomon's eyes. The men had no sooner retired than Margaret stepped out of bed and opened the long chest on which she had been lying down in her skirt and petticoat and stockings, and night-dress over all, and put Gerard in, bed-clothes and all, against the wall: then glided to the door and listened. The men were all away through her father's room, and down the stairs.

Now in that chest there was a peculiarity that was almost impossible for a stranger to detect. A part of the boarding of the room had been broken, and Gerard being applied to to make it look neater, and being short of materials, had ingeniously sawed away a space sufficient just to admit Margaret's embonpoint bed, and with the materials thus acquired he had repaired the whole room. As for the bed or chest, it really rested on the rafters a foot below the boards that surrounded it was full two feet deep, though it looked scarce one.

All was quiet. Margaret kneeled and gave thanks to Heaven. Then she glided from the door, and leaned over the empty chest, and whispered, tenderly, "Gerard!"

Gerard did not reply.

She then whispered, a little louder, "Gerard, all is safe, thank Heaven! You may rise; but, oh! be cautious!"

Gerard made no reply.

She laid her hand upon his shoulder. "Gerard!"

No reply.

"Oh! what is this?" she cried, and her hands ran wildly over his face and his bosom. She took him by the shoulders; she shook him; she lifted him; but he escaped from her trembling hands, and fell back, not like a man, but like a body. A great dread fell on her. The lid had been down. She had lain upon it. The men had been some time in the room. With all the strength of frenzy she tore him out of the chest. She bore him in her arms to the window. She dashed the window open. The sweet air came in. She laid him in it, and in the moonlight. His face was the color of ashes, his body was all limp and motionless. She felt his heart. Horror! it was as still as the rest! Horror of horrors! she had stifled him with her own body!

CHAPTER XX.

TIME mind can not all at once believe so great and sudden and strange a calamity. Gerard, who had got alive into that chest scarce five minutes ago, now could not be dead?

She called him by all the endearing names that heart could think, or tongue could frame. She kissed him, and fondled him, and coaxed him, and implored him to speak to her.

In the intervals of these cries, such as she had never uttered to him before, nor thought she could utter. Then the poor creature, trembling all over, began to say over that white face little fooling things that were at once terrific and pitiable.

"Oh, Gerard, I am very sorry you are dead! I am very sorry I have killed you! Forgive me for not letting the man take you; it would have been better than this! Oh, Gerard! I am very, very sorry for what I have done!" Then she began suddenly to rave. "No! no! such things can't be, or there is no God! It is monstrous! How can my Gerard be dead? How can I have killed my Gerard? I love him! O God! you know how I love him! He does not. I never told him. If he knew my heart he would speak to me; he would not be so deaf to his poor Margaret. It is all a trick to make me cry out and betray him: but no, I love him too well for that. I'll choke first." And she seized her own throat to check her wild desire to scream in her keen and anguish.

"If he would but say one word. Oh, Gerard! don't die without a word. Have mercy on my soul! you! but speak to me: if you are angry with me, scold me! curse me! I deserve it. Oh! the idea that killed the man she loved better than herself! Gerard, I am punished. The worst is all the world. Help, help! I have murdered him. All, all! all is lost!"

She tore her hair, and uttered shriek after shriek so wild, so piercing, they fell like a knell upon the ears of Dierich Brower and his men. All started to their feet, and looked at one another.

CHAPTER XXI.

MARTIN WITTENHAGEN, standing at the foot of the stairs with his arrow drawn nearly to the head, heard, but behind him, was struck with amazement to see the men come back without Gerard: he lowered his bow, and looked speechless at them. Dierich, more than the rest, was equally surprised at the attitude they had found him in.

"Why, mates, was the old fellow making ready to shoot one of us?"

"Shut!" said Martin, recovering his stolid composure, "I was but trying my new string. Have you found Gerard? Is he of you think that."

"Humph!" said Dierich, dubiously, "there is something more in you than I understand; put a leg on, and let us see below. I'll see to it here."

A blazing fire was soon made, and the men and round it, and Martin sat down with long hair was soon smoking from the cheerful blaze. The was that the shrieks were heard in Margaret's room. They all started up, and three of them took the candle, and ran up the steps that led to the bedrooms.

Martin rose hastily, too, and being confused by these sudden screams, and apprehending danger from the men in front, tried to prevent him from going there.

At this Dierich threw his arms round him from behind, and called on the others to keep him. The man that had the candle got clear away, and all in the rest fell to the earth. Martin, after a long and fierce struggle, in the course of which they were more than once rolling on the floor, with Martin in the middle, they succeeded in mastering the old Samson, and binding him hand and foot with a rope they had brought for Gerard.

"That is a good job," said Dierich, panting: "our lives weren't safe while this old fellow's four bones were free. He makes me think Gerard is herebouts, for all we can't find him. Hallo, mates! Gerard's key's long loose in that girl's bedroom.

The rude laugh created by this remark had hardly subsided when hasty footsteps were heard running along overhead.

"Oh! here he comes, at last. Well, Jorian, what is to do now?"

CHAPTER XXII.

JORIAN KETEL went straight to Margaret's room, and there he found the man he had been in search of, pale and motionless, his head in Margaret's lap, and she kneeling over him, mute now, and stricken to stone. Her eyes were dilated, yet glazed, and she neither saw nor heard the man, nor was aware for any thing on earth but the white face in her lap.

Jorian stood awe-struck; the candle shaking in his hand.

Why, where was he, then, all the time?

Margaret heeded him not. Jorian went to the empty chest and looked in, and saw it was a dreebend. The girl's dumb and frozen despair moved him.

"That is sorry sight," said he; "it is a black night's work; all for a few skins! Better have gone with the lot. Come, be not past unsaving or, poor wench! Stop—let us try."

He took down a little round mirror, no bigger than a watch, and held it to Gerard's mouth and nostrils, and held it there. When he withdrew it, he was dull. "Gone, sure enough: a joyful cry:

"THERE IS LIFE IN HIM, GIRL!"

At that word, it was as if a statue had started into life and sense. Her eyes were on Jorian's face ere same round Jorian's neck.

"Oh! bless the tongue that tells me so!" and she kissed the great rough fellow again and again, eagerly, almost fiercely.

"There, there, let us lay him warm," said Jorian; and in a moment he raised Gerard, and carried him to Margaret's bed. There he set him, flask he carried, and filled his hand twice with Schiedamm, and flung it sharply each time in the face. Then he began to chafe Gerard's hands with his recovery—he gave a faint sigh. Oh, never was sound so sweet to Margaret's ear. She fee heard him, but then stopped, quivering for fear she should hurt him. She had lost all confidence in herself.

"That is right—let him alone," said Jorian; "don't you hinder him, girl. Now, you go, or you'll drive his breath back again. Let him alone: he is sure to come to. 'Tisn't like as if he was an old man."

Gerard sighed deeply, and a faint streak of color crept to his lips. Jorian saw it by the light. He had hardly reached it, when he found his legs seized from behind.

It was Margaret! She curled round his knees like a serpent, and kissed his hand, and fawned on him. "You won't tell? You have saved his life; you have not the heart to thrust him back into his grave, to smile over one good work?"

"No, no! It is not the first time I've done you two a good turn; 'twas I told you in the cherry whether we had to save him. Besides, what is Dirk Brower to me? Til see him hanged ere I'll but him. But I wish you'd tell sue where the parchments are? To save a hundred pounds offered for them. That would be a good windfall for you and the children, you know."

"Ah! they shall have those hundred crowns." "What! are the things in the house?" asked Jotais, eagerly.

"Yes; but I know where they are: and, by God and St. Baruo, I swear you shall have them to-morrow. Come to me for them when you will, and welcome alone."

"I were mad, else. What! share the hundred crowns with Dirk Brower? And now may my nose rot in my skin if I let a soul know the poor boy is here!"

He then ran off, lest by staying longer he should excite suspicion, and leave them all after him. Jotais stood quiet, quivering from head to foot, and prayed beside Gerard, and for Gerard to foot.

"What is to do? Why, we have scared the girl out of her wits. She sits in a kind of fit."

"We had better all go and doctor her, then."

"Oh yes! and frighten her into the churchyard. Her father is a doctor, and I have round him, and set him to bring her round. Let us see the fire, will ye?"

His off-hand way disarmed all suspicion. And now after the forty agreed that the kitchen of the Three Kings was much more cheerful, Jotais's home, and they departed, having first uuiet Martin.

"Take note, mein Herr, that I was right," the Burgomaster wrong," said Dierich Brower, at the door: "I said we should be too late to catch him, and we were not too late."

Thus Gerard, in one terrible night, grazed the past and the grave!

And how did he get clear at last? Not by his comply-contrived hiding-place, which by Margot's ready wit; but by a good impulse in one of his captors—by the bit of humanity left in a somewhat reckless fellow's heart, aided by his desire a gain. So mixed and seemingly incongruous are human motives, so short-sighted our shrewdest ssants!

They whose moderate natures, or gentle fates, keep them in life's passage from the fierce extremes of joy and anguish our nature is capable of, may perhaps the best, and certainly the happiest, of mankind. But to such readers it will be vain to try to convey what bliss unspeakable settled now upon those persecuted lovers. Even to those who have joyed greatly, and greatly suffered, the moment at can present but a pale reminiscence, and a faint reflection of Margaret's and Gerard's ecstasy.

To sit and see a beloved face come back from the grave to the world, to health and beauty by the gradations; to see the roses return to the hollowed cheek, love's glance to the loved eye, and its words to the loved mouth: this was Margaret's joy to be known years of misery. It was Gerard's to awake from a trance and find his head pillowed on Margaret's arm: to feel, when restored to shored murmur now words of eloquent love, and shower tears and tender kisses upon forehead and lips. He never knew till this sweet moment, nor ardently, how tenderly she loved him. He wished his enemies, the Brower brothers, were present to behold them altogether? Was not the blessed Virgin Church upon their side? What more care or all who would part them?

But as no woman's nerves can bear with impunity so terrible a strain, assuredly Margaret turned faint, and sank on Gerard's shoulder, smiling softly but quite, quite exhausted. Thus Gerard was anxious, and would seek assistance. But she held him with a gentle grasp, and implored him not to leave her for a moment. "Presently I can lay my hand on you I feel you are safe, not else. Fool-ish Gerard! nothing ails me. I am weak, though but happy, oh! so happy!"

Then it was Gerard's turn to support that dear head with its great waves of dark flowing love over him, and nurse her, and soothe her, quivering all his bosom, with soft, encouraging words and murmurs of love and gentle caresses. Sweetest of all her charms is a woman's weakness to a manly heart.

Four things they were happy: To-morrow they soon part. But that was nothing to them now. They had seen death, and all other troubles seemed light as air. While there is life there is hope: while there is hope there is joy. Perhaps for a year or two, what was it to them, who were so young, and had caught a glimpse of the grave? The future was bright, the present was heaven: no pained the blissful hours.

Also: their innocence ran other risks besides the prison and the grave: they were in most danger from their own hearts and their inexperience, now that visible danger there was none.

A DOUBTING HEART.

WHENCE are the swallows fled?
Frozen and dead,
Perchance upon some bleak and stormy shore.
Oh doubting heart!
Far over purple seas,
They wait, in sunny ease,
The balmy southern breeze,
To bring them to their northern home once more.

Why must the flowers die?
Prisoned they lie
In the cold tomb, heedless of tears or rain.
Oh doubting heart!
They only sleep below
The soft white crocus snow,
While winter winds shall blow,
To breathe and smile upon you soon again.

The sun has hid its rays
These many days;
Will dreary hours never leave the earth!
Oh doubting heart!
The storm-y clouds on high
Veil the same sunny sky,
That soon (for spring is nigh)
Shall wake the summer into golden mirth.

Fair hope is dead, and light
Is darkness in the night.
What sound can break the silence of despair?
Oh doubting heart!
Thy sky is overcast,
Yet stars shall rise at last,
Brighter for darkness past,
And angels' silver voices stir the air.

A TALE OF TWO CITIES.

By CHARLES DICKENS.

BOOK II.
THE GOLDEN THREAD.

CHAPTER XXIV.

DRAWN TO THE LOADSTONE ROCK.

In such risings of fire and ruin, the firm earth shaken by the rushes of an angry ocean, which suddenly lays no ebb, but was always on the flow, higher and higher, to the terror and wonder of the beholders on the shore—three years of tempest were consumed. Three more birthdays of little Lucie had been woven by the golden thread into the peaceful tissue of the life of her home.

Many a night and many a day had its inmates listened to the echoes in the corner, with hearts that failed them when they heard the thronging feet. For the footsteps had become to their minds as the footsteps of a people, tumultuous under a red flag, and with their country declared in danger, changed into wild beasts, by terrible enchantment long persisted in.

Monseigneur, as a class, had become infinitely more than the phenomenon of his not being appreciated: of his being of little wanted in France as to incur considerable danger of receiving his dismissal from it, and this life to himself. Even the fluttered rats who peopled the Devil with infinite pains, and was so terrified at the sight of him that he could ask the Enemy no question, but immediately fled; so Monseigneur, after boldly reading the Lord's Prayer backward for a great number of years, and performing many other potent spells for compelling the Evil One, no sooner beheld him in his terrors than he took to his noble heels.

The shining Bull's Eye of the Court was gone, or it would have been the mark for a hurricane of national bullets. It had never been a good eye to see with—too much like the eye of a rat of Lucifer's pride, Sardanapalus's luxury, and a mole's blindness—but it had dropped out and was gone. The Court, from which exclusive inner circle to its outermost rotten ring of intrigue, corruption, and dissimulation, was all gone together. Royalty was gone; had been besieged in its Palace and "suspended," when the last tidings came over.

The August of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two was come, and Monseigneur was by this time scattered far and wide.

As was natural, the head-quarters and great gathering-place of Monseigneur, in London, was Tellson's Bank. Spirits are supposed to haunt the places where their bodies most resorted, and Monseigneur, without a guinea, haunted the spot where his guineas used to be. Moreover, it was the spot to which such French intelligence as was most to be relied upon came most quickly. Again: Tellson's was a munificent house, and extended great liberality to old customers who had fallen from their high estate. Again: those nobles who had seen the coming storm in time, and anticipating plunder or confiscation, had made provident remittances to Tellson's, were always to be heard of there by their needy brethren. To which it must be added that every new-comer from France reported himself and his tidings at Tellson's, almost as a matter of course. For such variety of reasons, Tellson's was at that time, as to French intelligence, a kind of High Exchange; and this was so well known to the public, and the inquiries made there were in consequence so numerous, that Tellson's sometimes wrote the latest news out in a line or so and posted it in the Bank windows, for all who ran through Temple Bar to see.

On a steaming, misty afternoon, Mr. Lorry sat at his desk, and Charles Darnay stood leaning on it, talking with him in a low voice. The penitential den once set apart for interviews with the House was now the Bank Secretaryship, and was filled to overflowing. It was within half an hour or so of the close of business.

"But, although you are the youngest man that ever lived," said Charles Darnay, rather hesitating, "I must still suggest to you—"

"I understand. That I am too old?" said Mr. Lorry.

Unsettled weather, a long journey, uncertain means of traveling, a disorganized country, a city that you know not even be safe to you."

"My dear Charles," said Mr. Lorry, with cheerful confidence, "you touch upon the very reasons for which I am not for my staying away. It is safe enough for me; nobody will care to interfere with an old fellow of hard upon fourscore when there are so many people there much better worth interfering with. As to its being a disorganized city, if it were not a disorganized city there would be no occasion to send anybody from our House here to our House there, who knows the city and the business of old, and is in Tellson's confidence. As to the uncertain travelling, the long journey, and the winter weather, if I were not prepared to submit myself to a few inconveniences for the sake of Tellson's, after all these years, who ought to be?"

"I wish I were going myself," said Charles Darnay, somewhat restlessly, and like one thinking aloud.

"Indeed! You are a pretty fellow to object and advise!" exclaimed Mr. Lorry. "You who are going yourself? And you a Frenchman born? You are a wise counselor!"

"My dear Mr. Lorry, it is because I am a Frenchman born that the thought (which I did not mean to utter here, however) has passed through my mind often. One can not help thinking, having had some sympathy for the miserable people, and having abandoned something to them"—he spoke here in his former thoughtful manner—"that one might be the better fitted to, and might have the power to persuade to some restraint. Only last night, after you had left us, when I was talking to Lucie—"

"When you were talking to Lucie!" Mr. Lorry repeated. "Yes. I wonder you are not employed to mention the name of Lucie! Wishing you were going to France at this time of day!"

"However, I am not going," said Charles Darnay, with a smile. "It is more to the purpose that you say you are."

"And I am, in plain reality. The truth is, my dear Charles," Mr. Lorry glanced at the distant House, and lowered his voice, "you can have no conception of the difficulty with which our business is transacted, and of the peril in which our books and papers over yonder are involved. The Lord above knows what the compromising consequences would be to numbers of people if some of our documents were seized or destroyed; and they might be, at any time, you know, for who can say that Paris is not set afire to-day, or sacked to-morrow? Now, a judicious selection from these with the least possible delay, and the burying of them, or otherwise getting of them out of harm's way, is within the power (without loss of precious time) of scarcely any one but myself, if any one. And shall I

"I KNOW THE FELLOW."

hang back, when Tellson's know this and says this—Tellson's, whose bread I have eaten these sixty years—because I am a little stiff about the joints? Why, I am a boy, Sir, to half a dozen old cedgers here!"

"How I admire the gallantry of your youthful spirit, Mr. Lorry!"

"Tut! Nonsense, Sir!—And, my dear Charles," said Mr. Lorry, pleasantly at the close again, "you are to remember that getting things out of Paris at this present time, no matter what things, is next to an impossibility. Papers and precious matters were this very day brought to me here (I speak in strict confidence: it is not business-like to whisper it, even to you) by the strongest hands you can imagine, every one of whom had his head hanging on by a single hair as he passed the Barriers. At another time our parcels would come and go as easily as business-like Old England; but now, every thing is stopped."

"And do you really go to-night?"

"I really go to-night, for the case has become too pressing to admit of delay."

"And do you take no one with you?"

"All sorts of people have been proposed to me, but I will have nothing to say to any of them. I intend to take Jerry. Jerry has been my body-guard on Sunday nights for a long time past, and I am used to him. Nobody will suspect Jerry of being any thing but an English bull-dog, or of having any design in his head but to fly at any body who touches his master."

"I must say again that I envy you, and admire your gallantry and youthfulness."

"I must say again, nonsense, nonsense! When I have executed this little commission I shall, perhaps, accept Tellson's proposal to retire and live at my ease. Time enough then to think about growing old."

This dialogue had taken place at Mr. Lorry's usual desk, with Monseigneur swarming within a yard or two of it, boastful of what he would do to avenge himself on the rascal-people before long. It was too much the way of Monseigneur under his reverses as a refugee, and he was much too much the way of nattily British orthodoxy, to talk of his terrible Revolution as if it were the one only revolt ever known under the skies that had not been sown—as if nothing had ever been done, or could ever be done, that had led to it—as if observers of the wretched million in France, and of the misused and perverted resources that should have made them prosperous, had not seen it inevitably coming, years before, and had not in plain words recorded what they saw. Such vaporing, combined with the extravagant pains of Monseigneur for the restoration of a state of things that had utterly exhausted itself, and worn out Heaven and earth as well as itself, was hard to be endured without some remonstrance by any sane man who knew the truth. And it was what Napoleon always called in his ears, like a troublesome confusion of blood in his own head, added to a latent uneasiness in his mind, which had already made Charles Darnay restless, and which still kept him so.

Among the talkers was Stryver, of the King's Bench Bar, far on his way to state promotion, and therefore loud on the theme: broaching to Monseigneur his devices for blowing the people up and exterminating them from the face of the earth, and doing without them: and for accomplishing many similar objects akin in their nature to the abolition of eagles by sprinkling salt on the tails of the rare. Him Darnay heard with a particular feeling of objection: and Darnay stood divided between going away that he might hear no more, and remaining to interpose his word, when the thing that was to be done, on to shape itself out.

The House approached Mr. Lorry, and laying a soiled and unopened letter before him, asked if he had yet discovered any traces of the person to whom it was addressed? The House laid the letter down so close to Barnay that he saw the direction—the more quickly because it was his own right name. The address, turned into English, ran: "Very pressing. To Monsieur heretofore the Marquis St. Evremond, of France. Confided to the care of Messrs. Tollson and Co., Bankers, London, England."

On the marriage morning Doctor Manette had made it his one urgent and express request to Charles Darnay, that the secret of his name should be sunken. He had given Darnay no hint of obligation—kept inviolate between them. Nobody else knew it to be his name; his own wife had no suspicion of the fact; Mr. Lorry could have none.

"No," said Mr. Lorry, in reply to the House; "I have referred it, I think, to every body now here, and no one can tell me where this gentleman is to be found."

The hands of the clock verging upon the hour of closing the Bank, there was a general dying off of the current of talkers past Mr. Lorry's desk. He held the letter out inquiringly; and Monseigneur looked at it, in the person of this watching and indignant refugee; and Monseigneur looked at it, in the person of that footman who had waited at dinner, and who had slipped away from the other, all had something disparaging to say, in French or in English, concerning the Marquis who was not to be found.

"Nephew, I believe—but in any case degenerate successor—of the polished Marquis who was murdered," said one. "Happy to say I never knew him."

"A craven who abandoned his post," said another—this Monseigneur had been one of the Court of Paris, legs uncommon and half suffocated, in a load of lace—"if some years ago."

"Infected with the new doctrines," said a third, eying the direction through his glass in passing; "not a bad sort of nobleman in the main, the Marquis, abandoned the estates when he inherited them, and left them to the ruffian herd. They will rosurprise him—when he comes to his estates."

"Hey?" cried the blatant Stryver. "Did he though? Is that the sort of fellow? Let us look at his letter. Humph, humph, humph. Ah!"

Darnay, unable to restrain himself any longer, touched Mr. Stryver on the shoulder, and said:

"I know the fellow."

"Do you, by Jupiter?" said Stryver. "I am sorry for it."

"Why?"

"Why, Mr. Darnay? D'ye hear what he did? Don't act rashly in these times."

"But I do ask why."

"Then I tell you again, Mr. Darnay, I am sorry for it. I am sorry to hear you putting any such extraordinary questions. Here is a fellow, who, intrinsically, has not position enough to be a chemous cole of destiny that ever was known, abandoned his property to the vilest scum of the earth that ever did murder by wholesale, and you ask me why I am sorry that a man who instructs youth knows him? Well, I am sorry you. I am sorry, because I believe there is contamination in such a scoundrel. That's why."

Mindful of the secret, Darnay with great difficulty checked himself, and said: "I do not understand the gentleman."

"I understand you by your tone, and I am sorry for it. I am sorry to hear you putting any such extraordinary questions. Here is a fellow, who, intrinsically, has not position enough to be a chemous cole of destiny that ever was known, abandoned his property to the vilest scum of the earth that ever did murder by wholesale, and you ask me why I am sorry that a man who instructs youth knows him? Well, I am sorry you. I am sorry, because I believe there is contamination in such a scoundrel. That's why."

Mindful of the secret, Darnay with great difficulty checked himself, and said: "I do not understand the gentleman."

"I understand you by your tone, and I don't understand your tone, Mr. Darnay," said Bully Stryver, "and I'll do it. If this fellow is a gentleman, I don't understand him. You may tell him so, with my compliments. You may also tell him, from me, that after abandoning his worldly property, and position to his butchery mob, I wonder he is not at the head of them. But no, gentlemen," said Stryver, looking all round, and raising his voice, "I know something of human nature, and I tell you that you never find a fellow like this fellow trusting himself to the mercies of such precious protégés. No, gentlemen; he'll always show 'em a clean pair of heels very early in the scuffle, and sneak away."

With those words, and a final snap of his fingers, Mr. Stryver shouldered himself into Fleet Street, amidst the general approbation of his hearers. Mr. Lorry and Charles Darnay were left alone at the desk, in the general departure from the Bank.

"Will you take charge of the letter?" said Mr. Lorry. "You know where to deliver it?"

"I do."

"Will you undertake to explain that we suppose it to have been addressed here in the last chance of our knowing where to forward it, and that it has been here some time?"

"I will do so. Mr. Lorry, you shall be Paris from here?"

"From here, at eight."

"I will come back to see you off."

Very ill at ease with himself, and with Stryver and most other men, Darnay left the Bank in the way into the quiet of the Temple, opened the letter, and read it. These were its contents:

"Prison of the Abbaye, Paris,
"June 21, 1792.

"Monsieur heretofore the Marquis,

After having long been in danger of my life at the hands of the village, I have been seized, with great violence and indignity, and brought a long journey on foot to Paris. On the road I have suffered a great deal. Nor is that all; my house has been destroyed—razed to the ground.

"The crime for which I am imprisoned, Monsieur heretofore the Marquis, and for which I shall be summoned before the tribunal, and shall lose my life (without your so generous help), is, they tell me, treason against the majesty of the people, in that I have acted against them for an emigrant. It is in vain I represent that I have acted for them, and not against, according to your commands. It is in vain I represent that, before the sequestration of emigrant property, I had remitted the imposts they had ceased to pay; that I had collected no rents; that I had had recourse to no process. The only response is, that I have acted for an emigrant, and where is this emigrant?

"Ah! most gracious Monsieur heretofore the Marquis, where is that emigrant! I cry in my sleep where is he! I demand of Heaven will he not come to deliver me? No answer. Ah Monsieur heretofore the Marquis, I send my desolate cry across the sea, hoping it may reach you by the mere force of its distress!

"For the love of Heaven, of justice, of generosity, of the honor of your noble name, I supplicate you, Monsieur heretofore the Marquis, to succor and release me. My fault is, that I have been true to you. Monsieur heretofore the Marquis, I pray you be you true to me.

"From this prison here of horror, whence I every hour tend nearer and nearer to destruction, I send you, Monsieur heretofore the Marquis, the assurance of my dolorous and unhappy service.

"Your afflicted

"Gabelle."

The latent uneasiness in Darnay's mind was roused to vigorous life by this letter. The peril of an old servant and a good servant, whose only crime was fidelity to himself and his family, stared him reproachfully. The letter was from Paris; it was to Paris that he must go. In the Temple considering what to do, he almost hid his face from the sunlight.

He knew very well that in his horror of the deed which had overwhelmed the Bank, and shocked reputation of the old family house, in his resentful suspicions of his uncle, and in the general tide of his present situation, he left out the crumbling fabric that he was supposed to hold, the real state and existence. He knew very well that, in his love for Lucie, his renunciation of his social place, though by no means new to his own mind, had been put into words for the first time. He knew that he ought to have systematically worked out the form of those consequences he had yielded—not without disquiet, but still without continuous and accumulating resistance. That he ought to have thought out the consequences to the core, how they would affect those dependent on him, and those on whom he was to give—each fuel as the heavy creditors might come to present their claims, and such produce as could be saved from the sale of his forfeited property. That he ought to have got the fact in plea and proof for his own safety, so that it could not be turned against him.

This he had neglected to do. The resolution Charles Darnay had begun to make, that he would go to Paris.

Yes. Like the mariner in the old story, the winds and streams had driven him within the influence of the Loadstone Rock, and it was drawing him to itself, and he must go. Every time he had asked before his own mind if he could go, faster and faster, more and more steadily, in the terrible attraction. His latent uneasiness had been, that but alone never to have evolved out in his own unhappy land he had hesitated, and that he, who could and did so know that he was better than they, was not there, working to something to stay bloodshed, and assert the claims of mercy and humanity. With this uneasiness half stifled, and half reproached, he had, in the hurry of the general escape, made a comparison of himself with the brave old gentleman in whose face duty was so strong; upon that comparison (injurious to himself) he had acted, followed the sworn of Monseigneur, which had carried him straight to the Loadstone Rock, and above all were coarse and galling for old reasons. Upon those had followed Gabelle's letter: the appeal of an innocent man in danger of death, to his justice, honor, and good name.

His resolution was made. He must go to Paris.

Yes. The Loadstone Rock was drawing him, and he must sail on until he struck. He knew of no rock; he saw hardly any danger. The intention with which he had done what he had done, even although he had left it incomplete, presented it before him in an aspect that would be gratefully acknowledged in France on his presenting himself to assert it. Then that glorious vision of doing good, which is so often the sanguine mirage of so many good minds, arose before him, and he even saw himself in the illusion with some influence to guide this raging Revolution that was running so fearfully wild.

As he walked to and fro with his resolution made, he considered that neither Lucie nor her father must know of it until he was gone. Lucie should be spared the pain of separation; and her father, always reluctant to turn his thoughts toward the dangerous ground of old, should come to the knowledge of the step, as a step taken, and not in the balance of suspense and doubt. How much of the incompleteness of his situation was referable to her father, through the conflicts and changes that avoid reviving old associations of France in his mind, he did not dare even think. For her father's sake, reinstance too he had let influence in his course.

He walked to and fro, with thoughts very busy, all the short time he remained in Soho, and take leave of Mr. Lorry. As soon as he judged that Lucie would be reconciled to this old friend, but he must say nothing of his intention now.

A carriage with post-horses was ready at the Bank door, and Jerry was booted and equipped.

"I have directions, Jerry, that I am to go to Darnay to Mr. Lorry. "I would not consent to your being charged with any written answer, but perhaps you will take my words."

"That I will, and readily," said Mr. Lorry, "if it is not dangerous."

"Not at all. Though it is to a prisoner in the Abbaye."

"What is his name?" said Mr. Lorry, with his open pocket-book in his hand.

"Gabelle."

"Gabelle. And what is the message to the unfortunate Gabelle in prison?"

"Simply, 'that he has received the letter, and will come.'"

"Any time mentioned?"

"He will start upon his journey to-morrow night."

"Any person mentioned?"

"No."

He helped Mr. Lorry to wrap himself in a number of coats and cloaks, and went out with him from the warm atmosphere of the old bank of London into the air of Fleet Street. "My love to Lucie, and to little Lucie," said Mr. Lorry as they parted, "shall take precious care of them till I come back." Charles Darnay shook his head and doubtfully smiled as the carriage rolled away.

That night—it was the fourteenth of August in the sun up yet, and twenty hours distant from the one was to Lucie, explaining the strong obligation he was under to go to Paris, and showing her that in leaving her and her father for a few days he was violating no promise he had made. Having confident that he could become involved in no complications there; the one motive was to the Doctor, confiding Lucie and their dear child to his care, and dwelling on the same topics with the strongest appearances. He told her words that he would dispatch letters in proof of his safety, immediately after his arrival.

It was a hard day, that day of being among them, with the first reservation of their joint lives on his mind. It was a hard night's work to serve the innocent deceit of which they were probably unsuspicious. But an affectionate glance at the heads of his darling's father, gave him resolute not to tell her what impended (he well knew what suffering it would cost her), lest she should go to Paris with him (or perhaps insist on his staying without her quiet aid), and she thus passed quietly. Early in the evening he embraced them, and her scented love and namesakes, pretending that he would return by the next day or the day after at latest, and that he had secreted a value of clothes ready), and he emerged into the heavy mist of the heavy street with a heavier heart.

The unseen force was drawing him fast to itself now, and all the tides and winds were setting straight and strong toward it. He left his few letters with a trusty porter, to be delivered half an hour before midnight, and no sooner took horse for Dover, and began his journey. "For the love of Lucie, and her child and father, of the honor of your noble name!" was the poor prisoner's cry with which he strengthened his resolution. Honor, in the tone of justice, of generosity

SIR—

Agreeably to your order of the 1st inst., we have witnessed a series of satisfactory experiments made with T. A. DELANO'S Life-Preserving Vest, and have the honor to report that we consider it a valuable invention—well adapted as the means of saving human life, from its convenient form, and the readiness with which it can be obtained, and slight liability to get out of order.

NEWPORT, R. I., October 6th 1858.

Delano Life-Preserving Coat and Vest Company:

GENTLEMEN—I have examined the improved Life-Preserving Vest, invented by T. A. Delano, and have seen it put to many severe tests, all of which it has so admirably stood, that I consider it a perfect protection against drowning. The elastic straps permit a large amount of inflation without incommoding or fatiguing the body, and, as far as I am aware, are as entirely new device and as well adapted as any.

Yours, very respectfully,

GEO. W. CULLUM,
Capt. U. S. Engineers.

It would hardly do for any one now-a-days to have the temerity to question the excellence of Dr. J. HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS for all diseases of the stomach. In cases of Dyspepsia, Bodily Weakness, Costiveness, Dysentery, and general derangement of the digestive organs, their many virtues have long since been made plainly apparent. They purge from the system the morbid humors which cause the above complaints, and thereby give strength to the stomach and suffering to the bowels. They banish those cirgs upon pleasure, restore the system to high health, and consequently prove a valuable adjunct to the digestive organs. "Blind and a Methodist preacher, Mr. Milburn has endured, and ministered, and achieved much the lonely record, and ministered, and achieved much the lonely record of the West and the pioneers among the aborigines of the South; he came in contact with a great variety of life and character, and won the sympathy of the most primitive people. In the hall, at the cabin, domestic and pilgrim experiences were simultaneously; this he narrates with a manly simplicity and honest faith. For not have suffered more, yet few more have met them in a generous attentiveness of their sorrows. Mr. Milburn is a natural orator, and he is fortunate in those traits that the habit of public speaking has marred the style of critical habit of public speaking has marred the style of critical. This book of life is a literary curiosity, and unbelieving mood by distinction, recorded by friends, and unbelieving the current history and inward feelings of one who from childhood has wandered in darkness."

PROFESSOR C. LOWE.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]

TRANSATLANTIC BALLOONING.

We engrave herewith a portrait of Professor Carlingreat Lowe, and pictures of the balloon he is building for the purpose of crossing the ocean. A general view of the balloon will be found on page 612. The engraving below will convey an idea of the closed chamber in which the balloonists propose to spend most of their time on their transatlantic voyage.

The idea of traversing the Atlantic in a balloon occurred many years ago to several leading aeronauts in this country. Since Professor Wise made his memorable trip from St. Louis, and the general subject has been illustrated in this journal, it has become paramount to all other schemes of the kind, and we are not surprised that Mr. Carlingford Lowe should have found people willing to assist him in the construction of a balloon for the purpose of making the great attempt.

The chief difficulty in the way of crossing the ocean with a balloon arises from the gradual exhaustion of its buoyant power. No balloon in existence, it is supposed, could retain its buoyancy for more than two or three days—no short a time, of course, to attempt a voyage of 3000 miles. But as the buoyant power is in exact proportion to the quantity of gas inclosed in the balloon, it would seem to follow that by increasing the latter the former would be multiplied; in other words, the larger the balloon the longer it will float in the air. Acting on this theory, Mr. Lowe has built a balloon considerably larger than the largest ever built hitherto. The Atlantic, the largest existing balloon, and the one in which Professor Wise and his friends made the famous St. Louis voyage, is 80 feet in diameter. The following are the dimensions of the City of New York, Mr. Lowe's new balloon:

Greatest diameter.....	feet 120
Transverse diameter.....	" 104
Height, from valve to base.....	" 160
Valves, each.....	two 24
Lifting power aggregate).....	265
Capacity of gas envelope.....	cubic feet 795,400

The material of which the balloon is constructed is twilled cloth, oiled, and covered with three coats of a peculiar kind of varnish, manufactured by Mr. Lowe, and calculated to render the balloon envelope air-tight. Six thousand yards of cloth have been consumed in the work, and seventeen sewing machines have been unceasingly occupied in stitching the pieces together. Round the balloon circles a net-work of fourteen cord, manufactured expressly for the purpose, and calculated to resist a strain of 160 tons.

From this cord depends a basket, and below the basket a boat (see engraving). The aeronauts are to travel in these two vehicles.

The basket, of which we give a section below, is built of rattan, covered with canvas, in which windows have been made. Its circumference is 20 feet; the basket-work will come about midchest to a man standing on the floor, while the canvas will rise several feet above his head. A circular seat runs round the interior; pegs and ridges against the walls will serve to support mathematical instruments, etc., while roomy coffers will contain provisions. The basket will contain a table and a stove. This stove is a new invention, which is intended to generate heat without the use of fuel, lime being substituted for coal or wood. It is 2 feet square and 14 feet high, and is provided with an apparatus for cooking. It was presented to the aeronauts by Mr. O. A. Gager. In the centre of the floor of the basket is a small hole or trap-door, through which, by a rope-ladder, aeronauts will communicate with the boat.

The latter will be a Francis life-boat, 30 feet long, 7 feet beam, and 4 feet deep; it will be supplied with an India-rubber covering for a deck, under which the navigators can seek shelter from the seas in case they have to take to the boat. It will be provided with an Ericsson caloric engine of four horse-power, which, being fed with fine coal and alcohol, will be capable of propelling the boat through the water at a fair rate of speed. It may be remarked here that the kindling of fires in vehicles attached to balloons is something new in aeronautic science. The danger of fire communicating to the gas and causing an explosion, or consuming the balloon, has always deterred aeronauts from using fire in any shape in their adventurous voyages. Mr. Lowe once lit a candle in a balloon, and kept it lighted without any flickering of the flame while the balloon was traveling at the rate of 100 miles an hour through the air; but, generally speaking, aeronauts are shocked at the bare idea of a match. Mr. Lowe believes that in the City of New York the stove may be kept alight and the engine heated without danger.

The queer-looking appendages to the boat, which will be seen in the engraving on page 612, are, first, a rudder, which is merely a thin strip of wood about eight feet long, and three feet wide at its widest extremity; and second, a propeller-wheel, eight feet in diameter, to act on the atmosphere in raising or depressing the course of the balloon. The aeronauts take with them, in case of accident, another similar wheel, of smaller size, being only four feet in diameter.

The boat will be ballasted with provisions and water, of which enough will be taken for ten persons for six months. The provisions will be selected with care, so as to obtain the largest amount of nutriment in the least space and with the least weight. We believe the aeronauts are of opinion that the prohibitory law does not cover the regions which they are to traverse, and that some wines will be added to their stores.

Other articles which will be contained in the boat are two copper buoys, each six feet in diameter, which will be used for the double purpose of condensers and drags when the boat sails near the surface of the water. These buoys will enable the navigators to add or reduce the ascending power of the balloon without discharging ballast or parting with gas. Another contrivance, in shape like a ship's lug, will be used for checking the speed of the balloon by throwing it overboard, fastened to a stout cord, and letting it rest on the surface of the water. The cords to this and the copper buoys will be each 2000 feet long.

In case it should be necessary to cut the balloon away, and take to the boat, the latter will at need be moored to a marine anchor 100 pounds in weight, attached to the boat by a rope 150 feet long and 4 inches in circumference; but it is hoped that this will not be required. As for air anchors, the balloon carries three grapnels of various sizes, and a number of hooks all of spring steel; and for the use of these it is provided with half a mile of rope of various thicknesses from one to ⅜ inches in circumference.

A novel contrivance will be used to test the various currents of air. This will be nothing more than a long cord, say a mile and a half in length, with a leaden weight at the end, and flags distributed along its length. This line will be kept out from the time the balloon starts; a careful inspection of the flags with a glass will enable the aeronauts to ascertain the direction of the various air currents beneath them, so that, in case they happen to be in an unfavorable current, they can, with the guidance of the barometer, descend to a more suitable air stratum. This will prove a most useful contrivance.

For the purpose of accosting ships or towns as they are passed, the balloon will take one hundred small parachutes, made of silk, and one hundred India-rubber bags, to contain letters and papers. One of these will be dropped over each town, or near each large ship that the balloon passes in the ocean.

Every kind of mathematical instrument used by aeronauts will of course be taken. There will be two large mercury barometers and one aneroid barometer, several thermometers, a large number of telescopes, including one presented by S. W. Chattuck of Utica, New York, two marine and several smaller compasses, etc., etc. As several members of the expedition will be scientific men, it may be assumed that the cause of science will be duly cared for.

In the event of any accident happening to the balloon, the voyagers expect to take to the boats, and make the best of their way to land. They have, besides the caloric engine, masts and sails which will enable them to make their way to any point they desire to reach; the boat being a Francis life-boat, is calculated to ride safely through any sea; and as we stated, a large proportion of the provisions and water will be permanently fastened in her bottom, in air-tight vessels, to serve as ballast. She carries on board of her a folded life-boat, made of India rubber, with water-tight compartments, which, in case of extreme emergency, might prove of service.

All that is known of the region into which the daring navigators of the City of New York are about to travel is that there is an air current, blowing steadily, at a certain elevation, from west to east. The travelers will of course make it their business to gain this current and avail themselves of it. Should they gain it on starting, and keep it throughout their voyage, they would find themselves in Spain in the course of three days. Should the current deficit, or should they be driven out of their course by accident, they might land either on Great Britain or France on the north, or in Spain, Portugal, or Africa on the south. To provide for all emergencies, they propose to provide themselves with passports for all the leading nations of Europe, so that, should they reach Europe, they may experience no difficulty in prosecuting their journey after they reach the earth. The flags on the balloon evidence the cosmopolitan feelings of the aeronauts.

Passports, however, would be of little assistance should they be forced to land on the coast of Africa. This contingency is, in fact, the prime danger of the expedition. There are many parts of the eastern coast of Africa which are entirely desert, and on which the aeronauts would have some difficulty in obtaining supplies of any kind, or a conveyance to a civilized land. To provide against this contingency, Mr. Lowe has laid in a store of Bass's canalles and rockets, with which to signal any passing vessel for aid in case the City of Portland makes the coast of Africa.

It is understood that from seven to ten passengers will be taken, including two or three scientific gentlemen, a scientific landsman, a member of Congress from New England, whose name is not yet secret, a New York editor, and one or two others. Each of these persons will be provided in his way to contribute his share toward the success of the experiment. Each will be allowed to take a certain amount of baggage, etc., and each will be provided with an India-rubber life-preserving suit, which may be worn as a protection against the cold as well as a safeguard against drowning in case of accident.

Ample precautions will be taken to provide the world with a record of the enterprise. We have mentioned the reporters and publishers. One hundred copies of the leading daily papers of New York, and two hundred copies of Harper's Weekly, will be taken to prove the aeronautic, and one copy of each, with a record of the log to date, will be dropped at sea every day, in order to avoid any which the balloon passes. Besides this, a number of carrier doves will be taken out, and loosed from time to time, with records of the progress found upon their necks.

We have now, we think, stated all that the public will at present desire to know with regard to the expedition. It only remains to add that the projector, Mr. Thaddeus Stewart Lowe, is a young man of twenty-seven years of age, who was born at Jefferson, New Hampshire, in the year 1832. He went to Boston to study chemistry at the age of fourteen, and speedily evinced a decided propensity for air voyaging. In 1853 he made his first ascension, since when he has made thirty-six successful ascents in balloons. About a year ago he formed the project of a transatlantic balloon voyage; and since has delayed the realization of the scheme till the present.

The City of New York will be exhibited in some public place in New York before it sails. The Crystal Palace grounds would be a good place for such an exhibition. We trust that the show may not prove the most practical part of the enterprise.

OLD NEWS.

Oh! grandfather, grandfather, listen to me,
The most wonderful news has come over the sea,
The most glorious news of the battles and wars
Where a million of men have been armed for the war
Even the Emperor of Morocco the Ancient and Great
And a score of their thousands were left with the dead
Ere the sieges of Tolerico the conquerors bore
The capture of Tolerico and the Emperor's gun
And the Austrian legions were swept in the gale,
As you bank is strewn with a blow of the sea.

Oh! grandfather, grandfather, read the great news,
It will tell you the chances for glory you lose;
It will tell of the victories of Solferino
And the shouts of the nations for deeds that were done
Your grandfather's eye don't you believe it was dim
With your bright-blooded sword to the midst of the fray—
That bright-blooded sword which you said to me lately
Should some day strike blood for my own native land?
Oh! grandfather, grandfather, a great thing it would be Could we both but have been in those fights ever nor.

There were flashes of light in the grandfather's eyes
And a shouting, and tossing tangled limbs' white locks
As he shook his white head, with a half-smothered groan,
And kneeled over the boy as the leaves o'er a bough
Ah! boy, it is one thing to strike for our lives,
For the hearth of our home, for our children and wives,
And another to battle with hatters in sight,
Unheeding the quarrel that drives up to fight.
To cut and to slash at a despot's command
Is not fighting, my boy, for your own native land.

The echo that comes from the boom of the gun
Is lost in the shouts when the battle is done,
But the groans of the wounded and shrieks of the dead
Will be heard in the echoes again and again;
They will sound in the dreams of the boy at his rest,
When his field where they fell is preserved in his breast.
The news of a fight is like flesh-spotted wine,
You must sprinkle your blithe with the blood of the slain
Ere the dregs are a mixture of sorrow and death.

I fought, my brave boy, when to shield were a shame
That could never be wiped from the line of a name;
I fought when refused as thralmed the youth
That his grandmother's milk bestowed with the life of his truth;
When his white hair of age marched proudly between
The invaded country and the boy of sixteen
When the crack of our rifles on Lexington plain
Was echoed, and reflected, and rattled again.
There was valour, my boy, from the hills to the sea,
As the hearts of a million were banged to be free.

With no fears was nothing of glitter and gold,
There was armour and rags, and starvation and cold;
There were hamebound men, who were tracked by their blood
On the stone-jagged road or the icy-bridged flood;
There were men who had sworn by their fire-worshipped sun,
By their blood-darkened hearths, with their swords in their hands.

Who had sworn that their kindred should see them or not Till the land should be free from the curse that it bore.
There were times when the battle-cry thundered out,
Resound with flowers perpetual over the dead.

The news of these battles will never grow old—
They grow up by telling, a thousand times told;
Out of sights that are fought for glory alone,
Fire the fighting of wars for the glory to them
As a diamond on the crests of the conquering hosts
By the gale bloody hosts of a legion of ghosts;
So I wished for the blade of victorious chiefs
By the heartwarding thirst of a million of griefs
And the sword of my father, the land that I love
It is trampled and crushed, like a voiceless thing.

When the battle is over the scarlet and gold
Shall speedily be dim with the blood-covered mould;
The steed and his rider shall stray where they fall,
And the shield and the sword be the spoil of all;
The ruins shall wash down all the proud gilded gore,
And the world be new swept by the last storm of war;
Yet, unless thilly have stricken for freedom and right,
Their deeds shall be nought and their names be forgot.
But if God shall be with them their hearts shall be bold,
And the news of their battles shall never grow old.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1859.

THE FOREIGN MOVEMENT ON THE SUNDAY QUESTION.

WE entertain the highest respect for our foreign-born citizens, especially the German. We believe that many of the most useful citizens of the United States are of German birth. Every one who has enjoyed opportunities of observation in the interior of our large cities a large proportion of the most industrious, thrifty, energetic, enlightened, and successful citizens are Germans by birth. We have always taken pleasure in bearing testimony to the fact. When Mr. Clay attempted, a few months ago, to discriminate invidiously against German-born citizens, and to deny them the rights to which they were entitled, we fought their battle, and fought it with unmeasured zeal until it was won.

We think, therefore, that we are entitled to say to our fellow-citizens of German birth that their late proceedings, in reference to the observance of the Sunday, are ill-judged, and are calculated to do themselves and their cause no little harm. In all kindness we would warn them against the dangers of the path they are treading.

It is not our purpose to enter into a discussion of the Sunday question, nor to ask it be called. On that question opinions differ, and between those opinions it is not now necessary that we should pronounce. Sabbath or no Sabbath, in Germany Sunday is kept in one way, and in the United States in another; and that the present effort of the Germans in New York and some other cities is to have our method of keeping Sunday done away with, and their method adopted in its stead. We could not but be fruitful of great mischief to those who make it, and fruitful of strength to the calumnies party on but opposed to them, if the simple reason that even the most liberal Americans—those, for instance, who would have the country engage in a war for the protection of any naturalized citizen—are not prepared to concede to any class of naturalized foreigners the exclusive privilege of making, or of, to adopt their habits to the exclusion of our own.

We repeat that we do not design to argue the Sunday question. We assert a right—the fact that, throughout this country, an immense majority of the people have always been trained to regard Sunday as a day of rest, of religious exercise, and of abstinence from labor and public diversions—and we say that the existence of this right or wrong is not the question; all that we claim is, that it is the fact. On the other hand, natives of Continental Europe—Germans, Frenchmen or Catholics, it matters not—invariably regard Sunday as a day of pleasure, recreation, and enjoyment. Such is the habit of the country, under green trees or by pleasant streams; a day to go to the theatre with one's family; a day to take the children and children's children parents, concerts, and shows. On this fashion, as on the other, we desire to express no critical opinion; the fact is all that we have to do with.

These being the points, the practical question to be decided is, which of the two modes of observing Sunday shall be adopted hereafter the American or the German? Which is more practicable and most reasonable—to have a couple of millions of German dollars and habits, or twenty-five millions of American citizens change their habits, and adopt the habits of a foreign race? We trust the decision to the sober second thought and common sense of the American people.

Our German friends must never forget that the American people, though more liberal and generous in religious than any other nation in the world, are still a jealous people, and apt to take umbrage at glaring attempts to interfere with their independence. We would have fought rather than surrender Christian Brest to the King of Hanover; but this does not by any means imply that we are ready to let the compatriots of Christian Ernst regulate our social life, make us open the theatres on Sunday, substitute lager beer saloons for churches, and turn New York into a German town. And when Germans, Frenchmen, and Italians meet in a public place, and utter silly speeches about their rights [meaning their right to annoy us], and threaten to resist the execution of laws which are indisputably in accordance with the sentiment of ninety-nine-hundredths of our people, we are bound to say that the necessary effect of such foolish demonstrations must be to damage the general standing of the foreign population, and to prejudice the native prejudice which was so menacing a short while since. The Germans may take our word for it that they can be grossly misled and much may be lost, by such proceedings as this. The hair-brained demagogues who speak at their meetings and appeal to republican or American sentiment, are eschewed by the respectable portion of the community. Men of intelligence do not believe that the German are aggrieved by our Sunday laws. Nothing prevents their going to the country on Sunday, and there lager beer, and getting and going to concerts or shows among their own people. All this sort of thing is done by the bulk of the Americans that is tolerated nevertheless. When the Germans ask for more, and threaten and bluster, they damage their own cause and their own standing far more than they imagine.

DECLINE OF THE AMERICAN NAVAL POWER.

THAT the naval power of this country is declining, and will soon cease to compare with that of a first-class European nation, every observer must acknowledge. By naval power we do not mean that power which is created by a national armed navy. Of such vessels as guns and fighting men can confer, we shall, we trust, always have enough for our purposes. We mean that that power which the country has so long wielded, by reason of a large, well-built, and well-appointed merchant navy, is about to be wrested from us by Europe.

Years ago the carrying trade of the world was in the hands of Great Britain. Her ships exceeded all the rest of Europe, and, of course, covered every sea. Britannia ruled the waves in earnest—not so much by the vulgar process of fighting battles vessels, but because she could, more safely, and more swiftly than any other nation. The war of 1812 taught this country the practical truth that, to be powerful, we must have a great merchant navy of our own. Then before our merchant marine had been good scores bred and good ships built in "the days of the clean colonies," the second war gave a great impetus to which our commerce, stimulated by the spirit of enterprise and the inventive genius of Americans still further developed the maritime power of the country. In 1840 the United States were barely second to Great Britain in ocean tonnage; they surpassed Europe in river tonnage. Then, as now, Europe had nothing to compare to our Hudson or Mississippi and lake steamers. And on the ocean, American supremacy was generally beyond a doubt. American clippers were fast monopolizing the China and East India trade. American packets had driven British vessels out of the trade between New York and Liverpool, London and Havre. No man thought of crossing the ocean in a sailing ship that was not American, or to Europe without steamships. Though some of our early experiments were failures, the Collins line was projected upon a basis of success. Vanderbilt was bringing forth a steamship every year or two; California was soon to call a magnificent fleet of vessels into active existence. The prospect was so fair that, eight or ten years ago, writers and speakers of the soberest cast thought it quite safe to predict that the republic supremacy of the seas for the United States.

We are now 1859, and where is the supremacy?

It is well to repeat the statement—to din it into the ears of our people—to hammer it into the head of every man who is intelligent enough to have a care for the future—THE EMPIRE OF THE SEAS IS PASSING OUT OF OUR HANDS INTO THOSE OF GREAT BRITAIN.

Screw steamers have, for the time at all events, rendered the United States to a very second-rate station among maritime countries. The great Atlantic trade is being monopolized by European vessels. The first effect of Germany establishing lines of steamers to New York, as Prussia has lines; England has a dozen lines; and France as many as she may care to be launching new steamers; the United States have but four steamers which ply to Europe, and these are only now formally sailed once and twice a week, to and from Liverpool, London, and Havre. Packets, too, are fast disappearing and are ruining their owners. Our China clippers are only waiting for the success of the Great Eastern to become equally useless and equally ruinous. In two or three years, at the present rate of progress, it will be a saving to break up three-fourths of our sailing vessels, sell them for old lumber, and resign the carrying trade of the world into other hands.

It has been said that our ships can never lack employment so long as there remain bulky and non-perishable articles, such as cotton and flour, to be transported across sea. Steamers, it has been urged, can not compete with sailing craft for such freights. Let the shipbuilders answer, and they will tell you that though of course a steamer could not load with cotton as cheap as a sailing packet, still every steamship will, when she has taken all the freight offering, fill up with any thing she can get—even cotton bales or wheat; and that thus the market is "spoils" for the sailers.

In a few days our people will be flocking by the thousands to Portland to see the Great Eastern. Here she will realize, when they see her, that they are at once in the harbormaster that is destined to complete the ruin of the American merchant navy! Yet it is so. If any success is making of the voyage from London to Calcutta in thirty-three days, as is expected, our China clippers will find it pretty difficult to get cargoes afterward.

The problem—why the ship-builders of the United States have not kept pace with those of Great Britain in building steamers—can not be readily solved. It is often said that wooden screw steamers will not answer; that we can not afford to build iron steamers in the country; and that side-wheel steamers can not compete with screws. All these suppositions are incorrect. The Niagara, and other United States vessels, are instances of perfectly successful wooden screw steamers. The British navy contains several such vessels; we are informed by the largest ship-owner in this country that all the iron vessels are converted screw steamers without risk of failure. To prove the fallacy of the last two propositions, Commodore Vanderbilt has built a first-class iron steamship at Wilmington, Delaware. Her cost, he states, is not so extravagant as to prevent the construction of a large number of such vessels in this country. She is a side-wheel ship, and the Commodore declares that she will be run as cheaply as any of the class. The cause of the other reasons which have been put forward to account for the singular lack of enterprise shown by our ship-builders by order of Congress. It raised the Collins line, the ships of which have just been sold for one-third their cost, and it effectually checked the tendencies of other builders to construct steamers which might have to compete at disadvantage with "the Government pets." The English are just beginning to see the mistake they committed in not following the Cunard line. Several years may elapse they will abandon the policy, and will promote competition.

APPROACHING A CLIMAX.

WHEN any new circumstances needed to evidence that misgovernment which citizens quietly endure under the name of "the regular policiary," and whose increasing enormities have been successively chronicled and reprehended in these columns, those circumstances could be gathered from pending discussions all over the land in political conventions, and in the room of private solicitors.

At the recent Republican Convention in Syracuse one delegate objected to the candidacy of Judge Woodruff for a seat on the Court of Appeals, because he had been identified unfavorably to the "cause of freedom" in the celebrated Lemmon slave case, which would come, necessarily, before the Judge then to be chosen. Another delegate urged Judge Davies, because of alleged agencies connected with the same controversy. The fact was that neither Judge had any thing whatever to do with the matter, and that the whole affair was simply got up by the agents of the slave-representation! Another city newspaper is attacking Judge Roosevelt's renomination on various grounds of discontented spun? Some politicians of the Baltimore order are understood to be intriguing against Judge Daly's renomination. A learned scholar and pure man, Judge Daly, because he nonsisted "one of their kidney" in the recent damages against the California Vigilance Committee for exportating him. A leading partisan was last week heard to say that another incumbent "would be thrown," because he had refused to pay his party assessment. When a recent extra compensation was voted to police by the New York Board of Supervisors, the lobby knowingly mentioned the portions which would have to be subscribed for party purposes

For the past year New Jersey has been without a Chancery Court, and no mortgages could be foreclosed, because the politicians had quarreled to a drawn game as to who the partisan incumbents should be.

From these instances—and they are merely selections—it will be seen that the four mutual considerations affecting the fidelity and impartiality of our judges are now openly and publicly displayed. Neither the bench nor the counsel discreetly in the private caucus or the charmed circle of "state-writers." No one believes for a moment that the gentleman appointed to preside over a court of justice has not special qualifications for the duties to these arguments pro and con. But it is impossible to refrain from the fear that the time is not distant, in the downward rush of the "electric affiliation" regarding our judges, when "a fair unprejudiced mind" will be a myth, and judges be found urging their claims from their very leanings as lawyers or from the bench. Let not the public or personal or neglect a remedy when a conservative press redoubles its warnings of an approaching climax of evil.

EXTRAVAGANCE IN LIVING.

SOME people wonder why, notwithstanding the general industry and money-making capacity of our people, pecuniary embarrassment should occur so frequently among us. We can point to one reason—extravagance in living. People in New York, as well as in other American cities, spend more on their houses, on their dress, on their eating, and on their equipages than the people of any foreign city. The following paragraph, which we take from a city paper, will illustrate the fact:

"THE WEALTH OF CHICAGO AND NEW YORK."—Some idea of this supposititious and Aladdin-like line may be formed by examining a small show-case, now on exhibition at Tiffany & Co.'s, in which is grouped, on an area of less than thirty inches square, a collection of gorgeous diamond jewelry, forming an outfit for a lady, valued at $50,000. A pin, formed of a single diamond, valued at $5000; one necklace, of large diamonds, $2000; two small ones, $5000 each; two parasols, $75 each.

This lady's outfit will then consist of an amount of $76,600, or $8500 every year, in the mere pride of owning, and pleasure of looking at, jewels.

CORRECTION.

MESSRS. STEBBINS, BUCKINGHAM, & CO., of Chicago, wish to have it understood that their warehouses do not contain 223,000 bushels each, as stated in a recent number of the Weekly, the utmost ever received in one house was 90,000 bushels; but 100,000 could be received, and 40,000 or 60,000 shipped in a day.

THE LOUNGER.

LEIGH HUNT.

LEIGH HUNT is gone at last. He was an old man in years; but he was a young man in heart and gushing boy to the end. He was the special friend of Shelley and Keats, too, and belongs by sympathy to the Lake poets, although he was in fact four years older than Lord Byron.

Leigh Hunt could run more than a pound from a feast of late English literature than luscious fruit from a good dinner. He loved all things bright and genial and beautiful. His father was a West Indian negro, sweetest topics, like a tea upon a vine, or a butterfly on the clover. He was a poet and critic by way of his sweet-hearts, and his "Indicator" and "Companion" are by far the best essays since Addison's, with the odor—sweet and delightful—of the wood was peculiarly English, with a strong Italian flavor. The traditions of "the good old seasons" Lenten, were not less dear to him than the pastoral charms of Arcadia or the fairy realm of Spenser. There is a lovely glimmer of light and love in a warm, genial half-smile and mulging of the eli-lose in all his writings. It is the secret of the personality of interest in him which is quite a rare index of genius.

He was a professional author, and one of the most copious and universally agreeable. Often though he was a hack, hard worked and poorly paid, He was just the man to write an autobiography, for he had the very genius of gossip, and had seen and known many persons worth it. His autobiography is, therefore, very entertaining.* When Wordsworth died there was talk of making Hunt Laureate. He was made for it, by nature. He delighted like a boy in associations, in seasons, in the suggestings and sympathies of nature, and in such a post. He would have been inspired by every fresh drop of the bright perfusion of the dewy Rose. Besides, George Fourth send him a pot for selling him a fat Odeonic of fifty; so that Victoria might very properly graciously have given to his native prairies, officially. He did not get that Laurel, but he had many a better thing by a person of rank. It was not much—but it was much to him. He had a thousand dollars clear, without scribbling for it.

Leigh Hunt was always an independent thinker, and a liberal in politics and religion. He had plenty of manly stuff in him, although he was so much and so long a boy. With him goes the last of that great company who have made the last half-century of English literature famous. He was not the greatest of them, for only one can be greatest. But in all that splendid society there was no more hearted, softer-souled, genial, affectionate, and beloved man than he whose grave is fresh in three bright September days, and who has written three of the best sonnets in the language: that to the Grasshopper, to the Nile, and Alon Ben Adhem. The last, if it may be called a sonnet, is one of the most perfect of poems:

"Abou Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase!)
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw within the moonlight in his room,
Making it rich, and like a lily in bloom,
An angel writing in a book of gold:
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the Presence in the room he said,
'What writest thou?' The vision raised its head,
And, with a look made of all sweet accord,
Answered, 'The names of those who love the Lord.'
'And is mine one?' said Abou. 'Nay, not so,'
Replied the angel. Abou spoke more low,
But cheerily still; and said, 'I pray thee, then,
Write me as one that loves his fellow-men.'
The angel wrote, and vanished. The next night
It came again with a great wakening light,
And showed the names of those who love of God blessed,
And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest."

RAILROAD MANNERS.

SINCE railroad morals are beyond hope of improvement—for the Grand Jury at Troy have refused to indict the Company whose criminal ignorance or negligence occasioned the slaughter of innocent men and women at the Schaghticoke smash-up—let us try to improve about railroad manners. Couldn't it be so arranged that a man's luggage should be safe so long as he is? Or is it lawful to plunder a passenger's trunk, since the directors and superintendent undertake to keep bridges in repair, omit the luggage-smasher to intrench with the destruction of luggage?

That is the latest railroad wrong. Professor Edward Cooley, who was recently written to a morning paper, has the good sense to do what ought to have been done long ago. He pitches, under his own name, calls the attention of the directors to the conduct of their servants. It seems that the baggage-master at Hudson raised Mr. Cooley's trunks, and insulted him into the bargain.

Oh that the Professor would only write to us in a rare vein!—were, in fact, the only bird of his kind. But trunk after trunk departs, via the hath and lets a leather bag, a hat-box, a carpet-bag, hanged, tattered, slung, jammed, smashed, and totally destroyed, and nobody cares. The bullies on railroad porter should have such a special spite against the details of his business is difficult to say. If the baggage-smasher should break the boxes of goods as the railroad porter treats his trunks he would be speedily released from employment.

If every man who suffered in this way would complain to the proper officer, and then publish through the papers, and if every one who loses a trunk, or has it damaged, would take the trouble to sue the Company—why, if it were carefully stated not to be a human trunk that was destroyed—that it was not a case of "Man and Wife"—perhaps baggage-smashing might be done—some damages allowed—for a railroad company is human, and that they would presently tumble the seditious traveler through a rotten bridge—not give the least upon of damages—and to be square with him.

NEW HOLIDAYS.

THAT the Americans had no holidays was long a bitter reproach to them. Abroad, every day in the church people was always said, with a force that the idea acts the most powerful of all principles. It went abroad, and in France, in Germany, in Italy, every where, we saw the capacity of amusement, and were delighted with it. But, alas! the Americans poor and wisely kept ignorant by their "paternal" governments, and the Church which is the fruitful source of their hearty enjoyments—their café—gardens—music—parks. The "paternal" governments unfettered that secret source.

The American is individually a great deal more independent than the native of any other country. He has a nervous self-consciousness. If he can not do the best, he will do nothing. The rule of society which he has made for himself is that of its powers must be, of course, individual contribution. If a man can't do every thing, let him do what he can. If he can't sing, let him sing up as high as he can. If he can't make a fairy answer, he can make a fairy question. Society with answers, let him be as clever as he can. Nobody in any assembly can be said to be a failure, particularly upon the plea that it is a childish business. All play and fun are childish business, if you come to the philosophy of them. Children are not so wise as children; for if they were, they would have a great deal more fun, and, consequently, a great deal more faith. The difference to the old saints is their solemnity. Why so and where? Let the Church answer, and we. Whose acutely remarks (Shakespeare's Scholar, p. 35), the repetitions of the typographical errors of the first folio are not essential to the meaning. He also says, "The corrections were certainly made long after the original entry of the plays had passed away, and some, if not all, of the changes quite as surely not until after the Restoration, when the theatres had been closed for years, and the traditions of the stage had perished."

Whether this extraordinary or valve, the reprint of the corrections made a great commotion in the world of Shakespearian literature—but the old folio has had no luck. Collier said that he traced it to the hands of Mr. Pary, who owned it fifty years ago, and who died very poor.

That recently the mysterious old folio has been treated like a mere Egyptian mummy. Science resolved that, if it had any story to tell, it should tell it. So it was taken to the British Museum, and science stripped to it. It brought out microscopes and solvents; it scraped and scrutinized and scanned, and finally declared that the ink is not ink—that it is only a wash of pigment over pencil-marks; and that the margins of the book are covered with penciliarks in a modern hand. Moreover, Mr. Parry has appeared, and says that Mr. Collier never owned the book in his—that Mr. C. never came to him—and that it is not his old folio at all. This is Mr. Parry may be hale and hearty, as they say, but he is a terrible fellow. For if this testimony be correct, there is another ensemble to his knocking about the world, upon which we shall presently have to strain our wits.

The benefit now is only greater than that of the discovery; and some way has suggested that Mr. Collier has tried to palm a forgery upon the world. Nothing can be more ludicrous than to think that a man who has been patiently annotating and editing Shakespeare for forty years, should suddenly and deeply fash out with an audacious piece of genius like this? The intrinsic impossibility acquits the gentle Mr. Collier at once.

That there is an old folio, covered with some twenty thousand annotations, is certain. But still, despite science and Mr. Parry. That they were made by authority—by any hand which had access to the manuscript—by the hand of the printer, is deeply which has never had the slightest show of support. Admit that a corrector, or even a reader, was employed, it did infect science brought out the microscope and Mr. Parry; and precisely where it was placed. It is all white in the complete and sensitive discussion of the subject five years ago. That is to say, whenever the change occurred themselves to common sense they will be adopted. The hale and hearty Mr. Parry seems to be a totally irrelevant personage. And if it were a folio of 1632, "described all over," which passed out of his hands somewhere about 1800, it is very much to be probable that no indifferent a successor of such a treasure might not be able to identify it after fifty years. And if Mr. Collier says that he came to him, and Mr. Parry says that he did not, it is a mere question of personal veracity.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

C.—Perhaps so; whether, with absolute safety, "And now, my brethren, one word more and I have done," and then preach on for an hour more, or "they do so not"—what is not literally true. Oneeda is too severe. When Mr. Webster ends each of his speeches she is unable to accept Mrs. Yeamans's polite invitation, does she tell—? Not at all. She knows the proper conformity of speech to express that she is not coming. "One word more" means merely—Mary Ann.

—J. M. T. One of your drawings is admirable. It is a talent which should be always cultivated, and young particularly. Your painting is not admirable. A good painter or a good one must be sensitive to color. It is to his what unmusical sounds are to a musician. By all means study drawing.

—W. T. D. In dress, when neither king nor his castle have been mentioned, and nothing more than the king may be assisted—that is, he may be placed upon his square. Whether he can be castle upon his fellow—

—GERMAINE. The Lounger can not give the details of the West Point entertainment. It seems to consist mainly of the marching and military drill and military training. The institution turns out good mathematicians, and good officers in time of emergency. It is a military school. The course is very severe. But the Lounger has known a young republican of the Congress Fenole Institute in New York, pass an examination as severe as that of West Point in 1851 he was Professor of Poetry at Oxford. He has written a History of Christianity from the foundation to the abolition of paganism in the Roman empire; and a History of the Jews. Neither has been published in this country on edition of Gibbon's History. He has also published several volumes of poems. He is now in Rome. He is a gifted writer. His prize poem at Oxford won the Apollo in old quotes?

"Herod ye the arrow burst through the sky?" etc.

—READER. Mary Somerville is the name of a distinguished living English writer upon astronomy. Humboldt quotes her.

—A FRENCHMAN. It is too bad. You say you want to get into practice, and the difficulty is the cost of your verses would be that you could not get them out again. Your verses would want to after a few months. Respectfully declined.

—The Lounger is grieved to hear by a letter from a gentleman in Texas that he omits that he was deceived by finding what he calls "a sensible write" that he thinks that he is a sensible correspondent. He thanks that your picture cure!

—I being a good looking practical man of the world, having traveled much both at home and abroad, and as I am attended with success. And if anybody has any power to procure a sensible Wife, as unimpeachable Ladies of the city, simply corresponding to my standard in this city, being for and for between."

The Lounger is much astonished to hear that his correspondent still wait. The letter is written in good faith, and such letters are never answered so. And since, ladies, they are not generally written in.

—EDITH M. S. The poem is pretty. But—no, thank you!

—G. W. L., speaking of M'Donald Clarke says:

"He talks thus madly of Wheeler:

"'Dissolve your love verses,
As spirit that lab to forget
Earth, from whose dark bosom
And fire a double stage
To the sweet sky, and weep a genteel nut—
Match him, posterity, if you can!'

"Did we where the wild-blazing gas-glop appears,
As the red waves of artificial seas roll,
Hear a voice in the midst of the burning years,
The horrible light-house of life?"

—Can such a man be considered and yet truthful name then he was?

—O. Pleasure takes the Lounger to task for using the word "pleasure," and asks if "surgeons can be a generalship." It is certainly wrong so to use the terms of the art. It must be derived from the context. When it is said that they who pay for a certain entertainment with no possible chance to the enjoyment of it; if meaning the contract approval not probably means that they will pay for something which others will enjoy, except when they themselves shall choose of event to be upon the spot to witness the performance. The Lounger has "means" what instead of "than where" is improper. The rest of the letter is clever. It is good hypercriticism.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER LV.

A SELECT PARTY.

On a pleasant evening in the same month of June Mr. Abel Newt entertained a few friends at supper. The same June air, with less fragrance, perhaps, blew in at the open windows which looked outside upon nothing but the street and the house walls opposite, but inside was luxury and ease.

It mattered little what was outside, for heavy curtains hung over the windows; and the light, the beauty, the revelry were all within.

The boyish look was entirely gone now from the face of the lord of the feast. It was even a little sallow in hue and satiated in expression. There was occasionally that hard, black look in his eyes which those who had seen him sister Fanny intimately had often remarked in her—a look with which Alfred Dinks, for instance, was familiar. But the companions of his revels were not skewed of vision. It was not Herbert Octavius, nor Corlear Van Boozenberg, nor Bowdoin Beacon, nor Sligo Moultrie, nor any other of his set, who especially remarked his expression: it was, oddly enough, Miss Grace Plumer, of New Orleans.

She sat there in the pretty, luxurious rooms, prettier and more luxurious than they. For, at the special solicitation of Mr. Abel Newt, Mrs. Plumer had consented to accept an invitation to a little supper at his rooms—very small and very select; Mrs. Newt, of course, to be present.

The Planners arrived, and Laura Magot; but a note from mamma excused her absence—papa somewhat indisposed, and so forth; and Mr. Abel himself so sorry—and Miss Plumer knew what those husbands are, and so forth. Meanwhile the ladies have thrown off their shawls.

The dinner was exquisite, and exquisitely served. Prince Abel, with royal grace, presided. By every lady's plate a pretty bouquet: the handsomest of all not by Miss, but by Mrs. Plumer. Flowers were every where. It was Grand Street, indeed, in the city; but the garden at Pinewood, perhaps, did not smell more sweetly.

"There is no perfume of the clover, which is the very breath of our Southern air," said Mrs. Plumer; but clover does not grow in the city, Miss Grace."

Prince Abel begins the little speech to the mother, but his voice and face turn toward the daughter as it ends.

Flowers are in glasses upon the mantle, and in vases of many-colored materials and of various shapes upon tables about the room. The last new books, in English editions often, and a few solid classics, are in sight. Pictures also.

"What a lovely Madonna!" says Miss Plumer, as she raises her eyes to a beautiful and really engraving that hangs between two of the walls which, indeed, had been intended to be worn by her.

"Yes. It is the Sistine, you know," said the Prince, as he sees that the waiter pours wine for Mrs. Plumer.

The Prince forgets to mention that it is not the engraving which usually hangs there. Usually it is a pretty colored French print representing "Lucille," a young woman who has apparently very recently issued from the bath. Indeed there is a very choice collection of French prints which the young men occasionally study over their cigars, but which are this evening in the port-folio, which is not in sight.

The waiters move very softly. The wants of the guests are often revealed to them by being supplied. Quiet, elegance, luxury prevail.

"Really, Mr. Newt"—it is Mrs. Plumer, of New Orleans, who speaks—"you have created Paris in Grand Street!"

"Ah! madame, it is you who bring the manners of the French court, and adorn a bachelor's poor menage with your kind presence."

He speaks to the mother; he looks, as he ends, again at the daughter.

The daughter is a wise young woman. For the mother there is in the sanctuary of a bachelor—of a young man about town. It is a character which always interests her—which half fascinates her. For Miss Plumer, of New Orleans, has read most French literature of the lighter sort—novels and romances; for instance—than most of the young women of the present day.

whom Abel Newt meets in society. Grace Plumer's eyes are very shrewd, and she is looking every where to see if she shall not light upon some token of bachelor habits—something that shall reveal the man who occupies those pretty rooms.

Every where her bright eyes fall softly, but every where upon quiet, elegance, and luxury. There is the Madonna; but there are also the last winner at the Newmarket, by Herring, and Bulwer, and a French landscape. The books are good, but not too good. There is an air of candor and honesty in the room, consistent with the luxury and elegance, that greatly pleases Miss Grace Plumer. The negligence is not unseemly up to that handsome, graceful, dark-haired, dark-eyed gentleman whose eye is following hers, while she does not know it, and upon him has preceded yours in the very journey it has not taken, O! clear-eyed, cheerful-hearted maiden.

Sligo Moultrie sits beyond Miss Plumer, who is at the left of Mr. Newt. Upon the right of Mrs. Plumer. The friendly relations of Abel and Sligo have not been disturbed. They seem how they are aware of each other's movements; somehow, if one calls upon the Planners or drives with them, he walks with them alone, the other knows it. And they talk together freely of all people in the world, except the Planters of New Orleans. In Abel's room of an evening, at a late hour, when a party of youth are smoking, there are many allusions to the pretty Planter—to which it happens that Newt and Moultrie make only a general reply.

As the dinner proceeds from delicate course to course, and the wines of varying hue sparkle and flow, so the conversation becomes more gentle, continuous brook. Good things are said, and there is that kind of happy appreciation which makes the generally silent speak and the clever more witty.

Mrs. Goldefrot Plumer has traveled much and enjoys the world. She is a Creole, with the Tropics in her hair and complexion and Spain in her eyes. She wears a Parisian head-dress, a bronzed upon her ample person, and diamonds around her complacent neck and arms. Diamonds also flash in the fan which she sways gently, admiring Prince Abel. Diamonds—large solitaires—glitter likewise in the ears of Miss Grace. She wears also a remarkable bracelet of the same precious stones; for the rest, her dress is a cloud of Mechlin lace. She has quick, dark eyes, and an active head. Her hands and feet are small. She has filbert nails and an arched instep. Prince Abel, who hangs upon his mail the portrait of the last Newman victor, has not omitted to observe these details. He thinks how they would grace a boudoir—how a more splendid table.

Sligo Moultrie remembers a spacious country-house, surrounded by a silent plantation, somewhat fallen from its state, whom such a mistress would sagacity restore. He has come to be convinced to wed for money, but too indolently luxurious to love without.

Half hidden under the muslin drapery by the window is a cage with a canary. The bird sits silent; but as the feast proceeds he pours a shrill strain into the murmur of the guests. For the noise of the golden-breasted bird Sligo Moultrie can not hear something that is said to him by the ripe mouth between the solitaires. He sees parton, and it is repeated.

Then, still smiling and looking toward the window, he says, and so he says it his eyes—over which he knows his companion is looking—wander over the room,

"A very pretty cage!"

The eyes drop upon hers as they finish the circuit of the room. They say no more than the ripe have said. And Miss Grace Plumer answers,

"I thought you were going to say a very noisy bird."

"But the bird is not very noisy," says the young man, his dark eyes still holding hers.

There is a moment of silence, during which Miss Plumer may have her fancy of what he means. If so, she does not choose to betray it. If her eyes are clear and shrewd, the woman's wit is not less so. It is with an air of the utmost innocence that she replies,

"It was certainly noisy enough to drown what I was saying."

There is a sound upon her other side as if a musical bell rang.

"Miss Plumer!"

Mr. Sligo Moultrie sees the massive dark bracelet between the solitaires. The ripe mouth half smiles upon Prince Abel.

He holds a porcelain plate with a peach upon it, and a silver fruit-knife in his hand. She smiles, as if the music had melted into a look. Then the hearer is again

"Here is the sunniest side of the sunniest peach for Miss Plumer."

Sligo Moultrie can not help hearing, for the tone is not low. But, while he is expecting to hear the reply, Miss Magot, who sits beyond him, speaks to him. The Prince Abel, who sees many things, sees this; and in a tone which Mrs. Plumer knows—and nobody else in the room hears—

"May life always be that side of a sweet fruit to her!"

It is the tone and not the words which are eloquent.

The next instant Sligo Moultrie, who has answered Miss Magot's question, hears Miss Plumer say:

"Thank you, with all my heart."

It seems to be a warm acknowledgment for a piece of fruit.

"I was going to speak of the bird; I spoke of the cage," are the words that Miss Plumer next hears.

She turns to Sligo Moultrie and says, with eyes that expect a reply,

"Yes, you are right; it is a very pretty cage."

"Even a cage may be a home, I suppose."

"Ask the canary."

And so turned to the basest mes," says Mr. Moultrie, as if thinking aloud.

"He is rooted by a little ringing laugh:

"Pleasant idea of home you must have, Mr. Moultrie."

He smiles also.

"I do not wonder you laugh at me; but I mean sense, for all that," says he.

"You usually do," she says, sincerely, and eyes and solitaires glitter together.

Sligo Moultrie is happy—for one moment. The next he hears the musical bell again. Miss Plumer turns in the very middle of a word which she has begun to address to him.

"Miss Grace?"

"Mr. Abel, Newt."

"You observe the engraving of the Madonna?"

"Yes."

"You see the two cherubs below looking up?"

"Yes."

"You see the serene sweetness of their faces?"

"Yes."

"Do you know what it is?"

Grace Plumer looks as if curiously speculating. Sligo Moultrie can not help hearing every word, although he pares a peach and offers it to Miss Magot.

"Miss Grace, do you remember what I said once of bachelor meditation—that if it were eloquent it would be irresistible?"

Grace Plumer bows an assent.

"Well, that is mere convenience—a sort of silent eloquence—is pure happiness to him who has it."

She thinks she remembers that too, although Mr. Prince apparently forgets that he never said it to her before.

"Well, Miss Plumer, it seems to me that serene sweetness is the expression of the perfect happiness of entire admiration, that is to say, of love; whoever loves is like these cherubs — perfectly happy."

He looks attentively at the picture, as if he had forgotten his own existence in the happiness of the cherubs. Grace Plumer glances at him for a few moments with a pretty curiosity in her expression. It is full of admiration, but it does not seem the look with which she would say, as she just now said to Sligo Moultrie, "You always speak sincerely."

She is still looking at the Prince when Mr. Moultrie begins again:

"I ought to be allowed to explain that I meant only that as a cage is a home, so it is often used as a snare. Do you know, Miss Grace, that the prettiest birds are often put into the prettiest cages to entice other birds? By-the-by, how lovely Laura Magot is this evening!"

He cuts a small piece of the peach with his silver knife and puts it into his mouth.

"Peaches are luxuries in June," he says, quietly.

This time it is at Sligo Moultrie that Miss Grace Plumer looks fixedly.

"Peaches are out of season, Mr. Moultrie?" she says, at length.

"Miss Grace, do you know the story of the old Prince of Este?" answers he, as he lays a bunch of grapes upon her plate. She pulls one carelessly and lets it drop again. He takes it and puts it in his mouth.

"No; what is the story?"

"There was an old Prince of Este who had a beautiful villa and a beautiful sister, and no higher bliss in the world but a fiery eye and an eloquent tongue."

Sligo Moultrie flushes a little and drinks a glass of wine. Grace Plumer is a little paler and more serious. Prince Abel plies Madame Plumer with fruit and compliments, and hears every word.

"Well."

"Well, Miss Grace, she was so beautiful that many a lady became her friend, and many of those friends sighed for the brother's fiery eyes and blushed as they heard his honeyed tongue. But he was looking for a queen. At length came the Princess of Sheba—"

"Are you talking of King Solomon?"

"No, Miss Plumer, only of Abdiladee. And when the Princess of Sheba came near the villa the Prince of Este entreated her to visit him, promising that the sister should be there. It was a pretty cage, I think; the sister was a lovely bird. And the Princess came."

He stops and drinks more wine.

"Very well! And then?"

"Why, then, she had a very pleasant visit," he says, gayly.

"Mr. Moultrie, is that the whole of the story?"

"No, indeed, Miss Plumer; but that is as far as we have got."

"I want to hear the rest."

"Don't be in such a hurry; you won't like the rest so well."

"Yes; but that is my risk."

"It is your risk," says Sligo Moultrie, looking at her; "will you take it?"

"Of course I will," is the clear-eyed answer.

"Very well. The Princess came; but she did not go away."

"Not even curious! Did she die of a peach-stone at the banquet?"

"Not at all. She became Princess of Este instead of Sheba."

"Oh, ah!" says Grace Plumer, in a long-drawn exclamation. "And then?"

"Why, Miss Grace, how insatiable you are! —then, I came away."

"You did? I wouldn't have come away."

"Miss Grace, you didn't."

"How—I didn't? What does that mean, Mr. Moultrie?"

"I mean the Princess remained."

"So you said. Is that all?"

"No."

"Well."

"Oh! the rest is nothing. I mean nothing new."

"Let me hear the old story, then, Mr. Moultrie."

"The rest is merely that the Princess found that the fiery eyes burned her and the eloquent tongue stung her, and truly that is the whole. Isn't it a pretty story? The moral is that cages are sometimes traps."

Sligo Moultrie becomes suddenly extremely attentive to Miss Magot. Grace Plumer pondoes many things, and among others, wonders how, when, where, Sligo Moultrie learned to talk in parables. She does not ask herself why he does so. She is a woman, and she knows why.

The conversation takes a fresh turn. Corbie Van Boozenberg is talking of the great horses, Miss Wayne. He has drunk wine enough to be bold, and calls out aloud from his end of the table,

"Mr. Abel Newt!"

That gentleman turns his head toward his guest.

"We are wondering down here how it is that Miss Wayne went away from New York unengaged."

"I am not her confidant," Abel answers; and guiltlessly adds, "I am sure, like every other man, I should be glad to be so."

"But you had the advantage of every body else."

"How so?" asks Abel, conscious that Grace Plumer is watching him closely.

"Why, you were at school in Delafield until you were six children."

Abel bows smilingly.

"You must have known her."

"Yes, a little."

"Well, didn't you know what a stunning bridge she was, and so handsome? How'd you, of all men in the world, let her slip through your fingers?"

A certain silence follows this effusion. Corbie Van Boozenberg is slightly flown with wine. Hal Hattleberg, the son of James, who sits near him, looks troubled. Herbert Cotayne and Mellish Whitfire exchange meaning glances. The young lady at Abel's left hand is the one person, except Mrs. Dagon who sits below—amiable placemanly Sligo Moultrie can't count—Grace Plumer waits to hear what Abel says, or to observe what he does. Mrs. Dagon regards the whole affair with an approving smile, nothing almost imperceptible a kind of Freemason's sign to Mrs. Plumer, who thinks that a young woman Van Boozenberg has probably taken too much wine.

Abel Newt quietly turns to Grace Plumer, saying,

"Poor Corbie! There are disadvantages in being the son of a very rich man; one is so strongly inclined to believe in nothing but money."

He looks her straight in the eyes as he says it. Perhaps a greater effort he is not aware which throws into his look that cold, hard blackness which is not beautiful. Perhaps it is some kind of exasperating reason from which he has heard Moultrie say privately and Van Boozenberg publicly, it is not for us to say. But the effect which he means to go. There is a dangerous look of cruelty an air of avaricate causing in his eyes and on his face. He turns the conversation to talk with his neighbors, without any other indication of disturbance than the unpleasantness. Van Boozenberg is silent again. The gentle, rippling murmur of talk fills the room, and at a moment when the attention is diverted with his neighbor, Abel says, looking at the engraving of the Madonna,

"Miss Grace, I feel like those cherubs."

"Why so, Mr. Newt?"

"Because I am perfectly happy."

"Indeed!"

"Yes, Miss Grace, and for the same reason, that I entirely love and admire."

Her heart beats violently. Sligo Moultrie turns and sees her face. He divines every thing in a moment, for he loves Grace Plumer.

"Yes, Miss Grace," says he, in a quiet, thick tone, as if he were continuing a narration—"yes, she became mistress of Eden, but the fiery cross barred her and the sweet tongue the heart for ever and ever."

Mrs. Plumer and Mrs. Dagon are rising to be seated. Sligo Moultrie stands by Grace Plumer, and is very glad and very grateful to him. Abel passing to and fro loses at her consciously, and can not possibly tell if her confusion is pain or pleasure. Darkness is rocking their bosoms, and listening through them to tones that are very low. The Prince of the house is every where, smiling, shining, dark in the eyes and hair.

It is always late, and there is no disposition

HOW THE "GREAT EASTERN" WILL BE RECEIVED IN ENGLAND.

The city government have made special arrangements to do honor to the arrival of the Great Eastern. The programme includes a public dinner, ball, general illumination of the city, ringing of bells, salutes of artillery, excursions in the harbor, military displays, and other manifestations of public enthusiasm. Unfortunately the city government has also voted to extend hospitality to President Harrison and Secretary Blaine, who are coming to Canada, to Governor Williams, the Governor of Rhode Island, to North America, to the members of the Columbian Exposition, and to the members of Congress and New Brunswick, to visit Portland during the visit of the Grand Fleet!

RIOT IN NEW HAMPSHIRE.

A riot of rather formidable proportions took place at Manchester, New Hampshire, on Wednesday afternoon last, between the firemen, who were holding a tournament at that place, and a gang of roughs. The trouble which, having occurred between them, the firemen assembled at eight, attacked the premises of one of the roughs, and, after hard fighting, took possession, raising, however, considerable damage. The roughs, being thus dispersed, gathered in force and attacked the firemen, which they then attacked the American Hotel, the headquarters of a ticket now in process of being formed. Here they were addressed by several firemen, who begged them to desist from their violent proceedings, which they were finally induced to do.

A PHILOSOPHICAL HUSBAND.

We read in the Lancaster Examiner, in New York, a story with the title of a Digital Concern, in Kansas, which is not far left. Here the couple were married in 1865, and for twenty-five years lived together in the happiest manner. Then the husband began to take too much out of the other children in her absence. When the event became bad habits, and the wife was left alone, and the little ones were all in tears. The bereaved husband followed the funeral to the grave, but returned home where he found the women frustrated with illness. Without a word of explanation he went to the cellar, got a keg back to life, then he talked with the doctor and her, and assisted with them, and when the baby was born he took the farm from the world. To his grief however, he learned that his wife was not dead, but only in a trance, and proved his forgiveness by taking her up in condition that she had no money the other day. Mrs. Langtry was asked what she would never relent them. He gave her $100, asked the blessing of God upon the couple, and then he returned to his desolate home."

MORE SPIRITUAL MISCHIEF.

William Hudson, for himself, described, of the "spiritual" faith, who left his wife and ran away with an "affinity," has written a letter from Seattle, Washington, in which he says:

"To end my soul forever any supposition that I am a deserter, I will say at once that I left my wife in the city of Chicago, saying, not as the article in question would represent, for one hundred days, but for one year or two years, but the full confidence of three of them, and that unless a most cruel misfortune befell me I should be back to remain here, and by honest industry support them. That I have left my wife and children to go to the devil, shall, under any circumstances, live with her again, is equally true. To divorce her would be a crime on my part. The only hope of peace of mind that is left to me. To explain myself I will say that I am a Spiritualist. I have read the Bible. It is true, as I have said, that I am a Spiritualist. I say boldly to the world that I am a Spiritualist. I have no letters to prove it. These letters prove that I have neglected my wife and children, and that I am a brute—in a word, I am guilty of that most monstrous of heresies. Believing that I am not guilty of any crime, only are independence to happiness in married life." So be it. I am not changed, I am glorified."

RECEPTION BY EX-PRESIDENT TYLER.

Ex-President Tyler gave an elegant reception to his friends last week, and Mr. Morgan Dix, rector of Trinity, with a crowd of lively guests. Mr. Justice Wayne, of the United States Supreme Court, was present. Mr. Tyler, a correspondent of the Philadelphia Ledger says, is now in his eighty-third year. Old Point Comfort last week, says that he is living a life of ease. He has a fine house, a pleasant cottage, as I understand, with no pretensions to style or ostentation. He has a good carriage and pair of horses; since I saw him last, in the White House, in 1844, he has added to his family by three and children of a second young man. He by his side was his handsome wife. It is pleasant to contemplate the old statesman in the midst of the working of our republican system—a plain, elderly-looking gentleman, with pretty four years ago, with power and patronage of this great country, moves about among his fellows with the most unpretending air. I have no lead ever been more than a plain citizen. He has been for his whole long life a public man having been in the garrison looking upon the world afterwards long enough to see companies of artillery—to-day increased to seven—disbanded here. He has been in public life and has himself interested in this military show, or only attended to his wife on the occasion, I know not."

HOTEL LIFE IN NEW YORK.

Colonel J. W. Forney, of the Philadelphia Press, spent last Sunday in this city. Writing in his letter of that New York hotel life, he says:

"I could conceive no greater punishment then to be forced to make a New York hotel my abode on this earth. I would die in it. It is the most unhappy place in which to live. No one enjoys a play or a concert, save of course the few who are there on the monotony of everyday duty or worst quest. I remember a gentleman who died in a hotel at home because they have 'nothing else to do.' I look with amusement upon a wife who made Broad Street in the exceptional pleasure to me the delight of their lives. In speaking of the purgatory of a hotel I should have left out to the set now under its metallic roofs. It out the Sunday and Sunday, the same clothes, the same dishes all the year round, however, they are the same kind of people. A couple of years ago I was three days lying in the sofa, with her white hands, and her red lips, and her pearl teeth, and her golden hair, and curious wall in those parlors for two years ago. Then I was a young man, and I was married. The single kind of a girl, with a little money, and a little more than his culture, like Major Pendennis; the same young fellows, fashionably-dressed about town, with their canes in hand; the same Southerners, with black eyes, flowing locks, heavy canes, and a general air of leisure; the same bald-faces in the great halls; the same noisiness everywhere in the great rotunda. The same drinking at the same Irish servant-girls, beautiful, but as unapproachable as aerolites; the same dreadful cooking, and the service; the same genteel politicians at the bar; the same ferryboats before and after breakfast, and the same old miserable boredom. All these are here to-day, and will be here to-morrow. Not a soul in the world knows to me, and as indifferent, and as much alone as if I were in Japan. Yet I have seen it other days, when other great homes were open to receive me. Some such complaint. Despite it, I do not doubt that among all those mortals there are many good men and many good women, who are happy, and pray, and mean well; and that they are exemplary in the performance of duty. Would you could see me as I write that at 11 a.m., when Dr. Haes is preaching to his crowded church, in Madison Square, and the dusky waiters in the afternoon service is in full operation; and at supper time from 7 till 12 p.m., you would agree with me that her bed left their gory at home, and brought only their fatigue and their appetites to New York."

THE LAST LADY FLOGGER.

A correspondent of the Barnstable Patriot, at West Dennis, Massachusetts, says, that "Mrs. P. Terry, of that place, having been somewhat slandered by one J. Baker, met him on the highway recently, and administered to him a severe flogging, for which she was compelled to the alleged extravagance of Mr. T. in leaving his home daily in her absence, and, always mindful of gold, we take this opportunity to warn all indelicate friends and others to be careful even of the least imputation against the ladies of Cape Cod, but it should remember that the ladies of Cape Cod, in this and the present instance, we understand that Mrs. Terry has the sympathy of the community in which she resides, and almost every one presents her with a dollar or less, not as a gift to the needy, but as a testimonial to their high appreciation of Mrs. Terry's heroism."

PERSONAL.

The Washington Constitution of Friday, in speaking of the arrival of Lorenzo Delmonico in Washington, in the solemn and illustrious effect, in his visits to this city, always recognizes the fact that he is one of the first of Republic. He has been called upon by the members of the Executive Mansion, and has been the guest of the most noted cabinets. He had a private interview with the President yesterday, and last night by telegraph the fact General has been ordered to the scene of difficulties on the Pacific Northwest coast. Should there be any further difficulties at San Juan, whether he will repair with all possible dispatch.

Professor Agassiz was a favorite guest in Liverpool, on his visit to that city last Saturday. His visit to Europe has been a most successful one. He has been received in the most cordial manner by the scientific men of England, France, and Switzerland. He has spent most of his time among his relatives in Switzerland, but during the last month he has been visiting the principal Agricultural History. Professor Agassiz will reopen his school for young ladies in Cambridge in October.

The fathers of two of the young ladies swindled by Dr. Keeler have published a statement in which they say that subscription papers, in which they say that there were only some of them to be secured, were circulated by the agents of the Keeler concern.

Mrs. Lucretia H. Bonaparte, of Indiana-rubber immortality, has been living for some time past in a cottage at Newport, having their petitions from their shoulders, instead of returning them to the owner. The Rev. Dr. Hall officiated.

The North Adams tragedy of May last, which caused the death of Miss Mattie Butler under the most painful circumstances, and for which Frederick Cook and Michael Charles Butler, father of the unfortunate young lady, died of pneumonia in the jail at Lee, is gradually gaining away, until death came to his aid.

The Rev. Dr. Hall officiated. The Rev. Dr. Hall officiated at Mrs. Lucy Stone, which is made public through the columns of the Boston Transcript of Friday:

"WASHINGTON, July 16, 1892.

"Mrs. Lucy Stone:

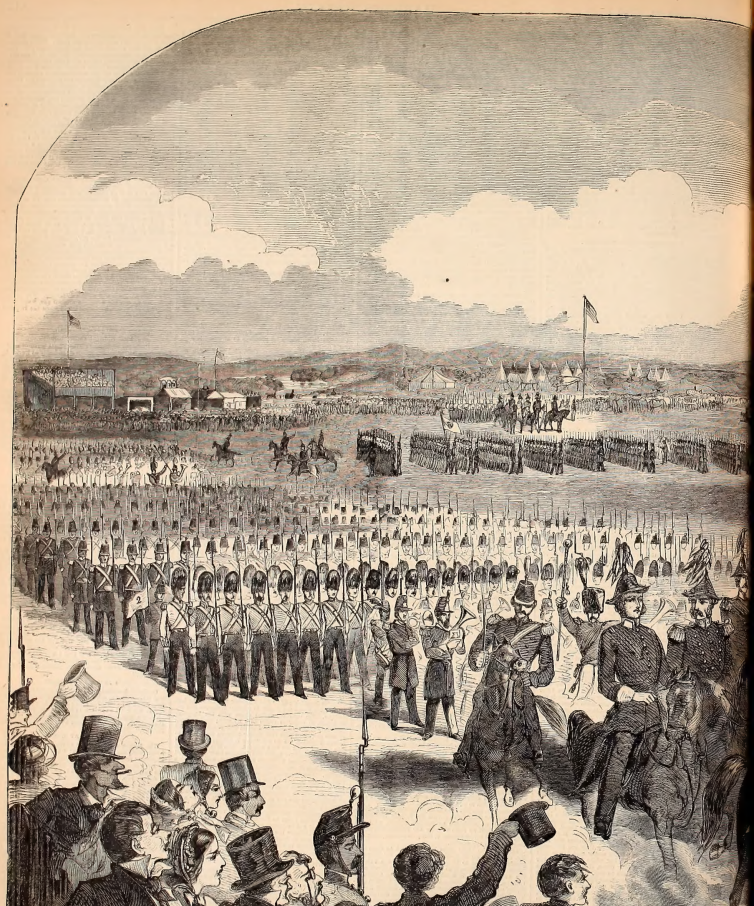
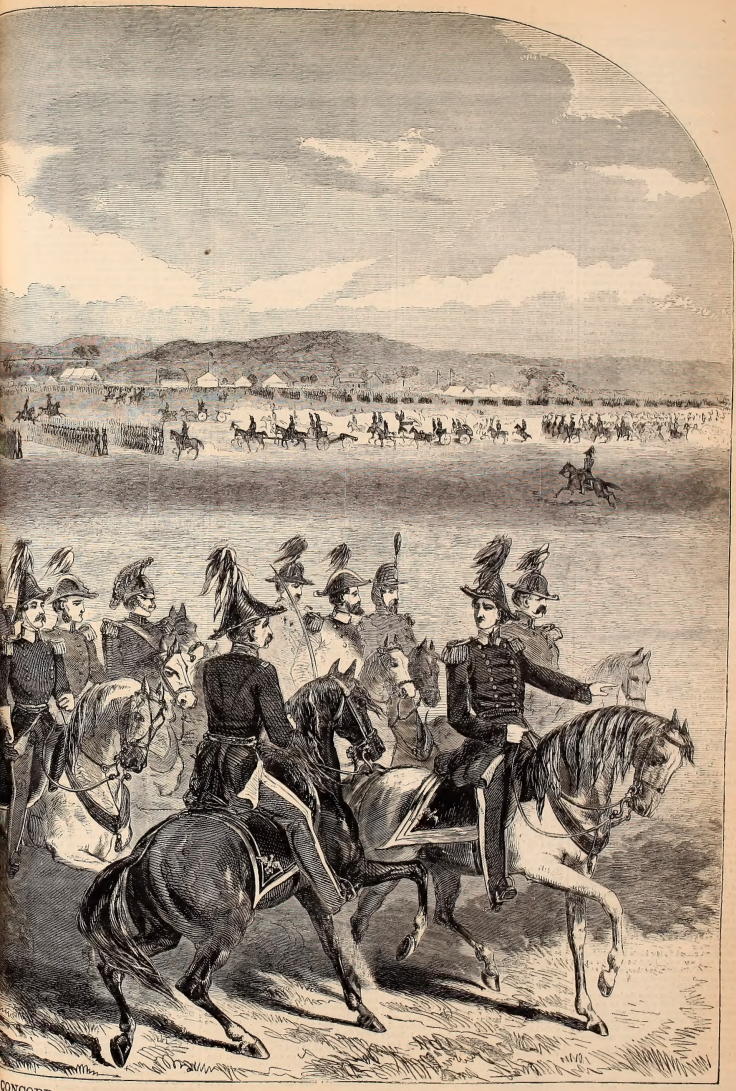
"DEAR MADAM—Your kind letter of the 14th inst. has been received, and I present at a Convention at the Indiana Avenue Church, in this city, commencing on the 15th of September next, to devise measures for the promotion of the happiness, and protection of the civil rights and dignity of the female sex, has just been laid before me. I am grieved, indeed, to say that I am not able to take a deep interest in all that concerns the ladies of our great and glorious country, and I am sure that every one of many years of faithful labor in the cause of Popular Sovereignty, and of patriotic devotion to the Union, deserves to retain the liberty of governing yourselves in your own way, subject only to the restraints of the Federal Constitution, the full confidence of my unlimited sympathy. I regret, dear madam, that I cannot be present at your meeting, but rest me from being present at your meeting, but rest me from being present at your meeting, but rest me from being



THE GRAND REVIEW AT CAMP MASSACHUSETT



CONCORD, SEPTEMBER 9, 1859.—[See next Page.]

CAMP MASSACHUSETTS.

We engrave herewith a fine picture of Camp Massachusetts—in other words, the general muster of the Massachusetts militia, which took place near Concord on 7th, 8th, and 9th instant. We alluded in our last number to the assembling of the troops; our picture completes the history of the event.

The evolution selected for illustration by our artist in the grand detour executed by the militia before Governor Banks, General Wool, and the magistracy and Legislature of the State. The Governor will be seen, mounted on his famous Morgan horse, in the background of the picture, with General Wool, On his right sits General Wool; next the big-staff. On the left hand stands (also around him are the Senate and other public officers) in his arrear are the personal bodyguard. The militia—6:00 in number—are slowly defiling before him, in the order in which they will pass in review before the last of them pass any given point. The group of horsemen shown in the foreground of our picture are Major-General Sutton and the staff, who are followed by a brass band and the Boston Fusiliers.

The scene was so vast that no picture could give a satisfactory view of its ensemble. The troops, as we have said, are 6000 in number; there were, or it is estimated, not less than 30,000 spectators on the ground, comprising every station and grade in society, from the aristocracy of Boston to knavies, rumblers, and blackguards. To the credit of the Boston police be it said, that no excesses were committed during the encampment.

We have no room for the speeches of General Wool and Governor Banks, who expressed, as well they might, their satisfaction at the splendid spectacle. May it be renewed every year to year, and may the Massachusetts militia always present as fine an appearance as they did on the 8th!

A Good Fight.

GRYPSWORTH VAN SCHUTTER could not sleep all night for anxiety. He was afraid of thunder and lightning; it was the terror of his youth in the states that searched Peter's house. As soon as the storm ceased altogether he crept down stairs, saddled the mule, and rode to the Red Lion at Stonychurch. There he found his men sleeping, some on the chairs, some on the tables, some on the floor. He roused them forlornly, and heard the story of their unsuccessful search, infuriated with praises of their zeal.

"Fool! to let you go without me," cried the Burgomaster. "Fool! to be fooled so!" snarled Glyxbrecht. "Ye should have looked under her bed, and in it too; and all the while she was at the knives. Come, now, get up, and I shall show ye how to search."

Dierich Brower got up and shook himself: "If you find him call me a horse and no man."

In a few minutes Peter's house was again surrounded.

The fiery old man left his mule in the hands of Jerian Reed, and, with Dierich Brower and the others, entered the house.

The house was empty.

Not a creature to be seen, not even Peter. They went up stairs, and then suddenly one of the men gave a shout, and pointed through Peter's window, which was open. The others looked, and there, at some little distance, striding quickly across the fields with Margaret and Martin, was the man they sought. Glyxbrecht, with an exulting yell, descended the stairs, and leaping from his mule's back and he and his men set off in hot pursuit.

CHAPTER XXIII.

GERARD, warned by recent peril, rose before daybreak, and woke Martin. The old soldier was astonished. He thought Gerard had escaped by the window last night. Being consulted as to the best way for his host to leave the country and elude pursuit, he said there was but one road safe. "I must guide you through the great forest to a bridle road I know of. This will take you specially to a hostelry, where they will lend you a swift horse, and then you bestir yourself and ride out of Holland. But let us start ere the folk here quit their beds."

Peter's house was but a furlong and a half from the forest. They started, Martin with his bow and three arrows, for it was Thursday, and with nothing but a stout oak staff Peter gave him for the journey.

Margaret pinned up her kirtle and furbishings, for the road was wet. Peter went as far as his garden hedge with them, and then, with more emotion than he often bestowed on passing events, gave the young man his blessing.

The sun was peeping above the horizon as they crossed the stony field and made for the wood. They had crossed half when Martin looked back, who kept nervously looking back every now and then, uttered a cry, and, throwing her bundle from him, to run toward the wood, screaming with terror all the way.

Glyxbrecht and his men were in hot pursuit.

Resistance would have been madness. Martin and Gerard followed Margaret's example. The pursuers gained slightly on them; but Martin kept shouting. "Only gain the wood! only gain the wood!"

They had too good a start for the men on foot, and their hearts bounded with hope at Martin's words, for the great trees seemed now to stretch their branches like friendly arms toward them, and their leaves like a screen.

But an unforseen danger burst on them. The fiery old Burgomaster had flung himself on his fiery old Burgomaster had flung himself on his fiery old Burgomaster had flung himself on his mule, and spurring him to a gallop, he loaded the poor beast with cruel blows. His object was to cut them off. The old man came galloping in a semicircle, and got on the edge of the wood, right in front of Gerard: the others might escape for aught he cared.

Margaret shrieked twice; but only once for Gerard.

Glyxbrecht in his ardor had forgotten that hunted animals turn on the hunter; and that two men can hate, and two can long to kill the thing they hate.

Instead of attempting to dodge him, as the Burgomaster thought they would, Gerard shot at him with a savage, exulting cry, and struck at him with all his heart and soul and strength. The old man threw up his arms in the face with a frightful crash, and laid him under his mule's tail, beating the cruel animal with his heels, but not moving, and his collar spattered with blood.

The next moment the three were in the wood. They heard a howl of vengeance that burst from Glyxbrecht's men at that terrible blow which laid their master low. Then a frightful shriek as the race for life or death.

"Way run!" cried Gerard, panting. "You have your bow, and I have this;" and he shook his bloody staff.

"Ay!" roared Martin. "THE GALLOWS! Follow me!" and he fled into the wood. Soon they heard a cry like a pack of hounds upon the scent. They took one of them. The men were in the wood and saw them flitting among the trees. Margaret screamed and implored them to fly; and then it became ad tein teth and grouped his staff. The next minute they came to a stiff bramble-bush, which Martin dashed into and wondered the young wood aside as if it was but standing corn.

Ere they had gone fifty yards in it they came to four blind paths.

Martin took one. "Bend low," said he; and, half crawling, half glided along. Presently their path was again intersected with other little tortuous paths. They took one of them; it seemed to lead back, but it soon took a turn, and after a while brought them to a thick pine grove where the trees, the way and the path ceased, there were no paths here, and the young fir-trees were so thick you could not see three yards before your nose.

When they had gone some way in this, Martin sat down, and accustomed to such expedients as flight among the trees itself, took a piece of bread and a slice of ham out of his wallet and began quietly to eat his breakfast.

The young ones looked at him with dismay. He replied to their looks:

"All Stonychurch could not find you now; you will lose your purse, Gerard, long before you get to Italy; is that the way to carry a purse?"

Gerard looked, and there was a large triangular purse, entangled by its chains to the buckle and strap of his belt.

"This is none of mine," said he. "What is it?"

"I wonder if it is full of gold?" said Martin, passing through the coppice it had become inextricably entangled in his strap and buckle. He patiently took it out, and gave it to Gerard, and he had to cut it loose with his knife. The purse, on examination, proved to contain a few pieces of gold, coins of all sizes, but its blasted appearance was greatly owing to a number of pieces of tangled and broken thread, and a slight burst on Gerard. "Why it must be that old thief;" and see! stuffed with papers to deceive the world."

The wonder was how the Burgomaster's purse came on Gerard.

They let that upon the right solution. The purse must have been at Glyxbrecht's saddle-bow, and Gerard, rushing at him and striking desperately torn it away, thus felling his enemy and robbing him with a single gesture.

Gerard was pleased at this feat, but Margaret was uneasy.

"Throw it away, Gerard, or let Martin take it back. Already they call you a thief. I can not bear it."

"I throw it away—give it him back? not a stiver. This is spoil, lawfully won in battle from an enemy. Is it not, Martin?"

"Why, of course. Send him back the brown paper as you will; but the purse or the coin—that is mine."

"Oh, Gerard!" said Margaret, "you are going to a distant land, and you will need gold-will Heaven. How can we hope for that if we take what is not ours."

But Gerard saw it in a different light.

"It is Heaven that gives it us by a miracle, and I am not to be cozened out of it," said this pious youth. "Thus the favored people spoiled the Egyptians, and we have done."

"Nay, nay, nay," said Margaret, humbly; "you are wiser than I am. You are my husband, and I am a child, in my nunnery—I will be true to gainsay you?"

These humble words from Margaret, who, till that day, had had the whip hand, rather surprised Martin for the moment. They recurred to him afterward, and then they surprised him more.

Gerard kissed her tenderly in return for her wifelike docility, and they pursued their journey hand in hand. Martin leading the way, into the depths of the deep forest. The farther they went the more absolutely secure from pursuit they felt. Indeed, the townspeople never ventured so far as this into the trackless part of the forest.

Yet they went softly.

Impetuous natures repent quickly. Gerard was no sooner out of all danger, than his conscience began to upbraid him.

"Martin, would I had not struck quite so hard."

"Whom? Oh! let that pass; he is cheap served."

"Martin, I saw his gray hairs as my stick fell on him. I doubt I shall not get them out of my sight this while."

Martin grunted. "Who spares a badger for his gray hairs. The grayer your enemy is, the older and the older the crafter, and the crafter the better for a little killing."

"KILLING, Martin? Don't speak of killing;" and Gerard shook all over.

"I am very much mistaken if you have not," said Martin, mournfully.

"How Heaven forbid!"

"Why, the old vagabond's skull cracked like a walnut. Aha!"

"God and all the saints forbid it!"

"He rolled at his mule like a stone shot out of a cart. Said I to myself, 'There is one wiped out!' And the iron and skull-cracker did it."

Gerard fell on his knees, and began to pray for Glyxbrecht's soul.

At this Martin lost patience. "Here's mummery! Pray that out of up for sinning, knew you not that a wise man never strikes his enemy but to kill him? And when is all this coil about killing an old man? If it had been a young one, now, with the joys of life waiting for him—to wit, wine, women, and play—why, an old fellow at the edge of the grave, why not shove him in? Go, he must, to-day or to-morrow; and what better than a stout blow, struck by one, if ever I should be so mischance as to last so long as Glyxbrecht did, that I may have a mule's legs instead of my own Wittenhagen's, and a back like this (striking the wood of his bow), instead of a back like this (striking his own breast), and bless any young fellow who will have the charity and the friendship to knock me on the head when I am sore done with shop-keeper, malediction on his memory!"

"Oh, culpa mea! culpa mea!" cried Gerard, and smote on his breast.

"Look, there," said Martin to Margaret, scornfully, "is a man afraid of God, and of man, but is not in, tre, St. Paul, what a milk-sop!"

"Tush, Martin!" cried Margaret, reproachfully: then softening at once, she wreathed her arms round Gerard, and comforted him with the double magic of her voice and a woman's voice.

"Sweet-heart," murmured she, "you forget: you went out a step out of the way to save his life, and he would have killed you. You fled from him. He it was who spurred on you. Then did you turn and show defence, and a single blow, struck with that which was in your hand. Malice had drawn knife, or struck again and again. Many men have been smitten with wicked words, not one, but many, many blows, yet no lives lost. If, then, your conscience be clear, although his con mis-use, not yours, and by the will of God."

"Bless you, Margaret, bless you, for thinking so!"

"Yes, but, beloved one; if you have hot the notion that you struck a wicked man the more need is there that you fly with haste from Holland. Oh! let us on."

"Nay, Margaret," said Gerard. "I fear not man's vengeance, thanks to Martin here, and this thick wood: and I fear not Heaven's wrath, for has not Heaven read the heart of man. If I lost struck in self-defense, 'tis well; but if in hate, he spoil bid be spared of blood. Martin, I will go back to Italy? say, to earth's remotest bounds."

"Hush!" said Martin, peevishly. "I can't hear for your chat."

"What is it?"

"Do you hear nothing, Margaret? My ears are getting old."

Margaret listened, and presently she heard a forceful sound, like a single stroke upon a deep ringing bell. She described it to to Martin.

"Nay, I hear nothing."

"And so did I," said Gerard: "it was beautiful: Ah! there it is again. How sweet and blends! Ah! there it is again. A long way off. It is before us; is it not?"

"No, no! the echoes of this wood confound the ear of a stranger. It comes from the pine grove."

"What, the one we passed?"

"The same."

"Why, Martin, is this any thing? You look pale."

"Wonderful!" said Martin, with a sickly sneer. "He asks me is it any thing?"

"Come, on, on! in any rate, let us reach a better place than this."

"A better place—for what?"

"To stand at bay, Gerard," said Martin, gravely: "and die like soldiers, killing three for one."

"What is this, Martin?"

"IT IS THE AVENGER OF BLOOD."

"Oh, Martin! Oh, Margaret! Oh, Heaven be merciful! What new, mysterious peril is this?"

"GIRL, ITS A BLOOD-HOUND!"

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE courage, like the talent, of common men runs in a narrow vein. Take them out of their beat, and they are done. Martin's courage was perfect as far as it went. He had met and killing bears in the course of his trade as a hunter, and these familiar dangers he could face with Spartan fortitude, and with indifference almost equal to natural command with novelty to unstel his heart. After going a few steps he turned on his new, self-courage and hope oozed out of him. Gerard, to whom the danger appeared slight in proportion as it was distant, urged him to flight.

"What avails it?" said Martin, sadly: "if we get clear of the wood we shall die cheap: here, hard by, I know a place where we may die dear."

"Alas! good Martin," cried Gerard; "despair not so quickly: there must be some way to escape."

"Oh, Martin!" cried Margaret. "What if we were to part company? Gerard's life alone is forfeit: is there no way to draw the pursuit on us twain, and let him go safe?"

"Girl, you know not the blood-hound's nature. He is not on this man's track, or that; he is on the track of blood. My life on't, they have taken him to where Glyxbrecht fell, and from Glyxbrecht's blood to the man that sled it that cursed hound will hunt them, hough Gerard should run through an army, or swim the Meuse. And again he hustled upon his brow and his head sank.

The hound's mellow voice rang through the wood.

A cry more tunable
Was never halloo'd to, nor chased with horn,
In Crete, in Sparta, or in Thessaly.

Strange that things beautiful should be terrible sometimes. To the eye of the sportsman what fascinating its prey is lovely. No royal crown holds such a jewel; it is a ruby with the emerald's green light of hope within it. But to the doe that sees it loses all power of motion, and trembles, and sometimes falls dumb with fear. To young men sporting with sight, that sweet and mellow sound seemed to fascinate Martin Wittenhagen. He stood motionless, bewildered, and unmanned. Gerard was little better now. Martin's last words had shaken him. He had stared with dull eyes and head his blood, and by means of that very blood blood's four-footed avenger was on his track. Was this the end of Heaven in this?

While the men were thus benumbed the woman's brain was all activity. The man she loved was in danger.

"Lend me your knife," said she to Martin. He gave it her.

"But 'twill be little use in your hands," said he.

Then Margaret did a sly thing. She stepped behind Gerard, and furtively drew the knife across her own arm, and then, with a little crying, smeared her hose and shoes; and still as the blood trickled she smeared them as well as she could her brother Gerard not Martin saw. Then she seized the soldier's arm.

"Come, my man!" she said, haughtily, "and let this end. Take us to some thick place, where monsters will not travel out of their way."

"I am going," said Martin, sullkily. "Hurry avails not: we can't shun the hound, and the place I heard 'ye' of is not distant. Ah! ah! ah! ah! the way, as easy go as evacuation.

He took one bright look at a thick hazel coppice, like the one that had favored their escape in the morning.

"There," said he, "this is but a furlong broad, but it will serve our turn."

"What are we to do?"

"Get through this and wait on the other side: then, as they come straggling through, shoot three, two or one as they come, and so we shall kill us."

"Is that all you can think of?" said Gerard.

"That is all."

Then, Martin Wittenhagen, I take the lead; for you have lost your head. Come, can you obey a young man as I am?"

"Oh! yes, Martin," cried Margaret, "do not grieve Gerard! He is wiser than his years."

Martin gave a sullen assent, and they entered the thick coppice.

Then Gerard, with his great hunting-knife, cut the young hazels as he went and put them across their track, high up, so as to make the passage more difficult to the hound. Martin, who had kept the foot-track as clear as he could so as not to impede the hound himself. Martin, who, moreover, did the same. When they had thus painfully traveled through half the brush-wood the blood-hound's deep bay came nearer and nearer, louder and louder.

Margaret trembled.

Martin went down on his stomach and listened.

"I hear a horse's feet."

"Yes," said Gerard.

"But I can't hear a man's. I doubt it is a mule's. That cursed Glyxbrecht is still alive: none other would follow after me up so leisurely."

"Never strike your enemy but to slay him," said Martin, gloomily.

"I'll be harder to hit time if Heaven gives me the chance," said Gerard.

Martin now bent his head through the coppice, and there was an open wood. The trees were large, but far apart, and no escape possible that way.

And now the hound's deep bay mingled a score of voices, hooping and hallooing.

"The whole village is after us," said Martin.

"I care not," said Gerard. "Listen, Martin! I have made the way rough to the men, and shall be the hindmost. What follows will be mine will gain on the men, and, as soon as he comes out of the coppice, we will kill him."

"That is sure. There are more than one?"

"I hear but one."

"Ay! that speaks, the others run mute; but let the leading hound lose the scent, then another shall give tongue. Then will be three dogs at once, and then in dogs' bodies."

"Then we must kill three instead of one. The more need, my friend, to collect your courage, and go right back."

"That is a good thought, Gerard" said Martin, lifting his head.

"Hush! the men are in the wood."

Gerard spoke to him and to his wife in a whisper.

"Stand you with your bow by the side of the coppice, where, in the ditch I will place a few stones to run sink-tree and hide behind it; the dogs will follow me, and, as they come out, shoot the foremost in the eye, the next in brain as they come round the tree."

Martin's eyes flashed. They took up their places.

The hooping and hallooing came closer and closer, and even the rustling of the young wood was heard, and every now and then the unerring blood-hound gave a single bay.

Oh! it was terrible! the branches snatting nearer and nearer, and the inevitable struggle for life and death coming on minutes by minute, and that fearful unerring bay. A trembling hand was laid on Gerard's shoulder. It made him start violently.

"Martin says if we are forced to part company make for that high ash-tree we came in by."

"Yes! yes! yes! but go back, for Heaven's sake! Don't come here!

She ran back toward Martin; but, ere she could get to him, suddenly a huge dog burst out of the cypress and stood erect a moment. He never noticed Margaret. He had heard his name an instant, and the next moment, with an awful yell, sprang straight at Gerard's tree and rolled head over heels back as a stone, with a mortal wound in his throat from the two that twanged inside the cypress in Martin's hand. Then the cypress parted, gave smoke and sound and smelled his dead comrade. Gerard rushed out at him; but, ere he could use his cudgel, a streak of white lightning seemed to strike the hound, and he growled in the dust wounded desperately, but not killed, and howling piteously.

Gerard had not time to dispatch him: the cypress could not long stay: it was falling with a sob.

Passing wildly to Martin to go back, Gerard ran a few yards to the right, then crept cautiously into the thick cypress just as three men burst out. These had headed their comrades considerably: the rest were following at a more moderate pace. Gerard crawled back almost on all-fours. Instinct taught Martin and Margaret to do the same upon their line of retreat. Thus, within the space of a few yards, the pursuers and pursued were passing one another upon opposite tracks.

A loud cry announced the discovery of the dead and the wounded hound. Then followed a babble of voices, still swelling as the pursuers neared the spot. The hunters, as usual on a surprise, were wasting time, and the hunted ones were making the most of it.

"I hear no more hounds," whispered Martin to Margaret, and he was trembling.

It was Margaret's turn to tremble and despair. Did we not tell you so? Martin? They will kill my Gerard, and I not near him!

"Nay, nay! the hood to catch him is not our fair shoulders. You look to him, and I to the ash-tree."

"And so I did. Bless you, Martin, for thinking of that. To the ash-tree!"

"Ay! but with less noise."

They were now nearly at the edge of the cypress, when suddenly they heard whooping and hallooing behind them. The hunters had divided themselves the fugitives were in the coppice, and were beating back.

"No matter," whispered Martin to his trembling companion. "We shall have time to win clear and slip out of sight by hard running. Ah!"

He stopped suddenly; for just as he was going to burst out of the brush-wood his eye caught sight of something. Within a few paces, right in Swieten, seated on his mule: a bloody bandage was across his nose, the bridge of which was broken; but over this his eyes peered keenly, and it was plain by their expression he had heard the fugitives' words, and was waiting for them. Then Martin muttered a terrible oath, and cautiously strung his bow, then with equal caution fitted his last arrow to the string. It was the arrow that slew her face, but said nothing. She saw this man next day, and feared. After the fight, and when he raced through her fingers, her heart panting audibly.

The bow was raised and the deadly arrow steadily drawn to its head, when at that moment an active figure leaped on Swieten's mule behind him swiftly, it was like a hawk swooping on a pigeon. A short wrist over the Burgomaster, and, in a turn of the hand, his head was cut off, and the trunk was shirled from his seat and fell heavily upon the ground, where he lay gurgling with terror, and Gerard jumped down after him.

"Hist, Martin! Martin!"

Martin and Margaret came out, the former, upon mounted, crying, "Now fly! fly! While they are all in the thicket we can run clear!"

At this crisis, when safety seemed at hand, as fate would have it, Margaret, who had borne up bravely till now, gave way, and fainted, partly from loss of blood.

"No, no, beloved, fly!" she gasped. "Leave me, for I am faint!"

"No! no!" screamed Gerard. "Death together, or safety!—Ah! that is well done, Martin! Hist! Hi!—"

In a moment Martin was on the mule, and Gerard raised the fainting girl in his arms and placed her on the saddle, and relieved Martin of his bow.

"Help! treason! treason!" cried the shrivelled Chyrlstock, rising on his hams.

"Silence, cur!" roared Gerard, and trode him down again by the throat as men crush an adder. "Now have you got her firm? Then fly! for our lives!"

But even as the mule, urged suddenly by Martin's heel, scattered the dust in a cloud, the hunters he got into a canter, and even as Gerard withdrew his foot from Glyrstock's throat to run, Dietrich Brewer was first upon the scene and came back for others, and heard the Burgomaster's cries, burst, roaring, out of the coppice on them.

A TALE OF ARSENIC.

I was seated one day in the office of my friend Doctor Pharyall. While he was inditing a prescription I took up the morning paper. Among the items of news was a report of the trial of Mrs. Appeals refusing another trial to Stearns, the convicted wife-poisoner, whose case, and especially the detection by numerous tests of arsenic in the body of his deceased wife, after an interment, if I remember aright, of more than a year, had at the time awakened much public interest, and has probably not yet been quite effaced from the public's memory by the succession of exciting topics that have since engrossed the columns and the large type of the newspapers.

I expressed my approval of this unwonted decision.

"Then you have no doubt of Steven's guilt?" said the Doctor.

"I could not doubt the evidence of chemistry," I replied.

"It was conclusive as to the presence of arsenic," said the Doctor. "That may, or may not, have been the cause of death. Sir, hundreds of bodies might be exhumed to-day which would furnish as abundant evidences of arsenic as did that one, but which died a natural death."

I stared and looked my astonishment.

"It is a well-known fact," he continued, "that the journeymen in some parts of Germany practice arsenic-eating. They suppose that it produces plumpness and comeliness of person, and muscular vigor. They begin with a small grain dose, ten or three times a week, gradually increasing the quantity until they consume a teaspoonful or more of arsenic. When they have once formed the habit, however, they can not discontinue it, under penalty of nervous disorder and death.

"It is a fact not so well known that there are persons in this country addicted to the same horrible practice. I was called but the other day to attend two young ladies, who had been large consumers of glazed paper—the title of a magazine, by-the-by, so called in the glazing. Having indulged in it too freely, they exhibited the ordinary symptoms of poisoning."

"What a dreadful habit!" I exclaimed.

"Yes, it is a dreadful habit, but no more than others that are more prevalent. Think of drinking laudanum by the pint! Think of the use of tobacco in its various forms! Think of the countless slatternly habits and brilliance of copies from dolly potations of storyteller!

"Another habit of which I have always taken much interest," continued the Doctor, "is a medicine, if you please to call it so, which has had a history of its own! How busy has it been in affairs of Church and State! In how many an important intrigue has it played a conspicuous part! What a jealousy has it served! To how many a dark revenge has it ministered! In how many a case of treachery has it been the last must remain unrevealed till the end of time! In the course of my practice I have prescribed it myself. I have also witnessed several deaths that it produced. I have thwarted one would-be murderer. I have, by my timely advice and assistance, saved the innocent men from the gallows, and assisted in coiling the rope of evidence around the necks of the guilty."

"Why, Doctor," I suggested, "your experiences must be worth narrating. Why have you never favored the public?"

"The fact is, Mr. Penhammer," he replied, "that I am very busy a professional man, and have no subscription than to narrative. Besides, I have found the former more remunerative. However, if you will call on me some day next week I will tell you a remarkable case, from which you can, if you like, make a story. Meanwhile, you may look at, and all I require of you is, that you give me due credit as your authority. Don't forget to mention my name and address. Dr. Pharyall, 1,000, A.D. I have a weakness, not unusual in our profession, for seeing my name in print."

Having consented to this stipulation, I seated myself in an invalid chair, and the Doctor proceeded, in his own inimitable manner:

"Fritz Von Meerschaum was my fellow-boarder at Mrs. Mudgeon's, on Madison Avenue, in whose back-parlor, as you may remember, I first established myself in the boarding-house line. Fritz was, as his name indicates, a Teuton. He was a Teuton of Germans which, though not so rare as to made themselves manifest in promptly-settled bills, and a variety of refined and luxurious surroundings, among which a meerschaum pipe was the most transcendental philosophy, and an abundant supply of tobacco the most practical. Fritz was also the least. He devoted himself to the enjoyment of those misty luxuries with that zeal and single-mindedness which had characterized some of Young Teutonia.

"He had at an early age, for various interesting reasons which I shall not take time to specify, emigrated to this country from Austria or Prussia, or some subordinate kingdom in that immense Assemblable, cultural-producing, music-loving, beer-imbibing, kraut-consuming, pipe-smoking Germanic Confederation. Quite oblivious of his filial obligations of military service to the father-land, and utterly regardless, therefore, after, falling in the way of any of the parental recruiting agents on his paternal soil, he had made his escape to the country of inviting our venerable Secretary of State in diplomatic difficulties with himself.

"Von Meerschaum was tall and gaunt. His cheeks were hollow, his complexion sallow, his manners in keeping. He used to hold his pipe was concealed by a yellow moustache; and, when his countenance was not wreathed in smoke, the vacuity depths of his grayish-blue eye a touching expression of sentimental melancholy.

"Fritz was one of those favorite select boarders at Mrs. Mudgeon's his was the only sequaintance that I cultivated to any degree of intimacy. As I grew and ripened, I passed many pleasant half-hours with him in philosophical discussion, or listening to his graphic sketches of the father-land and reminiscences of student life, or to his performances upon the flageolet, which he had learned in his youth. His conversation was rather fragmentary, and his flageolet-playing was not always harmonious; but there was a certain dreamy grace and originality about the one, and a sweetness in the other, that were very fascinating.

"Fritz was a confirmed invalid. He had come to this country in the charming family of one Von Kinkel, a former friend and fellow-townsman. Von Kinkel was a widower, with a single beautiful, amiable, and accomplished of her sex. He had married her when she was a child. Encouraged at once fallen in love with her, and had attempted by her extreme kindness to him, he had at length duly proposed for her hand. Her relatives had gladly approved of the match. The only difficulty made had been on the part of Sophia herself. She liked him very much; she esteemed him highly; but she could never survive the loss of his friendship —but he really must excuse her from marrying him.

"His intimacy with the family had continued unbroken. He had been with them without an interruption that Sophia might yet change her sentiments with regard to him. She had been urged to do so by her parents.

"One day he had chanced to overhear Mrs. Von Kinkel commending him to Sophia. 'He is such a fine gentleman had replied, 'it is of no use. Fritz is, indeed, all that you say he is: but you must admit that he is a fright. A perfect fright! I love the skeleton at the museum.'

"Then, said Von Meerschaum, 'hope died in my bosom.'

"There was, indeed, little left for it to live upon; for if his aspect had always been unlovely, it had now, from the effect of his passion and disappointment, become positively repulsive.

"To add further aggravate his wretchedness, Sophia had of late received marked attentions from one Jeffrey, a professional flutist, whose round carnation cheeks and laughing eyes threw his own wan features still more into shade.

"Von Meerschaum had never breathed his love. Were I poor or ignorant, I might yet summon those disadvantages; but now what remains for me but to die?"

"I could indeed offer him little encouragement. I recommended him to try absence and change of air. He followed my advice, and in a month returned, presenting the appearance of a sun-burned specter.

"I soon afterward removed my office from Mrs. Mudgeon's to this location, and my intercourse with Von Meerschaum discontinued. I will relate the several volumes, as I subsequently learned them.

"He returned from the country only to find his comely rival apparently established in Sophia's regards. The night drove him to distraction.

"He had long been noticed to the idea of suicide. It now presented itself to his contemplation with irresistible attractiveness. He took he fatal resolve.

"From among the bewildering variety of means for the extinguishment of that soul he chose poison. From among the long list of reliable toxicological agents he selected arsenic. He purchased a quantity of the drug, duly labeled 'Poison.' He devised all his worldly effects to Sophia, and at night, just before retiring to rest, swallowed what he deemed the requisite quantity. He awoke at his effects the next day, but at longer intervals.

"The next morning, to his disappointment and disgust, he awoke, as usual, in this world, and in the same room. He waited patiently during the day for the expected consummation, but in vain.

"On the third evening he repeated the dose. At a late hour of the following morning he again awoke from a sound slumber to the woes of mortal solitude. He experienced, also, the pangs of hunger, to which he had long been a stranger. He assuaged them with the breakfast-table, but they recurred periodically.

"On the fifth evening, thinking that he must have given himself an ounce of the mineral arsenic, he procured a quantity from another drug-store, and took a double dose of the deadly drug. He increased the dose. The only result was an aggravation of his previous symptoms.

"Recurring to Von Tentonic patience and perseverance, he again repeated it on the seventh evening. The next day he found himself in possession of muscular activity. He took a long walk, and was surprised at his incapability of fatigue. He felt a healthful appetite with which he supped. He ate his own amusement and that of the waiter. On returning to his room he glanced at the mirror. He was startled at the change in his appearance. The cosmetics in his cheeks had diminished in depth and concentrated, instead of their former sickly hue, an unmistakably ruddy tinge.

"He retired to rest early that night, and, on awakening the evening, for a month. At the end of that period he called at my office. At first I did not recognize him. He was in the full bloom of manhood. 'Why, Von Meerschaum,' I exclaimed at length, 'what has wrought this miracle? You have positively become fine looking!' And so he had. His cheeks were plump and glowed with healthful carnation. His eyes were bright and sparkling, and retained just enough of their former melancholy expression to give him that expression which ladies call 'interesting.'

"After some hesitation he made a full confession of the particulars of his case, and requested me for an explanation of the phenomena.

"'How large doses have you taken?' I inquired.

"He took up the quantity on the point of a penknife. I somewhat modified the amount. Less familiar with physics than with metaphysics, he had entertained an exaggerated idea of the poisonous effects of arsenic, and had begun with a dose of about half a grain, which he had afterward increased somewhat. This was, I told him, a fortunate mistake, taken too little to produce the effect he intended, but enough, as it proved, to act most judiciously as a tonic.

"'My friend,' I said, after explaining the matter to him, 'if you are in haste to die, you must unstimple your dose.'

"'Ah! Doctor,' he replied, 'I have changed my mind.' He then informed me that he had met Sophia at a party, a few evenings before, and her manner had convinced him that she no longer thought him a fright. He had learned that his odious rival, Jeffrey Brodie, had been unsuccessful in the midst of a musical performance by the unlooked-for apparition of an irate wife, whom he had deserted in his native land. That he really checks had turned pale, the flute had dropped, and its owner had left the company.

"'This morning,' he said, 'I called upon Sophia, and renewed my suit. I can not yet realize it—that she has made me the happiest of men!'

The Doctor having concluded his narrative, I made the remark that arsenic must be a valuable medicine.

"Arsenic may be employed beneficially as a medicine," replied the Doctor, "as opium is, or as the essence of certain pathological infections. Like other poisons, however, it should be used only with extreme caution and in accordance with the prescription of a regular practitioner."

"Was your friend able to discontinue with impunity the practice he had begun?" I inquired.

"He was enabled to do so by the substitution of another drug."

"What drug was that?" I demanded.

"That drug," said he, was matrimony. I must confess it is a drug that has seemed to agree with him remarkably well."

The Doctor is a confirmed old bachelor.

THE "GREAT EASTERN."

We continue our series of illustrations of the Great Eastern this week with a picture of the deck, and another of the interior of a state-room.

It must be borne in mind that the former picture only represents about one-third of the deck of the monster. The whole length of the deck, which is flush from stem to stern, lacks but four feet of being 700 feet long. From side to side, across the paddle-wheels, the distance is 118 feet, so that an ordinary ship could be laid across the deck without projecting on either side. We have given so many descriptions of this great ship, that in this place we need only repeat that she can carry, when loaded, 22,500 tons of freight, 4000 first-class cabin passengers, and 10,000 troops. The five great masts, two of which are seen in our engraving, are leaved by 7½-inch wire rope; the sixth, or mizzen, is supported by hemp cords.

Travelers will be pleased to see the other picture, which represents a first-class state-room. The size of this apartment is eighteen by seven and a half feet; the ceiling is seven feet six inches high. It is, therefore, quite a fair-sized room for a family. It will be noticed that no berths are visible. By an ingenious contrivance the births collapse and fold against the side of the cabin, leaving a space between them and the wall wide enough to contain the bedding. Curtains suspended from the ceiling, as shown in our picture, conceal the whole arrangement from view, and thus, while the voyagers are at breakfast, their sleeping-room is converted into a very neat drawing-room.

It will be noticed that the lady in the picture is seated on a settee; this is, of course, hollow, and serves as a roomy coffer; it is covered with crimson velvet. Opposite this settee, on the other side of the cabin (and therefore, of course, not shown in in our picture), is another settee which conceals a large bath. The other articles of furniture speak for themselves. The wash-stand is provided with a large mirror, and its fittings-up are so elegant that it does not seem out of place. The tables are provided with extension pieces, and may be made of any size to suit the convenience of the passengers. It is not expected that there will be any motion to speak of. Should the vessel roll, however, all the furniture is provided with screws to fasten it in its place.

When vessels like the Great Eastern do all the passenger business between the commercial nations of the world, there will be an end of the discomforts of sea travel. In such ships one may enjoy the comforts of home.

BOOK III.

THE TRACK OF A STORM.

CHAPTER I.

IN SECRET.

The traveler fared slowly on his way who fared toward Paris from England in the autumn of the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two. More than enough of bad roads, bad equipage, and bad horses, he would have encountered to delay him, though the fullen and unlicensate King of France had been upon his throne in all his glory; but the changed times were fraught with other obstacles than these. Every town gate and village taxing-house had its band of citizen-patriots, with their national muskets in a most explosive state of readiness, who stopped all comers and goers, cross-questioned them, inspected their papers, looked for their names in lists of their own, turned them back, or detained them on, or stopped them and laid them in hold, as their capricious judgment or fancy deemed best for the dawning Republic One and Indivisible, of Liberty, Equality, Fraternity, or Death.

A very few French leagues of his journey were accomplished when Charles Darnay began to perceive that for him along this country roads there was no hope of return until he should have been declared a good citizen at Paris. Whatever might befall now, he must on to his journey's end. Not a mean village closed upon him, not a common barrier dropped across the road behind him, but he knew it to be another iron door in the series that was barred between him and England. The universal watchfulness so encompassed him, that if he had been taken in a net, or were being forwarded to his destination in a cage, he could not have felt his freedom more completely gone.

This universal watchfulness not only stopped him on the highway twenty times in a stage, but retarded his progress twenty times in a day, by riding after him and taking him back, riding before him and stopping him by anticipation, riding with him and keeping him in charge. He had been days upon his journey in France alone, when he went to bed tired out, in a little hammer. "Ay! and condemned as a traitor." At this the crowd roared approval.

Checking the postmaster, who was for turning his horse's head to the yard (the drunken patriot sat compoodly in his saddle looking on, with the line round his wrist), Darnay said, as soon as he could make his voice heard:

"Friends, you deceive yourselves, or you are deceived. I am not a traitor."

"He lies!" cried the smith.

Since the decree. His life is forfeit to the people. His cursed life is in our hands!

At the instant when Darnay saw a rush in the eyes of the crowd, which another instant would have burst upon him, the postmaster turned his horse into the yard, the escort rode in close upon his horse's flanks, and the postmaster shut and barred the crazy double gates. The farrier struck a blow upon them with his hammer, and the crowd groaned; but no more was done.

"What is this decree that the smith spoke of?" Darnay asked the postmaster, when he had thanked him, and stood beside him in the yard.

"Citizen, a decree for selling the property of emigrants."

"When passed?"

"On the fourteenth."

"The day I left England!"

"Everybody says it is the last one of several, and that there will be others—if there are not already—banishing all emigrants, and confiscating all to death who return. That is what he meant when he said your life was not your own."

"But there are no such decrees yet?"

"What do I know?" said the postmaster, shrugging his shoulders; "there may be, for there will be. It is all the same. What would you have?"

They rested on some straw in a loft until the middle of the night, and then rode forward again when all the town was asleep. Beyond the many wild changes observable on familiar things which make this wild ride unreal, not the least was the absence of sound. The shadowy, long and lonely spurring over dreary roads, they would come to a cluster of poor cottages, not yet illuminated, darkness, but all glittering with lights, and would find the people, in a ghostly manner in the dead of the night, dancing. At the end of a round a shrivled tree of Liberty, or all drawn up together singing a song. Happily, the many wild changes observable on familiar things which make this wild ride unreal, not the least was the absence of sound. The shadowy, long and lonely spurring over dreary roads, they would come to a cluster of poor cottages, not yet illuminated, darkness, but all glittering with lights, and would find the people, in a ghostly manner in the dead of the night, dancing. At the end of a round a shrivled tree of Liberty, or all drawn up together singing a song. Happily, the singers were not shrivled Liberty, or all drawn up together singing a song. Happily, the singers were not sleep in Beauvais that night to help them out of it, and they passed on once more into solitary roads. Dismal roads, through the untimely cold and wet, among impoverished fields that had yielded no fruits of the earth that year, diversified by the blackened remains of burned houses, and by the sodden appearance of dismantled roofs and sheds lying up across their way, of patriot patrols on the watch on all the roads.

Daylight at last found them before the wall of Paris. The barrier was closed and strongly guarded when they rode up to it.

"Where are the papers of this prisoner?" demanded a resolute-looking man in authority, who was stationed out by the guard.

Naturally struck by the disagreeable word, Darnay turned his head in that direction to take notice that he was a free traveler and French citizen, in charge of an escort which the decision, in charge of an escort which the official seals of the country had imposed upon him, and which he had paid for.

"Where," repeated the same personage, without taking any heed of him whatever, "are the papers of this prisoner?"

The escort patriot had them in his cap, and produced them. Casting his eyes over Gabelle's letter, the same personage in authority showed some disorder and surprise, and looked at Darnay with a close attention.

He left escort and escorted without saying a word, however, and went into the guard-room; meanwhile they sat upon their horses outside the gate. Looking about him while in this state of suspense, Charles Darnay observed that the gate was but a mixed guard of soldiers and patriots, the latter far outnumbering the former; and that while many came in and went at the guard carts bringing in supplies, and for similar traffic and traffickers, was easy enough, egress, even for the humblest people, was very difficult. A numerous medley of men and women, not to mention beasts and vehicles of various sorts, was waiting to issue forth; but the previous identification was so strict that they filtered through the barrier very slowly. Some of these people knew their turn for examination to be so far off that they lay down on the ground to sleep or smoke, while others talked together or loitered about. The red cap and tricolor cockade were universal, both among men and women.

When he had sat in his saddle some half-hour, taking note of these things, Darnay found himself confronted by the same man in authority, who directed the guard to open the barrier. Then he delivered to the escort, drank and ate, had a receipt for the escorted, and requested him to dismount. He did so, and the two patriots, leading his tired horse, turned and rode away without entering the city.

He accompanied his conductor into a guard-house smelling of common wine and tobacco, where certain soldiers and patriots, asleep and awake, drunk and sober, and in various neutral states between sleeping and waking, drunkenness and sobriety, were standing and lying about. The light in the guard-house, half derived from the waning oil-lamps of the night, and half from the overcast day, was in a corresponding by uncertain condition. Some registers were lying open on a desk, and an officer of a coarse dark aspect presided over these.

"Citizen Defarge," said he to Darnay's conductor, as he took a slip of paper to write on, "is this the last prisoner?"

"This is the man."

"Your age, Evrémonde?"

"Thirty-seven."

"Married, Evrémonde?"

"Yes."

"Where married?"

"In England."

"Without doubt. Where is your wife, Evrémonde?"

"In England."

"Without doubt. You are consigned, Evrémonde, to the Prison of La Force."

"But there is no such decree yet?"

"Under what law, and for what offense?"

The officer looked up from his slip of paper for the first time.

"We have new laws, Evrémonde, and new offenses, since you were here." He said his word a hard smile, and went on writing.

"I entreat you to remember that I have come here voluntarily, in response to that written appeal of a fellow-citizen which lies before you. I have come here to clear him, and to clear myself. I demand no more than the opportunity to do so without delay. Is not that my right?"

"Certainly, have no rights, Evrémonde," was the stolid reply. The officer wrote until he had finished, read over what he had written, sanded it, and handed ft to Citizen Defarge, with the words, "In secret."

Citizen Defarge, unmoved with the paper to the prisoner that he must accompany him. The prisoner obeyed, and a guard of two armed patriots attended them.

"It is you," said Defarge, in a low voice, as they went down the guard-house steps and turned into Paris, "who married the daughter of Doctor Manette, once a prisoner in the Bastile that is no more."

"Yes," replied Darnay, looking at him with surprise.

"My name is Defarge, and I keep a wine-shop in the Quarter Saint Antoine. Possibly you have heard of me."

"My wife came to your house to reclaim her father? Yes!"

The word "wife" seemed to serve as a gloomy reminder to Citizen Defarge, to say, with sudden impatience, "In the name of that sharp female newly born and called La Guillotine, why did you come to France?"

"You heard me say why a minute ago. Do you not believe it is the truth?"

"A bad truth for you," said Defarge, speaking with knitted brows, and looking straight before him.

"Indeed, I am lost here. All here is so unprecedented, so changed, so sudden and unlooked that I am absolutely lost. Will you render me a little help?"

"None." Citizen Defarge spoke, always looking straight before him.

"Will you answer me a single question?"

"Perhaps. According to its nature. You can say what it is."

"In this prison that I am going to so unjustly, shall I have some free communication with the world outside?"

"You will see."

"I am not to be barried there, prejudged, and without any means of presenting my case?"

"You will see. But what then? Other people have been similarly buried in worse prisons before now."

"But never by me, Citizen Defarge."

Citizen Defarge glanced darkly at him for answer, and walked on in a steady and set silence. The deeper he sank into that silence the fainter hope there was—or so Darnay thought—of his softening in any slight degree. He therefore made his last move to say:

"It is of the utmost importance to me (you know, Citizen, even better than I, of how much importance) that I should be able to communicate to Mr. Lorry of Tellson's bank, an English gentleman who is now in Paris, the simple fact, without comment, that I have been thrown into the prison of La Force. Will you cause that to be done for me?"

"I will do," Defarge doggedly rejoined, "nothing for you. My duty is to my country and the Revolution. I am the sworn servant of both against you. I will do nothing for you."

Charles Darnay felt it hopeless to entreat him further, and his pride was touched besides. As they walked on in silence he could not but see how exceedingly the people were to the spectacle of prisoners passing along the streets. The very children took notice of it. A few women turned their heads, and a few shook their fingers at him as an aristocrat; otherwise, that a man in good clothes should be going to prison was no more remarkable than that a labourer in working clothes should be going to work. In one narrow, dark, and dirty street through which they passed an excited orator, mounted on a stool, was addressing an excited audience on the crimes against the people of the king and the royal family. The few words that he caught from this man's lips first made it known to Charles Darnay that the king was in prison, and that the foreign ambassadors had one and all left Paris. On the road (except at Beauvais) he had heard absolutely nothing. The escort and the universal watchfulness had completely isolated him.

That he had taken among for greater dangers than those which had developed themselves when he left England, he of course knew well. Dire perils had thickened about him fast, and might thicken faster and faster yet, he of course knew sore. He could not but admit to himself that he might not have made this journey if he could have foreseen the events of a few days. And yet his misgivings were not so dark as, imagined by the light of this later time, they would appear. Troubled as the future was, it was the unknown future, and in its obscurity there was ignorant hope. The horrible massacre of prisoners, days and nights long, which within a few rounds of the clock, was to set a great mark of blood upon the blessed promising time of harvest, was not far out of his knowledge as if it had been a hundred thousand years away. The "sharp female newly born and called La Guillotine" was hardly known to him, or to the generality of people, by name. The frightful deeds that were to be soon done were probably unimagined at that time in the brains of the doers. How could they have a place in the shadowy conceptions of a gentle mind?

Of unjust treatment in detention and hardship, and in cruel separation from his wife and child, he foreshadowed the likelihood; at the certainty; but beyond this he dreaded nothing distinctly. With this on his mind, which was enough to carry into a dreary prison court-yard, he arrived at the prison of La Force.

A man who had a heavy bunch of keys at his wicket, to whom Defarge presented "The Emigrant Evremonde."

"What the Devil! How many more of them!" exclaimed the man with the bloated face.

Defarge took his receipt without noticing the exclamation, and withdrew with his two fellow-patriots.

"What the Devil, I say again!" exclaimed the jailer, left with his wife. "How many more?"

The jailer's wife, being provided with no answer to the question, merely replied, "One must have patience, my dear!" Three turnkeys, who entered responsive to a bell she rang, echoed the sentiment, and one added, "For the love of Liberty," which sounded in that place like an inappropriate conclusion.

The prison of La Force was a gloomy prison, dark and filthy, and with a horrible smell of town on the high-road, still a long way from Paris.

"YOU ARE A CURSED EMIGRANT," CRIED A FARRIER.

Nothing but the production of the afflicted Gabelle's letter from his prison of the Abbaye would have got him on so far. His difficulty at the guard-house in this small place had been such, that he had apprehended to have come to a crisis. And he was, therefore, as little surprised as a man could be, to find himself awakened, at the small inn to which he had been remitted until morning, in the middle of the night.

Awakened by a timid local functionary and three armed patriots in rough red caps and with pikes in their mouths, who sat down on the bed.

"Emigrant," said the functionary, "I am sorry to send you on to Paris, under an escort."

"Citizen, I desire nothing more than to get to Paris, though I could dispense with the escort."

"Silence!" growled a red-cap, striking at the coverlet with the butt-end of his musket. "Peace, aristocrat!"

"It is as the good patriot says," observed the timid functionary. "You are an aristocrat, and must have an escort—and must pay for it."

"I have no choice," said Charles Darnay.

"Choice! Listen to him!" cried the same growling red-cap. "As if it were not a favor to be protected from the lamp-iron!"

"It is always as the good patriot says," observed the functionary, shrugging his shoulders. "Evrémonde, emigrant!"

Darnay compliled, and was taken back to the guard-house where other patriots in rough red caps were smoking, drinking, and sleeping, by a watch-fire. Here he was detained for the rest of his escort, and hence he started with it on the next day, in company with four other prisoners, two wagons, and three mounted patriots in red caps and tricolored cockades, armed with mustaches and sabres, who rode one on either side of him. The escorted governed his own horse, but a loose line was attached to his bridle, the end of which one of the patriots kept girded round his wrist. In this state they set forth, with the sharp rain driving in their faces: clattering at a heavy dragoon trot over the uneven town pavements, and out upon the muddy roads. In this state they traversed without change, except of horses and pace, all the three-and-leagues that lay between them and the capital.

They traveled in the night, halting an hour or two after daybreak, and lying by until the twilight fell. The escort were so strictchedly ordered that they twisted straw round their hats and legs, and thatched their ragged shoulders to keep the wet off. Apart from the personal discomfort of being so attended, and apart from such considerations of present danger as arose from one of the patriots being chronically drunk, and carrying his musket very recklessly, Charles Darnay did not allow the restraint that was laid upon him to awaken any serious fears in his breast; for he reasoned with himself that it could have no reference to the merits of an individual case that was not yet stated, and of representations, confirmable by the prisoner in the Abbaye, that were not yet made.

But when they came to the town of Beauvais which they did at evening, when the streets were filled with people—he could not conceal from himself that the aspect of affairs was very stunning. An ominous crowd gathered to see him dismount at the posting-yard, and many voices in it called out loudly, "Down with the emigrant!"

He stopped in the act of swinging himself out of his saddle, and, resuming it as his safest place, said:

"Emigrant, my friends! Do you not see me here, in France, of my own will?"

"You are a cursed emigrant," cried a farrier, making at him in a furious manner through the press, hammer in hand; "and you are a cursed aristocrat!"

The postmaster interposed himself between this man and the rider's bridle (at which he was evidently making), and soothingly said, "Let him be; let him be! He will be judged at Paris."

"Judged!" repeated the farrier, swinging his foul sleep in it. Extraordinary how soon the noisome flavor of imprisoned sleep becomes manifest in all such places that are ill-cared for!

"In secret, too," grumbled the jailer, looking at the written paper. "As if I was not already full to bursting!"

He stuck the paper on a file, in an ill-humor, and Charles Darnay awaited his further pleasure for half an hour: sometimes, pacing to and fro in the strong room; sometimes looking out on a stone seat: in either case detained to be imprinted on the memory of the chief and his subordinates.

"Come!" said the chief, at length taking up his keys, "turn this way, citizen."

Through the dismal prison twilight his new charge accompanied him by corridor and staircase, many doors unlocking and locking behind them, until they came into a large, low, vaulted chamber, crowded with prisoners of both sexes. The women were seated at a long table, reading and writing, knitting, sewing, and working: the men, for the most part, standing behind their chairs or lingering up and down the room.

In the instinctive association of prisoners with wretched clothes and disgrace, the new-comer recoiled from this company. But the crowning unreality of his long unreal ride was, their all at once rising to receive him, with every refinement of manner known to the time, and with all the ongoing graces and courtesies of life.

So strangely clouded were these refinements by the prison manners and gloom, so spectral did they become in the light of the approaching axe and misery through which they were seen, that Charles Darnay seemed to stand in a company of the dead. Ghosts all! The ghost of beauty, the ghost of stateliness, the ghost of elegance, the ghost of high pride and self-assertion, the ghost of wit, the ghost of youth, the ghost of age, all waiting their turn at the window, there to take alone, all turning on him eyes that were changed by the death they had died in coming there.

It struck him motionless. The jailer standing at his side, and the other jailers moving about, who would have been well enough as to appearance in the ordinary exercises of their functions, looked extraordinarily cruel when contrasted with sorrowing mothers and blooming daughters who were there—in all the various conditions of the coquette, the young beauty, and the mature woman delicately bred—that the inversion of appearance and character which makes the scum of shadows presented was heightened to the last degree. Surely, ghosts all! Even the long uneral ride some progress of disease that had brought him to these gloomy shades!

"In the name of the assembly's benevolence in misfortune," said a gentleman of courtly appearance and engaging manners, "I have the honor of giving you welcome to La Force, and of condoling with you on the calamity that has brought you here. May it soon terminate happily! It would be an impertinence elsewhere, but it is not so here, to ask you name and condition?"

Charles Darnay roused himself, gave the required information, in words as suitable as he could find.

"But I hope," said the gentleman, following the chief jailer with his eyes, who moved across the room, "that you are not in secret?"

I do not understand the meaning of the term, but I have heard them say so."

"Ah, what a pity! We so regret it! But take courage; several members of our society have been in secret at first, and it has lasted but a short time." Then he added, looking his voice, "I groive to inform the society—is secret."

There was a murmur of commiseration as Charles Darnay crossed the room to a grated door, where the jailer awaited him with a large key. voices—among which the soft and compassionate voice of women were conspicuous—in him good wishes and encouragement. He turned at the grate to bow to render the thanks of his heart; it closed under the jailer's hand; and the apparitions vanished from his sight forever.

The wicket opened on a stone staircase, leading upward. When he had ascended forty steps (the prisoner of half an hour already counted them), the jailer opened a low, black door, and ushered him into a solitary cell. It struck cold and damp, but was not dark.

"Yours," said the jailer.

"Why am I confined alone?"

"How do I know?"

"I can buy pen, ink, and paper?"

"Such are not my orders. You will be visited, and can ask then. At present, you may buy your food, and nothing more."

There were in the cell a chair, a table, and a straw mattress. As the jailer made these things inspection of these objects, and of the four walls, before going out, to wandering fancy wandered through the mind of the prisoner leaning against the wall opposite to him, that this jailer was an unwholesome blunderer. Stared at by one person, as to look like a man who had been drugged and filled with water. When the door was gone, he thought, in the same wonderful way, "Now am I left, as if I were dead." Stopping there, he looked down at the mattress, and turned from it with a sick feeling, and thought, "And here in these crawling creatures is the first condition of the body after death."

Five paces by four and a half, five paces by four and a half, five paces by four and a half." The prisoner walked to and fro in his cell, counting its measurement, and the roar of the city arose like muffled drums with a wild swell of voices added to them. "He made shoes, he made shoes, he made shoes." The prisoner counted the measurement again, and paced faster, to draw his mind with him from that fatal repetition. "The ghosts that vanished when the wicket closed. There was one among them, the appearance of a lady dressed in black, who was leaning in the embrasure of a window, and she had a light shining upon her golden hair, and she looked like * * * * Let us ride on again, for God's sake, through the illuminated villages with the people all awake! * * * * He made shoes, he made shoes, he made shoes. Five paces by four and a half." With such scraps tossing and rolling upward from the depths of his mind, the prisoner paced faster and faster, obstinately counting and counting; and the roar of the city changed to this extent only, that it grew fainter and fainter in his ears, with the wall of voices that he knew, in the swell that rose above them.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A connoisseur acts as the two following anecdotes:

"A gentleman up in Harlem was this morning after reading Mr. Merlam's article on the recent 'Northern Lights,' moved to a gentleman near him and quietly remarked, 'Mr. Merlam says that the Aurora Borealis were not flashes of light, but were simply picked up a piece and kept it.'

"Another gentleman added, 'I presume Mr. Merlam wants to get the public on a string.'

"The same gentleman soon began to entertain his acquaintance with a story about his dog. Speaking of the recent cool mornings, he said that he was aroused at an early hour on the previous morning by a confused and angry noise under his window. Thinking that his dog, which had been left outside, was in trouble, he quickly dressed to relieve him. On opening the door with his previously unknown key, he got up and went to the window, when he saw his dog snarling at two others, one a vicious terrier and the other a large Newfoundland dog. The dog was on his hindquarters, and was at first into a pull of slippers and went down to take care of his big dog. On arriving at the scene, he was surprised to see on his approach he said the Newfoundland dog began to run, but the dog was still barking at the terrier (a coward), in which close proximity to his vital organs the Newfoundland dog began to trust their interests to flight, and the gentleman behind fattened perilously to his story, exclaiming, 'Run, you fool, run! You don't have nought a severe sore throat.'

An exchange says: "Mr. Thomas Clark has laid upon our table a hen's egg measuring 6½ inches in circumference one way, and 5 inches the other. Can any one beat that?"

We will not exchange inform us whether Mr. Clark is a Shanghai or a Cochin China? or, perhaps the editor is trying to make a goose of himself.

They tell a good story of Hallam and Rogers. The poet said,

"How do you do, Hallam?"

"Do what?"

"How do you find yourself?"

"I never find myself."

"Well, how have you been?"

"Been what?"

"Pshaw! how do you feel?"

"Feel what?"

"Good-morning, Hallam."

"It's not a good morning."

Rogers could say no more.

"John, did you ever bet on a horse-race?"

"No; and I've seen my share of them and more."

Much remains unsung," as the tom-cat remarked to the bricklad, when it abruptly cut short his serenade.

THE "DIAPHRAGM FILTER,"
Manufactured by Messrs. MCKENZIE & O'HARA, is the kind of porous silex which is alluded to in recent reports of the Croton Board. I consider the artificial stone which constitutes the "Diaphragm" an excellent article for the purpose. The instrument is quite durable, and will be found extremely economical to insure its proper action.

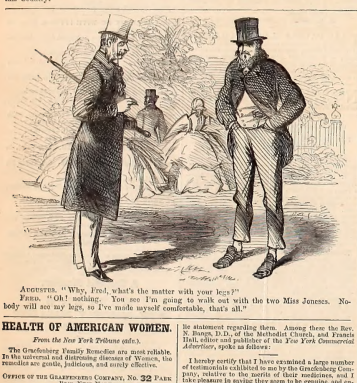
Beechnave, a Great Physician, who taught and practised medicine for over 20 years, ordered, after his death, all his extensive medical library to be burned, excepting one volume of immense size. This was handed to his son by his father. "They contain a rich professional veneration: it was all blank leaves; neither writing or printing was there, save and except a single line engraved in plain German text three words. "Heed cool, heed warm, heed sweat, spew, with keep abstinence." He might have added, "If the patient is hot, cool; warm, warm; cold, warm; if sweating, dry; if dry, sweat; and retrieve him, if it can be done, by any and every means, from the grave, but the consequences of nature's efforts to relieve herself of offensive and hurtful matter, which if injudiciously interfered with, is of more injury than the disease itself." Beechnave's prescriptions could be evacuated, and these secretions which are nearly worked off by the natural efforts of nature, my dear patient, will be sure and do no harm. Remember, tissue for five years is the life of the human body, and this is necessary for the hair existence and of her powers." Brittle tissues had a brittle hair existence. Dr. Beechnave's Medicated Soap was like Beechnave's pills, impregnated with the same remedial agents which were found so beneficial in the disease

IN THE CENTRAL PARK.

DISTINGUISHED FOREIGNER. "My good man—aw—can you direct me to the Wide—the Wotten Wow—aw—where people wide in your Park?"
LABOURER. "Is it the Ride you're wantin'? Faith, then, you're in it now."
Distinguished Foreigner notes down this fresh proof of American barbarity, and resolves to devote a Chapter to it in his forthcoming Book on this Country.



"Why, Fred, what's the matter with your legs?"
FRED. "Oh! nothing. You see I'm going to walk out with the two Miss Joneses. Nobody will see my legs, so I've made myself comfortable, that's all."

HEALTH OF AMERICAN WOMEN.

From the New York Tribune (edit.).

The Graefenberg Family Remedies are most reliable. In the universal and distressing diseases of Women, the remedies are gentle, judicious, and surely effective.

OFFICE OF THE GRAEFENBERG COMPANY, No. 32 PARK ROW, NEW YORK.

The letters addressed by the Graefenberg Company to the leading physicians and professors of medical science in this country, have resulted in the proof that the medical profession are still without remedies for the cure of those distressing and common diseases of women which are not with in every family, and that every deep-seated or difficult case must remain sacred unfair touch upon the principles advocated by the Medical Board of the Graefenberg Company.
